Rights groups maintain — and court documents show, however — that legal authorities have cited e-mail messages and postings on domestic and foreign Web sites as evidence against Chinese dissidents accused of "incitement to overthrow the state" and "leaking state secrets."

The official objected to what he suggested were biased criticisms of China's Internet controls that ignored similar restrictions by foreign governments and private companies on their Web sites.

He cited, for example, statements on Web sites run by The New York Times and The Washington Post that reserve the right to delete or block content in reader discussion groups that editors determine to be illegal, harmful or in bad taste. Chinese news media Web sites are also monitored in that way, he said.

"Major U.S. companies do this and it is regarded as normal," Mr. Liu said. "So why should China not be entitled to do so?"

Editors, journalists and Web site operators in China say domestic news and discussion sites must ban a long list of topics deemed off limits by party officials or face penalties.

Such controls appear to have only superficial similarities to attempts by private companies in the United States and Europe to monitor content on the Web sites they operate.

Mr. Liu also said powers the Bush administration gained under the Patriot Act to monitor Web sites and e-mail communications, and the deployment of technology called Carnivore by the F.B.I. to let the agency scrutinize huge volumes of e-mail traffic, were examples of how the United States has taken legal steps to guard against the spread of "harmful information" online. "It is clear that any country's legal authorities closely monitor the spread of illegal information," he said. "We have noted that the U.S. is doing a good job on this front."

The Bush administration says its efforts to police online communications pertain mainly to preventing terrorist attacks.

Mr. Liu said there were now 111 million Web users in China and in the last five years China had expanded the bandwidth available to connect with overseas Web sites nearly 50-fold to 136,000 megabits per second, underscoring its commitment to let citizens gather information and interact with people around the world.

The number of Web sites Chinese users cannot access amounts to a "tiny percentage" of those available abroad, he said.

China's Responsibilities (WP)

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

SINCE JOINING the World Trade Organization in 2001, China has proved serious about honoring its commitments. It has rewritten laws and regulations to comply with WTO rules, so much so that the United States and the European Union, which bring high-profile cases against each other before WTO tribunals, have a hard time identifying cases to bring against China. But China is treating its WTO commitments as a ceiling, not a floor. It appears unwilling to modify its behavior in other areas, and this may strain its relations with the United States.

China's currency policy is a case in point. Last summer China allowed its currency to appreciate by 2 percent against the dollar, and it hinted that more steps would follow. Since then, the Chinese yuan has barely risen, and its continuing undervaluation has fueled an enormous trade surplus. This invites a protectionist backlash in the United States. Sens. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) and Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) have proposed legislation that would impose punitive tariffs on China until it fixes its currency policy, and a majority of senators appear to back the idea. Last year the Bush administration persuaded the Senate to hold off while it talked the Chinese into revaluing for their own good: A flexible exchange rate would help China avoid boom-and-bust cycles. But China's refusal to take more than baby steps is undermining the administration's efforts to restrain Congress. Mr. Schumer plans to return to the currency issue in upcoming Senate hearings.

China also could do more to abide by the spirit as well as the letter of WTO rules. Intellectual property protections illustrate the point: Chinese laws comply with WTO requirements, and music or film studios that file complaints about copyright violations tend to have their complaints upheld. But this barely dents the rampant piracy in China because the pirates build the modest fines into their cost of doing business. Yesterday Rob Portman, the U.S. trade representative, issued a "top-to-bottom review" of U.S.-China trade relations that spotlighted other areas of concern. China's government procurement should be more transparent. It should quit smuggling subsidies to domestic firms through WTO loopholes.

China also needs to rethink its sinister policy of turning U.S. Internet firms into police auxiliaries. It has recruited Cisco Systems to build a system of Internet routers that blocks Chinese users from foreign Web sites deemed unsuitable by Beijing's censors. It has ordered Yahoo to surrender the names of e-mail users who subsequently were imprisoned. It has allowed Google and Microsoft to offer services in China provided that they bow to censorship. China needs to understand that neither Congress nor U.S. public opinion is likely to allow American companies to carry on this collaboration forever. House hearings today featuring all four firms signal that China's Internet policy has joined the list of flash points in bilateral relations.

China's emergence as a global economic power over the past quarter-century has been a wonderful thing, lifting hundreds of millions of people out of poverty. But China is now too big to get away with a minimalist definition of its obligations to the outside world. Its currency policies affect global trade imbalances. Its intellectual property protections affect the value of copyrights worldwide. Its 100 million Internet users are bound to attract the attention of Western advocates of free speech and their allies in Congress. Riches and power bring broad responsibilities.

Canada's New PM Worries Gay Couples (USAT)

By Rebecca Cook Dube Special For

USA Today, February 15, 2006

TORONTO — As the winter sky darkened over City Hall, Michele Schultz and Christina Chora held hands and read their vows.

Standing before them in a long blue robe, Toronto wedding director Lois Code declared, “I do now, by the virtue of the authority vested in me by the province of Ontario, pronounce you legally married.”

Schultz, 37, and Chora, 39, have been together 20 years. Same-sex marriage has been legal in Toronto for almost three years and throughout Canada since July. Why tie the knot now? Schultz has a two-word answer: “Stephen Harper.”

Harper, sworn in this month as prime minister, is the first Conservative to lead Canada in 13 years. He has pledged to hold a vote in Parliament on overturning Canada's same-sex marriage law, which was approved last year and made Canada the fourth country in the world to legalize gay and lesbian marriage nationwide.

Gay and lesbian couples have been hurrying to wed ever since Harper started gaining momentum before last month's elections. The rush to marry has continued since Harper and the Conservatives defeated Prime Minister Paul Martin and his Liberal Party on Jan. 23.

“We were just worried that now he's in power, he would take away our legal right to get married,” Schultz said after the ceremony. “We always planned to do it, and we thought we'd better do it now.”

The law gives same-sex married couples the same rights and benefits as their heterosexual counterparts. If Parliament tosses out the legislation, gay and lesbian couples who haven't wed will lose the opportunity to get those benefits. Harper has said if the law is overturned, he will not try to invalidate same-sex marriages that already have taken place.

Code said her office has been busy marrying other same-sex couples who have the same concern. “A lot of people were going to wait for the summer and decided not to wait,” she said. “They refer to it as their shotgun weddings.”

Toronto city spokesman Brad Ross said 90 same-sex couples got marriage licenses in January, up from 60 in January 2005. Toronto has issued 3,058 same-sex licenses, including 1,172 for U.S. residents, since Ontario legalized gay marriage in June 2003.

Harper won as a moderate, but he promised social conservatives he would reopen the same-sex marriage debate. As opposition leader last year, Harper proposed civil unions for same-sex couples rather than marriage — a compromise he called “the real Canadian way.”

January's election gave Harper's Conservatives a plurality, but his party does not have a majority of seats in the House of Commons. It's unclear whether he has the votes to overturn same-sex marriage legislation. “It could go either way,” said Laurie Arron, director of advocacy for Egale Canada, a national gay and lesbian rights organization.

A survey of lawmakers conducted this month by The Globe and Mail newspaper predicted same-sex marriage would narrowly survive a new vote.

Canada's public has given pollsters contradictory opinions. In December, a Leger Marketing Poll conducted for the Canadian Press found 55% of 2,013 Canadians polled said they wanted a new vote in Parliament. A poll of 2,034 Canadians conducted by Environics for the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. before the election found 66% didn't want the government to reopen the issue.

Both sides agree that if Parliament overturns the law, the courts will decide the matter. Arron said he believes the Supreme Court will protect same-sex marriage rights. Lower courts have said the constitution guarantees gay marriage. Harper has vowed not to override the Supreme Court (permitted under Canadian law) if it rules same-sex marriage is a fundamental human right.

Reopening the same-sex marriage debate has done damage, Arron said. “A lot of LGBT (lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender) people felt included and felt like first-class citizens” when the law passed last summer. Harper's victory, he said, “already has taken away that sense of security.”

Some business people worry the debate could tarnish Canada's image as a same-sex marriage haven. Ric Tremaine, president of the Gay Toronto Tourism Guild, runs an inn that specializes in gay and lesbian weddings and caters to Americans. “For small businesses and Toronto, it's an economic issue,” Tremaine said. He's been telling potential customers, “If you've been thinking about doing it, maybe you ought to do it now.”

Canadian same-sex marriages are not legally valid in the USA, although some American employers recognize them for purposes of benefits.

The first gay couple to be legally wed in Canada, Kevin Bourassa and Joe Varnell of Toronto, caution against a rush to the altar. “The biggest squabble about your wedding should be where you're going to put your aunt who's coming from Scotland, it shouldn't be about a political party,” Varnell said.

Bourassa said he believes the law will survive: “We are confident that Canada will remain a beacon of equality and justice around the world.”

Maybe so, but gay and lesbian couples continue to accelerate their wedding plans. Susan Green and Tiffany Veinot of Toronto are ready to dash to City Hall if their marriage rights look shaky. “There's a real political calculus for us,” said Green, 41. “We want a big ceremony with friends, but we have to keep one eye on Stephen Harper.”

TERRORISM NEWS:

Congressional Probe Of NSA Spying Is In Doubt (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

Congress appeared ready to launch an investigation into the Bush administration's warrantless domestic surveillance program last week, but an all-out White House lobbying campaign has dramatically slowed the effort and may kill it, key Republican and Democratic sources said yesterday.

The Senate intelligence committee is scheduled to vote tomorrow on a Democratic-sponsored motion to start an inquiry into the recently revealed program in which the National Security Agency eavesdrops on an undisclosed number of phone calls and e-mails involving U.S. residents without obtaining warrants from a secret court. Two committee Democrats said the panel -- made up of eight Republicans and seven Democrats -- was clearly leaning in favor of the motion last week but now is closely divided and possibly inclined against it.

They attributed the shift to last week's closed briefings given by top administration officials to the full House and Senate intelligence committees, and to private appeals to wavering GOP senators by officials, including Vice President Cheney. "It's been a full-court press," said a top Senate Republican aide who asked to speak only on background -- as did several others for this story -- because of the classified nature of the intelligence committees' work.

Lawmakers cite senators such as Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) to illustrate the administration's success in cooling congressional zeal for an investigation. On Dec. 20, she was among two Republicans and two Democrats who signed a letter expressing "our profound concern about recent revelations that the United States Government may have engaged in domestic electronic surveillance without appropriate legal authority." The letter urged the Senate's intelligence and judiciary committees to "jointly undertake an inquiry into the facts and law surrounding these allegations."

In an interview yesterday, Snowe said, "I'm not sure it's going to be essential or necessary" to conduct an inquiry "if we can address the legislative standpoint" that would provide oversight of the surveillance program. "We're learning a lot and we're going to learn more," she said.

She cited last week's briefings before the full House and Senate intelligence committees by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and former NSA director Michael V. Hayden.

"The administration has obviously gotten the message that they need to be more forthcoming," Snowe said.

Before the New York Times disclosed the NSA program in mid-December, administration briefings regarding it were highly secret and limited to eight lawmakers: the top Republican and Democratic leader of the House and Senate, respectively, and the top Republican and Democrat on the House and Senate intelligence committees.

The White House characterized last week's closed-door briefings to the full committees as a significant concession and a sign of the administration's respect for Congress and its oversight responsibilities. Many Democrats dismissed the briefings as virtually useless, but senators said yesterday they appear to have played a big role in slowing momentum for an inquiry.

John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), the Senate intelligence committee's vice chairman, has drafted a motion calling for a wide-ranging inquiry into the surveillance program, according to congressional sources who have seen it. Rockefeller declined to be interviewed yesterday.

Sources close to Rockefeller say he is frustrated by what he sees as heavy-handed White House efforts to dissuade Republicans from supporting his measure. They noted that Cheney conducted a Republicans-only meeting on intelligence matters in the Capitol yesterday.

Senate intelligence committee member Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) said in an interview that he supports the NSA program and would oppose a congressional investigation. He said he is drafting legislation that would "specifically authorize this program" by excluding it from the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which established a secret court to consider government requests for wiretap warrants in anti-terrorist investigations.

The administration would be required to brief regularly a small, bipartisan panel drawn from the House and Senate intelligence committees, DeWine said, and the surveillance program would require congressional reauthorization after five years to remain in place.

Snowe said she is inclined to support DeWine's plan. Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), who also signed the Dec. 20 letter seeking an inquiry, said yesterday that the FISA law should be amended to include the NSA program and to provide for congressional oversight.

As for Rockefeller's bid, Hagel said: "If some kind of inquiry would be beneficial to getting a resolution to this issue, then sure, we should look at it. But if the inquiry is just some kind of a punitive inquiry that really is not focused on finding a way out of this, then I'm not so sure that I would support that."

A New Surveillance Act (WSJ)

By Richard A. Posner

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

The best, and probably the only, way to end the debate over the propriety of the National Security Agency's conducting electronic surveillance outside the framework of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act is for Congress to enact a new statute.

The administration is right to point out that FISA, enacted in 1978 -- long before the danger of global terrorism was recognized and electronic surveillance was transformed by the digital revolution -- is dangerously obsolete. It retains value as a framework for monitoring the communications of known terrorists, but it is hopeless as a framework for detecting terrorists. It requires that surveillance be conducted pursuant to warrants based on probable cause to believe that the target of surveillance is a terrorist, when the desperate need is to find out who is a terrorist.

Critics of the NSA's program point out that surveillance not cabined by a probable-cause requirement produces many false positives (intercepts that prove upon investigation to have no intelligence value). That is not a sound criticism.

National security intelligence is a search for the needle in a haystack. The intelligence services must cast a wide net with a fine mesh to catch the clues that may enable the next attack to be prevented. The initial trolling for clues is done by computer search programs, which do not invade privacy because search programs are not sentient beings. The programs pick out a tiny percentage of communications to be read by (human) intelligence officers, and a small subset of these will turn out to have intelligence value and spur an investigation. Some of these may be communications to which a U.S. citizen is a party.

The program is vital, given the terrorist menace, which is real and not abating. It may be thanks to such programs, as well as to other counterterrorist operations, that we have been spared a repetition of 9/11. We mustn't let our guard down, basking in the false assurance created by the lapse of time since the last attack. But the legality of the program has been called into question, and fears have been expressed about its impact on civil liberties.

These concerns can be addressed without gutting the program. But not by relaxing the standard for obtaining a warrant. Instead of requiring probable cause to believe the target a terrorist, FISA could be amended to require merely reasonable suspicion. But even that would be too restrictive. And the lower the standard for getting a warrant, the less of a filter a warrant requirement creates. If all that the government is required to state in its application is that it thinks an interception might yield intelligence information, judges will have no basis for refusing to grant the application. * * *

It is a mistake to think that the only way to prevent abuses of a surveillance program is by requiring warrants. Congress could enact a statute that would subject warrantless electronic surveillance to tight oversight and specific legal controls, as follows:

1. Oversight: The new statute would --

(a) Create a steering committee for national security electronic surveillance composed of the attorney general, the director of national intelligence, the secretary of homeland security (chairman), and a senior or retired federal judge or justice appointed by the chief justice of the United States. The committee would monitor all such surveillance to assure compliance with the Constitution and laws.

(b) Require the NSA to submit to the FISA court, every six months, a list of the names and other identifying information of all persons whose communications had been intercepted without a warrant in the previous six months, with a brief statement of why these individuals had been targeted. If the court concluded that an interception had been inappropriate, it would so report to the steering committee and the congressional intelligence committees.

2. Specific controls: The statute would --

(a) Authorize "national security electronic surveillance" outside FISA's existing framework, provided that Congress declared a national emergency and the president certified that such surveillance was necessary in the national interest. Warrants would continue to be required for all physical searches and for all electronic surveillance for which FISA's existing probable-cause requirement could be satisfied.

(b) Define "national security" narrowly, excluding "ecoterrorism," animal-rights terrorism, and other forms of political violence that, though criminal and deplorable, do not endanger the nation.

(c) Sunset after five years, or sooner if the declaration of national emergency was rescinded.

(d) Forbid any use of intercepted information for any purpose other than "national security" as defined in the statute (point b above). Thus the information could not be used as evidence or leads in a prosecution for ordinary crime. There would be heavy criminal penalties for violating this provision, to allay concern that "wild talk" picked up by electronic surveillance would lead to criminal investigations unrelated to national security.

(e) Require responsible officials to certify to the FISA court annually that there had been no violations of the statute during the preceding year. False certification would be punishable as perjury.

(f) Bar lawsuits challenging the legality of the NSA's current warrantless surveillance program. Such lawsuits would distract officials from their important duties, to no purpose given the new statute.

Inside America's Secret Court (CNN)

By Henry Schuster

CNN.com, February 15, 2006

Editor's note: Henry Schuster, a senior producer in CNN's Investigative Unit and author of "Hunting Eric Rudolph," has been covering terrorism for more than a decade. Each week in "Tracking Terror," he reports on people and organizations driving international and domestic terrorism, and efforts to combat them.

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- America's secret court sits in a nondescript corridor on an upper floor of the Justice Department building, closed off from public view and now, some believe, regarded as increasingly irrelevant by the Bush administration.

Its formal name is the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, though in recent hearings and reports about the dispute over warrantless wiretapping, it is usually referred to as the FISA (Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act) court.

The FISA court began issuing warrants in 1979 in the wake of a series of intelligence-related scandals earlier that decade and the one before, including the FBI's spying on the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

Congress created the court with the idea that it would hear and rule in secret on requests for wiretaps, primarily those involving foreign intelligence agencies.

Because the U.S. was still deep in the Cold War, foreign spying, not terrorism, was the main concern.

Even though the FISA court did what other courts do -- approved requests for wiretaps in conditions of secrecy -- the aura of national security and the lack of information about the court and the targets of those warrants gave it a certain mystique, to the point where it became known as America's secret court.

The fact that the actual courtroom was protected by an electronic cone of silence to prevent eavesdropping only seemed to add to the flavor.A rare inside look

Judges appointed by the chief justice of the United States would hear proposals for warrants from the FBI and other agencies. One of them was Judge Royce Lamberth, a straight-talking Texan selected to preside over the FISA court from 1995 to 2002.

"The FISA judges have got to be comfortable that this is something we've got to do for our national security. There's no political shenanigans going on here," he told me.

I had the rare chance to hear about FISA from Lamberth during a recent conference in Washington. He said he is the only FISA judge, past or present, comfortable enough to talk about the court.

Lamberth explained the procedures for getting a FISA warrant (which since 1995 also allows for surreptitious entry for searches and seizures, known as "sneak and peek").

"We're presented with affidavits like we would do any other search warrant or wiretap warrant in a regular criminal case," he said. "We have the agent there who is knowledgeable of the case at the time we are authorizing the activity, and I think the process has worked well.

"It is like any other criminal case: The defense is not represented at this time because it's an investigation at that time."

Terrorism began to replace spying as the court's main workload during Lamberth's tenure.

"I was chief judge of the court at the time of 9/11," he said. "I had done many [Osama] bin Laden wiretaps before 9/11. We knew that bin Laden was a problem long before 9/11."

Lamberth spoke about the night after two U.S. embassies in Africa were bombed by al Qaeda in 1998.

"I authorized five wiretaps that night in my living room at 3 o'clock in the morning at a hearing I conducted at home that led to some of the most productive evidence that was used in the trials in New York of the terrorists who set off those bombs, the bin Laden associates who set off the bombs in Africa."Not nimble enough?

Our conversation took place in early December, before the revelations that the Bush administration was bypassing FISA and ordering wiretaps without court warrants.

The FISA court was never interested in statistics or playing the numbers game.

-- Judge Royce Lamberth

Lamberth made no direct reference to the dispute, though a recent report in the Washington Post makes it clear that he was aware of the domestic spying program and was unhappy with it.

Pre-9/11, the most frequently heard complaint about FISA and the court was that warrants were approved routinely.

Lamberth disagreed, saying the court was not a rubberstamp for the government.

"The FISA court was never interested in statistics or playing the numbers game. So that, many times, an application would be presented and not initially approved or disapproved, but the government would be told to get additional information on this or that, and I would look at it again."

But after 9/11, the criticisms came from a different direction. It was revealed that FBI agents failed to get a FISA warrant to search the computer of al Qaeda suspect Zacarias Moussaoui before 9/11, because they felt the FISA process was too difficult.

Lamberth said the problem wasn't with FISA: "We had already defined al Qaeda as a foreign power in many previous applications, so there was no problem if they been able to tie Moussaoui with al Qaeda or acting for al Qaeda, they could have obtained the warrant."

The Patriot Act changed FISA in several ways. It became easier to get a warrant for someone like Moussaoui who might appear to be a "lone wolf" rather than an agent of a specific group, and government prosecutors began getting easier access to FISA warrants.'Need for speed'

The most significant challenge to the court has come from the Bush administration and is at the heart of the warrantless wiretapping dispute.

Despite provisions that allow the government to begin a wiretap 72 hours before seeking a FISA warrant, and giving the president 15 days after a declaration of war before seeking warrants, the Bush administration decided it need more flexibility.

FISA was a valuable tool, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told Congress last week, but it wasn't always fast enough.

"The terrorist surveillance program operated by the [National Security Agency] requires the maximum in speed and agility, since even a very short delay may make the difference between success and failure in preventing the next attack," he said. "And we cannot afford to fail."

He also criticized the procedures necessary to get a FISA warrant.

"If, however, those same intelligence officers had to navigate through the FISA process for each of these intercepts, that would necessarily introduce a significant factor of delay, and there would be critical holes in our early warning system."

Already one FISA judge has resigned from the court, apparently unhappy that it is being bypassed. And many of the senators who listened to Gonzales expressed skepticism about the surveillance program.

That issue notwithstanding, the FISA court is still busy. There are more requests coming in than ever before, more than 1,750 during 2004. That's almost 150 per month.

Twenty-seven years after the FISA court was created, it will finally soon move into its own home at the U.S. District Courthouse in Washington. The question facing it is its own relevance.

325,000 Names On Terrorism List (WP)

By Walter Pincus And Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

The National Counterterrorism Center maintains a central repository of 325,000 names of international terrorism suspects or people who allegedly aid them, a number that has more than quadrupled since the fall of 2003, according to counterterrorism officials.

The list kept by the National Counterterrorism Center (NCTC) -- created in 2004 to be the primary U.S. terrorism intelligence agency -- contains a far greater number of international terrorism suspects and associated names in a single government database than has previously been disclosed. Because the same person may appear under different spellings or aliases, the true number of people is estimated to be more than 200,000, according to NCTC officials.

U.S. citizens make up "only a very, very small fraction" of that number, said an administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of his agency's policies. "The vast majority are non-U.S. persons and do not live in the U.S.," he added. An NCTC official refused to say how many on the list -- put together from reports supplied by the CIA, the FBI, the National Security Agency (NSA) and other agencies -- are U.S. citizens.

The NSA is a key provider of information for the NCTC database, although officials refused to say how many names on the list are linked to the agency's controversial domestic eavesdropping effort. Under the program, the NSA has conducted wiretaps on an unknown number of U.S. citizens without warrants.

The government has been trying to streamline what counterterrorism officials say are more than 26 terrorism-related databases compiled by agencies throughout the intelligence and law enforcement communities. Names from the NCTC list are provided to the FBI's Terrorist Screening Center (TSC), which in turn provides names for watch lists maintained by the Transportation Security Administration and other agencies.

Civil liberties advocates and privacy experts said they were troubled by the size of the NCTC database, and they said it further heightens their concerns that such government terrorism lists include the names of large numbers of innocent people. Timothy Sparapani, legislative counsel for privacy rights at the American Civil Liberties Union, called the numbers "shocking but, unfortunately, not surprising."

"We have lists that are having baby lists at this point; they're spawning faster than rabbits," Sparapani said. "If we have over 300,000 known terrorists who want to do this country harm, we've got a much bigger problem than deciding which names go on which list. But I highly doubt that is the case."

Asked whether the names in the repository were collected through the NSA's domestic intelligence intercept program, the NCTC official said, "Our database includes names of known and suspected international terrorists provided by all intelligence community organizations, including NSA."

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee last week that he could not discuss specifics but said: "Information is collected, information is retained and information disseminated in a way to protect the privacy interests of all Americans."

The NCTC name repository began under its predecessor agency in 2003 with 75,000 names, and it continues to grow. The center was created as part of a broad reorganization of U.S. intelligence agencies after the failure to disrupt the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. It is the main agency for analyzing and integrating terrorism intelligence and is under direction of Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte.

Its central database is the hub of an elaborate network of terrorism-related databases throughout the federal bureaucracy. Terrorism-related names and other data are sent to the NCTC under standards set by Homeland Security Presidential Directive 6, signed by President Bush in September 2003, according to a senior NCTC official. The directive calls upon agencies to supply data only about people who are "known or appropriately suspected to be . . . engaged in conduct constituting, in preparation for, in aid of, or related to terrorism."

"We work on the basis that information reported to us has been collected in accordance with those guidelines," Vice Adm. John Scott Redd, the center's director, said in a statement.

Analysts at the NCTC review all incoming names and can reject them if they do not have an apparent link to international terrorists, officials said. "That is not common, but it does happen," an NCTC official said, citing as examples a domestic or foreign drug dealer or a member of a U.S.-based extremist group, when neither has any sign of international terrorist connections.

The NCTC then sends a subset of the repository list to the FBI's screening center, and each entry includes a reference "to how the individual is associated with international terrorism," according to a June 2005 report by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine. This reference is assigned one of 25 codes such as "Member of a Foreign Terrorist Organization," "Hijacker" or "Has Engaged in Terrorism," according to the report. The report also notes that the codes are split in two categories: "Individuals who are considered armed and dangerous and those who are not."

Fine's office criticized the TSC for including nearly 32,000 records of people in the "armed and dangerous" category but giving them the lowest handling code, which means that no report needs to be sent back to the FBI if they are encountered in the United States by law enforcement officers.

The TSC consolidates NCTC data on individuals associated with foreign terrorism with the FBI's purely domestic terrorism data to create a unified, unclassified terrorist watch list. The TSC, in turn, provides, for official use only, a version giving each person's name, country, date of birth, photos and other data to the Transportation Security Agency for its no-fly list, the State Department for its visa program, the Department of Homeland Security for border crossings, and the National Crime Information Center for distribution to police.

Shannon Moran, a spokeswoman for the FBI screening center, declined to answer detailed questions about the center's work, including how many names are on its list, how many U.S. citizens are included and whether the FBI database includes names linked to the NSA program. Fine's office reported last year that the FBI database contained more than 270,000 names, including a large number of people associated with domestic terrorist movements such as radical environmentalists and neo-Nazi white supremacists.

"If being placed on a list means in practice that you will be denied a visa, barred entry, put on the no-fly list, targeted for pretextual prosecutions, etc., then the sweep of the list and the apparent absence of any way to clear oneself certainly raises problems," said David D. Cole, a Georgetown University law professor who has been sharply critical of the Bush administration's anti-terrorism policies.

The growth of terrorist-related data networks within the U.S. intelligence community has greatly accelerated since Sept. 11, 2001. Before the al Qaeda attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, there were databases containing terrorist identities at the CIA, Defense Intelligence Agency, FBI and State Department. In addition there were 13 independent watch lists, but the lists or databases were not interoperable.

Currently, according to an NCTC official, there are 26 classified data networks carrying terrorism material. In a December 2005 interview on Federal News Radio, Redd said his agency "is really the only place in government and certainly in the intelligence community where all counterterrorism intelligence comes together." He also said that analyses of terrorism issues from all 15 intelligence agencies come into the NCTC, which then puts them on its Web site.

"What that means," Redd said, "is about 5,000 analysts around the counterterrorist intelligence community can pull up that Web site and see . . . what every other agency has as well, assuming they have the clearances."

Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, said the size of the NCTC list and other terrorism-related databases underscores the severity of the "false positive" problem, in which innocent people -- including members of Congress -- have been stopped for questioning or halted from flying because their names are wrongly included or are similar to suspects' names.

"One of the seemingly unsolvable problems is what do you do when someone is wrongly put on this watch list," Rotenberg said. "If there are that many people on the list, a lot of them probably shouldn't be there. But how are they ever going to get off?"

Potential Jurors In Trial Of Father, Son Asked About Terrorism (AP)

By Don Thompson

AP, February 15, 2006

SACRAMENTO - The trial of a father and son charged with lying about the younger man attending a terror training camp in Pakistan began Tuesday, with potential jurors questioned about terrorism and whether they knew anyone who died during the September 2001 attacks.

Umer Hayat, 48, and his 23-year-old son, Hamid, have been in custody since their arrest last June, shortly after the son returned to the United States after nearly two years in Pakistan. An affidavit released in Washington, D.C., when Hamid Hayat was arrested said he planned to attack hospitals and supermarkets.

The Hayats are the only people charged criminally in a federal investigation of the Pakistani community in Lodi, an agricultural town about 35 miles south of Sacramento. They are being tried together but before separate juries because their statements to investigators purportedly incriminate each other in lying to the FBI.

U.S. District Court Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. seated a jury of eight women and four men for Umer Hayat's trial, but those jurors are not due back in court until Feb. 21. Burrell said he expected to pick a separate jury to hear the case against Hamid Hayat on Wednesday and scheduled opening statements for Thursday.

Much of the testimony and evidence will be shared and both juries will often be in the courtroom simultaneously, attorneys said. Before the first jury was selected, defense attorneys and prosecutors quizzed potential jurors about their views on terrorism, Islam and immigration.

"We're trying to find folks who can truly, truly, truly be fair ... in a case with these types of charges," Umer Hayat's attorney, Johnny Griffin III, told potential jurors.

Umer Hayat, an ice cream vendor, is charged with two counts of making false statements to FBI agents and faces eight years in prison if convicted.

His son is charged with three counts of making false statements to the FBI about attending the camp and with providing material support to terrorists. If convicted, he faces up to 31 years in prison.

The jury pool was called from throughout an extensive region stretching from the Oregon border to Bakersfield.

Potential jurors were asked if they lost anyone in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, speak any Middle Eastern languages, or have any prejudices against Muslims or Pakistanis.

In his questioning, Griffin asked for their initial impressions when they heard the case was about terrorism. Some said they immediately thought of the attacks 4 1/2 years ago on the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and the jetliner that crashed in a Pennsylvania field.

One said that associates of hers had been accused falsely of being terrorists. Another, later dismissed, told the judge about losing "two relatives to terrorism."

In their questioning, prosecutors disclosed that investigators paid a cooperating witness who infiltrated Lodi's Pakistani community a few months after the 2001 attacks. The amount of compensation has not been disclosed, but jurors were asked if they were bothered by a paid informant.

The informant is key to the government's case. He recorded about 1,000 hours of conversations, including several with Hamid Hayat before he went to Pakistan in April 2003 and after he arrived there. The informant grew so close to the Hayat family that he sometimes slept at their home.

Prosecutors allege that Hamid Hayat told the informant he intended to train with terrorists. His family said in earlier interviews and court hearings that he went to attend a religious school and find a wife.

Griffin has said his client told the truth to investigators when he denied knowing of any terrorist camps and denied that his son attended one. Umer Hayat changed his story under pressure and without a lawyer or interpreter present, Griffin said.

Prosecutors also disclosed that four mysterious images that had been a focus of pretrial motions for months are satellite photographs of locations in Pakistan. Prosecutors have said defense attorneys would have to get security clearances before they could learn how the images were obtained.

The government also said it may call 28 witnesses but gave no details about who they were.

The Hayats were dressed in dark suits with their hair and beards cropped close - a contrast to the bushy facial hair they once wore. Neither spoke as they listened passively to three interpreters who took turns as jurors were selected.

Among the bystanders in the courtroom were Umer Hayat's wife and another son, as well as Hamid Hayat's cousin.

Federal investigators began focusing on the Pakistani community in and around Lodi shortly after the 2001 terror attacks. About 2,500 people of Pakistani descent call the area home, most descendants of laborers who began arriving in the early 1900s to work in the area's orchards and packing plants.

Federal investigators questioned the Hayats after the younger man returned to the United States from Pakistan last May.

Prosecutors say Hamid Hayat failed a lie-detector test and admitted attending one terrorist camp for three days in 2000 and a second for three to six months in 2003 and 2004. They also say he returned to the U.S. intent on attacking hospitals and supermarkets.

FBI agents say they found a book titled "Virtues of Jihad" during a search of his bedroom.

Two Muslim clerics and the son of one of the imams arrested during the same investigation were not criminally charged but were deported to Pakistan over immigration violations.

SACRAMENTO Court Clerks, Reporters Queried About Lodi Terror Case Leak Sealed Court File Was Allegedly Given To Sacramento Bee (SFC)

By Demian Bulwa, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, February 14, 2006

Sacramento -- The high-profile trial of a Lodi father and son accused of terrorist ties, scheduled to begin today with jury selection, took on added intrigue Monday with the disclosure that federal agents have questioned court clerks and news reporters while investigating the alleged leak of a secret case file.

FBI agents and a federal prosecutor questioned clerks on the fourth floor of the U.S. District Court in Sacramento last week about their handling of sealed documents from the prosecution of Umer Hayat and his son, Hamid Hayat, said attorneys Mark Reichel and Joseph Wiseman, who were hired to represent clerks.

The investigators also contacted three reporters at the Sacramento Bee newspaper and said they were investigating the leak of documents, said executive editor Rick Rodriguez, who declined further comment.

In the trial, jurors must decide whether Hamid Hayat, 23, is guilty of supporting terrorists by attending a training camp in Pakistan in 2003 and 2004. He is also charged with lying to FBI agents about it. Umer Hayat, a 48-year-old ice cream truck driver, is charged with lying to the FBI about his son's alleged training.

Their attorneys said the younger man did not go to a camp at all.

The two attorneys representing clerks said they believe the government is trying to intimidate the media in a controversial case. A few court clerks answered questions, Reichel said, but 16 opted to hire counsel. A third attorney representing a clerk, Krista Hart, said investigators asked clerks to give fingerprints and undergo polygraph tests.

"It's disconcerting to see this," Wiseman said, "because one can view this as a strong-arm attempt by the government to silence the media." Referring to other recent investigations of media leaks, he added, "This is probably the highest-profile terrorism case in the country right now. I think it's going to get messier before it's over."

FBI Special Agent Karen Ernst, an agency spokeswoman, confirmed Monday that the government was investigating "a leak of a sealed court document to the Sacramento Bee" but stressed that the clerk's office was not the only focus. She said the probe has been going on for some time and is not related to the trial.

The investigation comes on the heels of other highly publicized probes that have pitted the media against the Bush administration. Most recently, the Justice Department began looking into whether the New York Times was illegally given information about a controversial wiretapping program.

The Sacramento Bee, in a story published July 8, referred to "federal court documents obtained by The Bee" that contained details about the investigation that had not been made public. Many of the allegations mentioned in the story, written by Stephen Magagnini and Dorothy Korber, were later revealed in court hearings and filings by prosecutors.

Reporter Denny Walsh, who works in an office on the fourth floor of the courthouse, was the third reporter contacted, Rodriguez said.

Lawyers today will begin selecting a pair of juries, one for each of the defendants, in a trial that is expected to last 10 weeks and is seen as a window onto hit-and-miss efforts by U.S. authorities to thwart terrorist attacks. Testimony will be heard on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays.

Authorities have said that Hamid Hayat, who was arrested in June after returning to Lodi from Pakistan, was to receive attack orders from two Muslim clerics who were in Lodi on religious-worker visas. The clerics agreed to be deported to their native Pakistan last year rather than fight immigration charges. Their attorney said they had no ties to terrorism.

Hamid Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, said the young man was manipulated during FBI interviews. "The government charged these guys without a case and now they're going to trial without a case," she said, adding, "It's clear that our guys were not the targets of this investigation. The investigation was so much bigger."

The "meat of the case" remains FBI interviews with the father and son in which they allegedly confess, prosecutor Laura Ferris said during a pre-trial hearing. The government is also expected to call a cooperating witness -- a young Pakistani American man who befriended the Lodi clerics and Hamid Hayat, who he surreptitiously tape-recorded as far back as August 2002.

Moussaoui Permanently Barred From Jury Selection (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — A federal judge today permanently banned Zacarias Moussaoui from the remainder of the jury selection proceedings in his trial after the self-admitted Al Qaeda fighter once again rudely interrupted court proceedings, lashing out at his defense lawyers and the judge and angrily declaring: "God curse you and America!"

Her patience at an end, U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema ordered Moussaoui removed from the courtroom and taken to his holding cell in the federal courthouse building here. He will be allowed to monitor the next three weeks of jury selection via a television hookup.

The 37-year-old Moussaoui, a French citizen of Moroccan descent, started the proceedings today much as he did on Feb. 6, when some 500 potential jurors were brought into court in four groups to begin filling out questionnaires. Each time, he disrupted the process, swore allegiance to Al Qaeda and was whisked away at Brinkema's insistence.

Today's hearing was set up for the judge to go over the individual jury selection process. She began by saying her "main reason" was to "determine how Mr. Moussaoui plans to behave." He wasted no time telling her.

Speaking in Arabic and English, Moussaoui rose and called the proceedings nothing more than my "organized death." In April he pleaded guilty to capital murder for participating in the Sept. 11 terrorist plot, but also claimed that he was being recruited to fly an airplane into the White House at a later date. The question now is whether he should be sentenced to death or life in prison with no parole.

Moussaoui started today by disavowing any allegiance to France, calling it a "nation of homosexual Crusaders." He said, "I tell you I am a Muslim.... I am not a frog."

Brinkema could not silence him.

"Today is my death, today is my death," he repeated, angry that the judge would not excuse his defense lawyers and let him represent himself.

"If I don't make sure that these people are not going to represent me, I know that I am dead, OK?"

But even then, Moussaoui said, he did not expect justice. "You own everything," he told the judge and the lawyers seated around him. "You are America — the defense, the judge, the attackers. These people are American. I'm Al Qaeda. I'm a sworn enemy of you. You, you, you, you. For me, you are enemy."

Then, aiming at President Bush, Moussaoui said, "Your own commander in chief says he wants to launch a revenge against terrorists."

The judge warned him that such outbursts were inappropriate.

"Mr. Moussaoui," she said, "you are the biggest enemy of yourself."

She ordered him removed, and he said: "God curse you and America!"

The judge already has ruled that Moussaoui comprehends the gravity of his situation despite his guilty plea to capital murder.

Some observers believe his outbursts only affirm that he is mentally unstable, an argument for appeal should he be sentenced to death. It also could convince the jury not to execute an insane man.

But his behavior also could help the government in that he repeatedly proclaims himself a dedicated Al Qaeda fighter and a sworn enemy to America.

"It could cut either way," said Carl Tobias, a professor at the University of Richmond School of Law in Virginia.

The judge could bar Moussaoui from the trial itself, something that has been done in other high-profile cases.

Charles Manson and three female devotees were removed at times from their trial in Los Angeles 35 years ago in the Tate-La Bianca murder case when they began singing, chanting and disparaging the judge. All four were convicted.

Moussaoui Kicked Out Of Court After Tirades (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, February 15, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Confessed al-Qaeda member Zacarias Moussaoui, on trial to determine whether he should be executed for his connection to the 9/11 conspiracy, was kicked out of a federal courtroom Tuesday after refusing the judge's request that he “sit quietly.”

Judge Leonie Brinkema ruled that Moussaoui, 37, “forfeited his right to be present” in court today, when his court-appointed attorneys — to whom he refuses to speak — begin questioning prospective jurors. Moussaoui will watch the hearing on closed-circuit TV.

Before he was escorted from court Tuesday, the French national once again argued that his trial was unfair, and he showed more of the angry, abusive behavior that has characterized his court appearances and legal filings for much of the past four years. When the court last met Feb. 6, Moussaoui was removed four times for such behavior.

“You own everything — the defense, the judge, the attack,” Moussaoui told Brinkema, the latter term an apparent reference to the prosecution. “I am al-Qaeda, your sworn enemy.”

Brinkema answered, “Mr. Moussaoui, you are the biggest enemy of yourself.”

Moussaoui also hurled slurs at his lawyers, calling one “KKK” and another — Japanese-American Alan Yamamoto — a “geisha.” He accused Brinkema of “trying to organize my death.”

Moussaoui, born in France to Moroccan parents, demanded that court papers stop describing him as French. “I stand here as a Muslim only. I do not stand here with a nation of homosexual crusaders.” As he left the courtroom less than five minutes after the session began, he said, “God's curse on America.”

Moussaoui, who appeared in court Tuesday wearing a green prison jumpsuit and a white knit cap, was arrested on immigration charges in August 2001 in Minnesota, after instructors at a private flight school reported he was acting suspiciously. Moussaoui, they told investigators, wanted to learn how to maneuver a jet, but not how to take off.

When Moussaoui was charged with terrorism conspiracy in December 2001, then-attorney general John Ashcroft vowed to make Moussaoui answer for the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Last April, Moussaoui pleaded guilty to conspiring with al-Qaeda. He said he was aware of the 9/11 plot but was not a part of it. His assignment from Osama bin Laden, Moussaoui said, was to fly a hijacked jet into the White House on a later date.

In filings, prosecutors have said they plan to use parts of Moussaoui's statement in which he acknowledges having lied to federal agents after his arrest to conceal the 9/11 plot to argue that Moussaoui is responsible for more than 2,500 deaths and should be executed.

Moussaoui's lawyers have suggested they will argue that he knew little of value and that the government's tepid response to pre-9/11 terrorism warnings raises questions about whether it would have acted even if he had cooperated.

Testimony is scheduled to begin March 6. Jurors will be asked to decide whether Moussaoui should be executed or receive a life sentence.

Judge Ousts Moussaoui Again (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 15, 2006

Admitted al Qaeda terrorist Zacarias Moussaoui was barred yesterday from the federal courtroom where jurors are being selected for the sentencing phase of the death-penalty case after he again disrupted the proceedings.

U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema ordered Moussaoui removed from the courtroom during a hearing to determine "whether you plan to remain quiet ... or whether you plan to make speeches," telling the 37-year-old French citizen of Moroccan descent "you are the biggest enemy of yourself."

Moussaoui, proclaiming his allegiance to al Qaeda, was removed four times from the courtroom last week during the opening round of jury selection to determine whether the only person charged in the U.S. in the September 11 attacks should be put to death.

Moussaoui refused to be quiet during yesterday's hearing, instead reading from a handwritten speech and berating the judge for what he described as violating his civil rights. He accused Judge Brinkema of "trying to organize my death for four years."

Moussaoui again denounced his court-appointed attorneys and charged that President Bush had begun "a new campaign of revenge against terrorists." He also told the judge he was not French, saying, "I stand here as a Muslim only."

"God curse you and America," Moussaoui said as he was led from the courtroom. He will watch jury selection from his cell at the courthouse.

He pleaded guilty in April to conspiring with the 19 terrorists who slammed four hijacked jetliners into the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and a Pennsylvania field, killing nearly 3,000 people. In his plea, he said he conspired with members of al Qaeda to commit acts of terrorism and aircraft piracy and to murder U.S. citizens.

But he denied direct involvement in the September 11 attacks, saying he had been training for a separate mission to fly a 747 aircraft into the White House. Jury selection is expected to take a month.

Moussaoui was detained by FBI agents on immigration charges in Minneapolis on Aug. 16, 2001. At the time of his arrest, he had in his possession knives, binoculars, a hand-held aviation radio, Boeing 747 flight manuals and computer programs on flight simulation, pilot procedures and aerial pesticide application.

Trial in the sentencing question is scheduled to begin March 6.

Today, groups of a dozen prospective jurors will return to the courthouse to be questioned individually by the judge. The sessions will continue for two to three weeks, until 85 prospective jurors have been qualified.

The government charged in a six-count indictment that Moussaoui conspired with other members and associates of al Qaeda to "unlawfully, willfully and knowingly" kill and maim persons within the United States, and to create a "substantial risk of serious bodily injury to other persons" by destroying and damaging structures, transportation sites and others targets.

Judge Bars Moussaoui From Courtroom (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

After another outburst, Zacarias Moussaoui was banned by a federal judge yesterday from attending the remainder of jury selection at his death penalty hearing after the judge told the Sept. 11 conspirator, "Mr. Moussaoui, you are the biggest enemy of yourself."

Last week, U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema ejected Moussaoui four times on the first day that prospective jurors were brought into court. As Moussaoui entered the federal courtroom for a routine hearing in Alexandria yesterday, warily scanning the room and wearing a white knit cap, Brinkema laid down the rules.

"The main purpose of this hearing is to determine how Mr. Moussaoui plans to behave," she said, and if he plans "to remain quiet or . . . try to make speeches."

"I know, I know your story," Moussaoui interjected in heavily French-accented English, as Brinkema vowed to eject him again if he didn't remain silent during jury selection.

Moussaoui then took the podium and criticized President Bush for mounting what he called a "a new campaign, a revenge against terrorists." He lambasted his own attorneys -- with whom he does not speak -- calling one a "federal lawyer," another, a "KKK [Ku Klux Klan] lawyer" and a third, a "geisha."

"Mr. Moussaoui," Brinkema responded, "I am not going to permit you to use a public federal courthouse to malign your attorneys."

"You have been trying to organize my death for four years," Moussaoui told the judge, who in 2003 delayed the case by ruling that Moussaoui was ineligible for the death penalty. Her ruling was overturned on appeal.

Moussaoui then told Brinkema: "You own everything in America, the defense, the judge . . . These people are Americans. I am al Qaeda. For me, you are enemy."

"Mr. Moussaoui, you are the biggest enemy of yourself," Brinkema retorted before saying: "Are you going to sit quietly and let us do some business, or are you going to continue to try to talk?"

"I'm going to leave," Moussaoui said.

"Yes, you are," Brinkema replied as she announced that Moussaoui would watch the rest of jury selection on a television monitor from a secure area in the courthouse. Moussaoui then walked out in the custody of U.S. marshals, telling them, "I'm going, I'm going."

"We have some business to take care of," Brinkema said as Moussaoui left the courtroom.

"Yes, taking care of my death, yes," Moussaoui replied.

Moussaoui is the only person convicted in the United States in connection with the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. A jury is being chosen to decide whether he lives or dies.

Jury selection resumes today with questioning of individual jurors by the judge and continues until opening statements in the trial, set for March 6. The trial is scheduled to last one to three months.

Legal experts have said Brinkema is on firm ground in ejecting Moussaoui. Defendants have a constitutional right to be at their trial, but the U.S. Supreme Court has allowed judges to expel or even bind and gag disruptive defendants to maintain order in courtrooms.

Measures taken by other judges around the country have included sealing a defendant's mouth shut with duct tape and forcing defendants to wear an electric shock-producing stun device. Sources have said that Moussaoui has been equipped during court appearances with a stun device, which is fitted under his clothing.

A deputy equipped with a small remote control stands ready to administer jolts of electricity if violence is threatened.

Moussaoui, 37, is a French citizen of Moroccan descent, although he said in court yesterday: "I'm not French and never have been French. I stand here as a Muslim only." He pleaded guilty in April to conspiracy charges as part of an al Qaeda plot that led to the attacks on the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon in Arlington County, just a few miles from the federal courthouse.

When he pleaded, Moussaoui said Osama bin Laden had personally instructed him to fly a plane into the White House, but he denied that he was involved in the Sept. 11 hijackings. Jurors will first decide whether he is eligible for the death penalty. If he is, they will then decide whether he gets life in prison or is put to death.

Judge Ejects 9/11 Suspect After Outburst (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va., Feb. 14 — A federal trial judge ejected Zacarias Moussaoui from the courtroom on Tuesday after his latest outburst and said he could observe the next weeks of his trial only from a closed-circuit television system in a nearby cell.

The judge, Leonie M. Brinkema, ordered that Mr. Moussaoui, the only person to stand trial in America in connection with the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, be barred from the courtroom during jury selection. Defense lawyers and prosecutors are expected to spend the next few weeks questioning and screening 500 residents of Northern Virginia to choose the jury that will decide whether Mr. Moussaoui is sentenced to death or life without parole.

After entering the courtroom on Tuesday, Mr. Moussaoui declared his loyalty to Al Qaeda and said he needed to be allowed to explain why he believed that the lawyers assigned to defend him were conspiring with the judge and the prosecution to execute him. "If I can't make speech, I am dead," he said.

As he was led from the courtroom by federal marshals, Mr. Moussaoui shouted, "God curse America."

Judge Brinkema said Mr. Moussaoui, a 37-year-old resident of France who is of Moroccan heritage, might be allowed to return to the courtroom after a jury was seated.

Mr. Moussaoui pleaded guilty to six felony counts in connection with the Sept. 11 attacks, but he has said he intends to fight the death penalty.

On Tuesday, Judge Brinkema began by telling Mr. Moussaoui that the main purpose of the session was to determine whether he would sit quietly or would insist on "making speeches."

Mr. Moussaoui, wearing a dark-green prison jumpsuit, took the lectern and criticized his court-appointed lawyers in insulting terms.

He said he should not be referred to in court papers as a French citizen. "I stand here as a Muslim," he said. "I am an enemy of France."

When he told Judge Brinkema that his lawyers were his enemies, she replied, "Mr. Moussaoui, you are the biggest enemy of yourself."

Prof. Craig M. Bradley of the Indiana University School of Law at Bloomington said ejecting an unruly defendant was appropriate because "the law recognizes that a defendant can't bring his own trial to a grinding halt through his own misbehavior."

Disruptive Again, Moussaoui Is Barred From Court During Jury Selection (AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, February 15, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. – Confessed al-Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui again disrupted his sentencing trial with insults and epithets Tuesday and was barred from the courtroom while a jury is selected to decide whether he is put to death or imprisoned for life.

After verbally sparring with Moussaoui for about 15 minutes, U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema ordered that he must watch the remainder of jury selection on closed-circuit television from his courthouse cell. That could take until March 6, when opening statements are scheduled.

Brinkema said her main purpose in Tuesday's hearing was to determine "how Mr. Moussaoui plans to behave: ... whether you plan to remain quiet ... or whether you plan to make speeches."

Moussaoui was ejected four times on Feb. 6 when he denounced his court-appointed lawyers in front of four separate groups of prospective jurors. Some 500 northern Virginia residents filled out questionnaires that day about their attitudes toward the case, the death penalty, Muslims and the FBI.

The 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan descent pleaded guilty last April to conspiring with al-Qaeda to fly aircraft into U.S. buildings but has denied any role in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Moussaoui claims to have been training to fly a 747 jetliner into the White House as part of a subsequent plot.

When Brinkema asked how he would behave, Moussaoui walked to the lectern and pulled out what appeared to be a handwritten speech. "You have been trying to organize my death for four years," Moussaoui told her.

Clad in a white knit cap and green prison jump suit with "prisoner" in white block letters on the back, Moussaoui launched into another attack on his lawyers and in the process offered diatribes against President Bush and the French people.

At various points, he called Bush "a crusader" who was "launching a new campaign of revenge against terrorists."

Despite his French citizenship, he said in French-accented English: "I'm not French. ... I stand here as a Muslim only. I do not stand here with a nation of homosexual crusaders."

Brinkema repeatedly tried to quiet him. But Moussaoui complained that for four years she had denied him a chance to explain his objections to the lawyers. "Today is my day," he plunged on. "If I can't make sure that those people are not going to represent me, I know that I am dead."

He referred to his three attorneys as a "federal lawyer," a "KKK" (Ku Klux Klan) and a "geisha."

Brinkema sternly broke in: "I'm not going to permit you to use a federal courtroom to malign your lawyers."

Without raising his voice, Moussaoui responded, "You own everything – the defense, the judge, the attack (prosecutors). I am al-Qaeda. I am your sworn enemy."

Brinkema: "Mr. Moussaoui, you are the biggest enemy of yourself."

Again she asked if he would remain quiet or leave.

Moussaoui: "I'm going to leave."

"God curse you and America," Moussaoui said as marshals accompanied him out.

Brinkema ruled Moussaoui had forfeited his right to be present for jury selection but said she might reconsider if he later agreed to behave.

Despite requests from news media, Brinkema ruled that no copies of exhibits admitted into evidence – including videotaped depositions from some witnesses and summaries of interrogations of captured al-Qaeda leaders – will be made public during the trial. She said jurors might be contaminated by uncontrolled exposure to the material.

"Moreover, some exhibits may be declassified only for the limited purpose of being discussed in court and shown to the jury without unrestricted public access," she added. She said she would decide after trial which exhibits to release.

Brinkema also said Moussaoui's mother, expected to visit from France, could watch on television in an overflow room where her translator would not disrupt proceedings.

Lawyers begin questioning individual jurors Wednesday.

On Capitol Hill, Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., said he would fight a defense subpoena to testify on what he's learned about a military intelligence operation named Able Danger that he says identified some 9/11 hijackers well before the attacks.

"I think Moussaoui is a thug. I think he deserves to be given the harshest punishment," Weldon said. "If they were going to use me, I don't want to be used."

Defense attorneys did not immediately respond to calls asking whether they would still try to enforce the subpoena.

Moussaoui Barred From Courtroom (REU)

By Deborah Charles

Reuters, February 15, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Virginia -- After another outburst in court, a federal judge barred September 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui on Tuesday from being present during upcoming jury selection for a trial to decide if he gets the death penalty.

For the second week in a row, Moussaoui exclaimed "I am al Qaeda" before being escorted out of the courtroom. Last week Moussaoui made several outbursts in four separate sessions with potential jurors, prompting his expulsion each time.

Moussaoui has frequently interrupted the only U.S. case brought in connection with the attacks with outbursts in court.

U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema called a hearing on Tuesday -- one day before direct jury questioning is set to begin -- mainly to ask Moussaoui if he could behave during jury selection.

Dressed in a white knit cap and green prisoner jumpsuit, the French citizen of Moroccan descent did not respond directly but proceeded to make further outbursts.

"I want to make it known, like I've been trying for the last four years ... that these people are not my lawyers," he said forcefully. He went on to call each of his lawyers a derogatory name.

"I am al Qaeda," he said. "You, you, you -- for me you are the enemy," he added, gesturing to his lawyers.

Brinkema stopped Moussaoui from continuing and said: "Mr. Moussaoui, you are the biggest enemy of yourself."

She gave him the option of sitting down quietly during the jury selection process, or of watching the proceedings on closed-circuit television in a cell in the courthouse.

Moussaoui went on to complain about his lawyers then said he wanted to leave the courtroom.

"You're going to take care of my death," he yelled as he was lead out of the courtroom by the marshals.

"God curse you and America!" he added from outside the courtroom.

Brinkema ordered that Moussaoui would not be allowed to attend the jury selection process in court, which starts on Wednesday and continues until final jury selection and opening statements in the trial on March 6.

JURY TO CONSIDER DEATH PENALTY

In April, against the advice of his lawyers, Moussaoui pleaded guilty to six charges against him in connection with the September 11 attacks that killed about 3,000 people.

A jury is being selected for the penalty phase of the trial to determine whether he will be executed or sentenced to life in prison.

Last week about 500 prospective jurors began the unusually long selection process, completing 49-page questionnaires that included questions about al Qaeda, the September 11 attacks and terrorism.

Brinkema also asked them if Moussaoui's outbursts had any impact on their ability to serve on the jury.

Brinkema is trying to seat an impartial jury of 12 people and 6 alternates for the trial that is being held only a few miles from the Pentagon -- one of the targets on September 11.

Moussaoui's mother, Aicha el-Wafi, plans to attend the trial and be assisted by an interpreter. The trial could last several months.

Jurors first must determine whether Moussaoui intentionally lied to the FBI in interviews before September 11 about his knowledge of the plan to hijack planes.

If the jury decides he did lie, preventing the government from possibly stopping the attacks, another phase of the trial will be held to see whether Moussaoui should be given the death penalty or life in prison. If the jury finds he did not lie, he faces a sentence of life in prison.

Judge Orders Iraqi Deported (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 15, 2006

A federal immigration judge in Seattle yesterday ordered the deportation of an Iraqi national with ties to a senior al Qaeda operative suspected of helping plan the attack on the USS Cole in Yemen in 2000 and the bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) spokesman Dean Boyd said U.S. Immigration Judge Kenneth Josephson ordered Sam Malkandi of Kirkland, Wash., removed from the United States. Judge Josephson based his decision on evidence presented by ICE attorneys during hearings that concluded earlier this month, Mr. Boyd said.

Mr. Boyd said ICE attorneys accused Mr. Malkandi of committing fraud against the U.S. government to obtain immigration benefits for himself and his family.

He said the attorneys also introduced evidence, some of which was referenced in the September 11 commission report, that Mr. Malkandi used fraud in an attempt to obtain a U.S. visa for Tawfiq bin Attash, a one-legged al Qaeda operative also known as "Khallad." A trusted lieutenant and former bodyguard of al Qaeda founder Osama bin Laden, bin Attash is suspected of planning the embassy bombings and the Cole attack.

Mr. Boyd said the evidence linking Mr. Malkandi to the al Qaeda operative surfaced in 2003 after bin Attash was captured in Karachi, Pakistan, and turned over to U.S. authorities.

The September 11 commission report said bin Attash told U.S. officials in August 2003 that a person in Bothell, Wash., whose name sounded like "Barzan," had tried to help him obtain a visa to enter the United States. U.S. officials concluded that "Barzan" was a Bothell man named Sarbaz Mohammad, who changed his name to Sam Malkandi in 2001.

Mr. Boyd said an investigation by ICE and FBI agents on the Seattle Joint Terrorism Task Force determined that "Barzan" and Mr. Malkandi were the same person. Among other things, he said, federal agents were able to obtain documents showing that Mr. Malkandi had made arrangements with a clinic in Bellevue, Wash., for bin Attash, under an alias, to obtain a new prosthetic foot in 1999.

Bin Attash was never able to come to the United States because his visa application was denied, Mr. Boyd said.

ICE agents arrested Mr. Malkandi in August on fraud charges. He was accused of falsely claiming to have been incarcerated in Iran for possession of prohibited political materials, which originally qualified him for refugee status to enter the United States in June 1998.

"We are gratified that justice has prevailed in this case," said Dorothy Stefan, chief counsel for ICE in Seattle.

Under the law, Mr. Malkandi has 30 days to appeal Judge Josephson's decision. In the meantime, ICE continues to hold him without bail.

Witnesses For Seattle Imam Rip Into Prosecution's Case (SEAPI)

By PAUL SHUKOVSKY, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, February 15, 2006

TACOMA -- Witnesses for the imam of a Rainier Valley mosque accused of connections with terrorist organizations portrayed one government witness Tuesday as a vindictive liar and contradicted FBI assertions that Abrahim Sheik Mohamed is a fund-raiser for radical Islamic holy war.

Federal agents with the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force arrested Mohamed Nov. 14 at Sea-Tac Airport as he was getting off a domestic flight.

He was charged not with a terrorism-related crime, but with the immigration violation of lying on his application for asylum from his war-torn home in Somalia, where competing tribal groups killed each other based on clan membership.

Federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement prosecutors say Mohamed lied about being a member of an oppressed minority clan, about his country of origin, his educational background and what languages he speaks. But much of the lengthy bond hearing to determine whether Mohamed can be released pending resolution of the case has focused on his alleged role as a fund-raiser for terrorist organizations operation in Somalia and Ethiopia.

One witness, Bashir Hussein, who ran an African restaurant near Mohamed's Abu Bakr Mosque on Rainier Avenue, told the court in earlier proceedings that every week at the mosque between $50,000 and $100,000 was raised for al-Itihaad a-Islamiya, a Somali terrorist organization to which he said Mohamed belongs.

But the treasurer of the mosque, Osman Deria Egal, said yesterday that Mohamed "has nothing to do with" handling the mosque's money, which is controlled by a board of directors on which Egal sits.

And in a break in the proceedings outside the courtroom at the ICE detention center in Tacoma, Egal broke into laughter at what he perceives to be the government's ludicrous contention that between $50,000 and $100,000 was raised.

Two witnesses provided what Mohamed's lawyer, Hilary Han, later called "the motivation for (Bashir Hussein's) lies" about his client.

Both Abdullahi Fara and Ahmed Hassani recounted an incident in which Hussein asked the imam to grant him an Islamic divorce decree.

The witnesses said that when Mohamed refused to give him the document because of alleged failures by Hussein to carry out certain duties to his ex-wife, Hussein exploded in anger at the imam.

Immigration will rule later on whether Mohamed can be released on bond.

Quieter Presence Urged In Mideast Terror (USAT)

By John Diamond

USA Today, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The United States should launch a major covert information campaign to promote the nation's image in the Middle East and sow division among radical Muslim groups, according to a West Point critique of U.S. terrorism policy.

The strategy, amounting to a secret campaign for hearts and minds, could involve paying for favorable publications and schools that promote moderate Islamic philosophies.

The report also proposes using Muslim allies, or at least groups hostile to the more militant Islamic movements, to exploit ideological rifts within terrorist groups.

Through it all, however, "it is essential that the U.S. hand not be seen," said the report by the Combating Terrorism Center at the U.S. military academy.

The authors of the unpublished report, civilian scholars Jarret Brachman and William McCants, confirmed the authenticity of the report obtained by USA TODAY. Though not an official U.S. military document, it has circulated widely among U.S. intelligence officials and officers on the Pentagon's Joint Staff. The authors regularly brief Pentagon officials on terrorism issues.

The report, completed Monday, says the United States should rely on "proxies" for military action in the Middle East if force is necessary.

"Direct engagement with the United States has been good for the jihadi movement," the authors argue, because it reinforces the perception in the Middle East of the United States as an anti-Islamic crusader.

"The United States should avoid direct, large-scale military action in the Middle East."

Such action, the report says, "rallies the locals behind the movement, drains the United States of resources and puts pressure" on allied regimes.

Titled "Stealing al-Qaeda's Playbook," the report is based on a detailed study of jihadist writings and communications and is meant to help better understand the enemy, Brachman said in an interview.

The current U.S. anti-terrorist strategy is reactive, the authors argue in briefing slides accompanying the report. They dub the strategy, "Whack-a-Terrorist," after the carnival game Whack-a-Mole.

Retired general Wayne Downing, the center's chairman and a former head of Special Operations Command, has been advising Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on ways to make the command more effective against terrorist groups.

In the report's foreword, Downing writes that although U.S. intelligence agencies have devoted more resources to translating jihadi texts and broadcasts, they don't have enough people to pay enough attention "to the most useful texts" they have collected.

Last year, the U.S. Special Operations Command issued $300 million in contracts for three companies to spread pro-American propaganda without revealing the U.S. connections.

One contractor, the Lincoln Group, became the focus of a Pentagon investigation in December because of reports it had paid Iraqi newspapers to publish pro-U.S. stories as part of a U.S. information warfare strategy in Iraq.

Wahhabism In America (WT)

By Matthew Mainen

The Washington Times, February 15, 2006

Traditionally in international politics, the word "invasion" is used to describe a situation in which a state forcefully penetrates the territory of another. But in a world in which non-state actors, especially terrorist organizations, play an increasing role in international politics, the word "invasion" can be used to describe far subtler actions.

Recently, a number of anti-Western texts, many of which were distributed by the Saudi Embassy, were discovered among authentic Muslim works at prominent Muslim institutions in the United States. This tactic carried out by extremists within the Saudi government represents an invasion on two fronts: the Muslim religion and the sovereignty of the United States. Although there is no evidence that Saudi Arabia has directly sponsored terrorism, it nonetheless is the largest contributor to the faith that breads it: Wahhabism, a fringe Islamic sect created more than 1,000 years after the time of Muhammad.

When such ideas posing as authentic Islam enter the United States, it can only serve to sabotage long-lasting American values. If the goal of social upheaval is achieved, it will be far more damaging than any incendiary device used in acts of terror.

The threat posed by Saudi Arabia's interference in America's religious affairs is not to be taken lightly, and requires immediate attention at the high levels of office.

The First Amendment guarantees religious freedom in the United States. Nearly 200 years after the Bill of Rights was ratified, the ideals of religious freedom and tolerance were codified in the International Convention of Civil and Political Rights.

Although attempting to argue that Saudi Arabia is legally bound to respect religious tolerance is an arduous task, there is another option: Saudi Arabia, like all other countries, is legally bound to respect the sovereignty of the United States. By playing a direct role in the distribution of texts designed to erode domestic religious harmony, Saudi Arabia is illegally interfering with America's internal affairs.

Wahhabism, especially as it attempts to influence American Muslims, is best described as a cult and should be dealt with as one. After all, fatwas published in materials distributed by the Saudi Embassy exhibit signs of fundamental cult practices. Muslims living in the United States are instructed to progressively isolate themselves for the sake of their purity. First, they must have almost no contact with non-Muslims. After this separation is complete, they are then instructed to distance themselves from Muslims who do not share the extreme beliefs of Wahhabism. Finally, they are to undergo a breaking down of their identities; such practices as celebrating a birthday are strictly forbidden. Young Muslims looking for spiritual guidance are duped into believing that these distorted teachings are the true path of Islam.

Once a person is stripped of their identity and the included morals, he becomes a puppet to the masters of whichever ideology is controlling him. None of the September 11 hijackers were born terrorists; they went through a similar process as what is being advocated to American Muslims by Saudi religious leaders. Cults, when they become dangerous to society, are not protected by the Constitution or international convention, and neither is Saudi Arabia's role in bringing the philosophy of this cult to the United States.

In response to Wahhabist terrorism, non-Muslim Americans will often misdirect their aggression against Islam as a whole instead of the fringe faith. An increased amount of acts of intolerance against peaceful Muslim communities such as the burning of Korans in front of mosques is evidence of this. Thus, the Wahhabist claim that the West is waging a war against Islam becomes a fulfilled prophecy, giving extremists an opportunity to recruit more adherents at the expense of mainstream Islam. Once the belief of victimization becomes prevalent, acts of intolerance on the part of Muslims are all the more likely to occur. Thus, the cycle repeats itself, and at each successive stage, the prospects of violence increase.

So far, the American Muslim community has almost single-handedly protected the United States from such social turmoil by reporting to the proper authorities when they find extremist texts. But without the help of a higher power, the U.S. government, there is nothing guaranteeing that mainstream Muslim institutions will forever remain impervious to this invasion.

Even at the height of the Cold War, the Soviet Union was unable to penetrate the United States with its ideology to the degree Saudi Arabia has. This issue cannot be ignored, as Wahhabist infiltration of mainstream Islam in the United States affects all people, not just Muslims. The foundation of terrorism is not the tools used to carry out attacks but its driving philosophy. The American Muslim community recognizes this; it is time the U.S. government recognize the same.

PATRIOT ACT:

Editorial: Patriot Act Still Flawed (PALMBEACHP)

Palm Beach Post (FL), February 15, 2006

"I think Congress has failed the country in many ways," including allowing the administration "to completely overpower the debate based on, 'I'm the commander in chief, and I know what's best.' " Thus spoke Sen. Chuck Hagel last month, reports The New York Times. Yet the Nebraska Republican and potential presidential candidate last week blessed the proposal to renew flawed provisions of the Patriot Act, saying, "This is an accommodation that I think we can be proud of."

With that, Sen. Hagel and three other GOP senators scuttled what had been a bipartisan effort to bring the anti-terrorism law in line with the Constitution. Democrats, too, hardly are blameless in failing to ensure the basic protections that the bill was temporarily extended to incorporate. The pattern is all too familiar: The all-terrorism, all-the-time White House manipulates the nation's fear, and Congress caves.

Is it enough that there have been some changes to the hastily concocted 2001 law for which the president insisted on all-or-nothing renewal? Not when those changes, as holdout Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., maintains, are insignificant. The proposed revision still sanctions secret government fishing expeditions into Americans' private records without proof of any connection to a suspected terrorist, spy or illegal activity.

And as conservatives such as former Rep. Bob Barr, R-Ga., note, the new agreement also finesses a First Amendment violation prohibiting businesses, agencies and individuals from mentioning that the government subpoenaed your private records. In theory, the gag order now is limited to one year. Even then, you cannot be told of the subpoena that invaded your privacy, much less challenge it, if the government says the disclosure would harm national security or diplomatic relations.

It is un-American to give one branch of government the unfettered license the president keeps claiming. To grant this administration more "trust us" authority is inconceivable in the light of such appalling abuses as its domestic wiretapping without court approval. Rather than yield the administration more extraordinary power, Congress should insist on more oversight. Otherwise, Congress emboldens an administration that has proven masterful at playing all sides against the others for wafer-thin approval to get its way — and, when it doesn't get its way, simply doing what it wants anyway.

Editorial: Poor Patriot Compromise (OCR)

Orange County (CA) Register, February 14, 2006

Four Republican senators, led by Sen. John Sununu of New Hampshire, who helped to hold up renewal of certain controversial portions of the USA Patriot Act in December, say they have reached an agreement with the White House on a compromise. That compromise still doesn't provide sufficient safeguards for important civil liberties.

The Patriot Act, cobbled together from Clinton administration and federal law enforcement proposals to give government more power - proposals rejected by the Republican Congress through the 1990s - was passed within weeks of the 9/11 terrorist attacks. Sixteen of the most controversial provisions of the act were slated to "sunset" - or expire – at the end of last year unless approved again by Congress.

A coalition of liberal and conservative civil-liberties advocates held up approval based on objections to a few provisions, and the act has been temporarily renewed twice, most recently until March 10.

This new compromise would give recipients of subpoenas for information in terrorist-related investigations the right to challenge government orders not to inform anyone - after a year. It would remove a requirement that any individual who is given what is called a National Security Letter demand for records inform the FBI of the name of any attorney consulted about whether or how to comply. And it would clarify that most libraries are not subject to National Security Letter demands for records of clients using Internet facilities.

These would be desirable changes, but not enough to protect civil liberties sufficiently. As former Georgia Republican Rep. Bob Barr noted, under these provisions "investigators can [still]conduct government-sanctioned fishing expeditions." Mr. Barr wants the government to have to prove there is evidence of some connection to terrorist activity or a terrorist organization before demanding such a broad range of records.

We agree. Congress should be in no hurry to approve this inadequate proposal.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Pilots Report Seeing Laser Lights While Flying (CLICKDET)

ClickonDetroit, February 15, 2006

FBI, FAA, Police Are Investigating

Police are on alert after more than a dozen pilots reported someone shining a laser light at the plane while descending into Metro Airport.

The incident occurred in the Dearborn and Dearborn Heights areas, where 16 pilots reported seeing the laser pointer lights near the tower at Metro Airport, Local 4 reported.

Apparently the lights were being flashed at planes on their final approach into the Detroit area. The first instance reported was near the Home Depot in Dearborn Heights, then a short time after the light originated from a neighborhood near Telegraph Road and Lehigh Road, according to police.

Police say shining a laser pointer at a plane is a felony and could lead to a dangerous situation.

"Just be a small laser, when it goes up into the cockpit, then it really can blind the pilot," said Capt. Lee Gavin, Dearborn Heights Police Department.

The same incident occurred about six months ago, Local 4 reported.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation and the FAA are investigating, and local police have assigned additional patrol vehicles to the reported areas, according to the station's reports.

Pilots Report Laser Flashes (DEN)

Detroit News, February 15, 2006

Feds vow to get tough after complaints about 16 incidents as planes land at Metro Airport.

ROMULUS -- Federal authorities are vowing to get tough with anyone interfering with commercial aircraft by shining laser beams at airplanes during landing approaches at Detroit Metropolitan Airport.

The Federal Aviation Administration received reports of 16 incidents of pilots complaining that between 5:50 and 6:30 p.m. Monday, someone flashed laser beams at their aircraft as they descended, said Elizabeth Isham Cory, the agency's deputy director of public affairs for the Great Lakes Region.

"We treat it as a very serious matter," FBI Special Agent Dawn Clenney said. "Laser beams can disorient pilots responsible for an airplane full of passengers."

Clenney said pointing laser beams at airplanes could be considered a terrorist act under the law and anyone caught doing it could face charges carrying up top 20 years in prison and a fine. Monday's incidents were the second at Metro in the last six months.

Capt. Lee Gavin said Dearborn Heights police investigated a similar complaint at the airport last fall before turning the matter over to the FBI.

On Monday, Gavin said, the department got two calls from the airport tower after pilots reported beams of light coming from a neighborhood at Michigan and Gulley and an area at Telegraph and Lehigh about three-quarters of a mile away.

Officers from Dearborn and Dearborn Heights searched a parking lot at a Home Depot store on Michigan and the other location but found nothing suspicious.

He said the complaint last fall centered on the Michigan-Gulley area.

"If it's just kids or some irresponsible adults, they should be warned that this is a serious matter and will be treated as such," Gavin said.

Federal agents have investigated a rash of similar incidents nationwide in the last year.

In December 2004, the FBI and the Homeland Security Department notified law enforcement agencies that terrorists have explored using lasers as weapons.

Last November, a 39-year-old New Jersey man, David Banach, pleaded guilty to a felony charge of willfully interfering with a "craft involved in mass transportation" for hitting a private jet three times with a laser beam as it flew at 3,000 feet.

Banach claimed he was playing with his 7-year-old daughter, using a green laser to point out stars and light up trees and homes of neighbors.

He was charged with interfering with a flight crew, a violation of the USA Patriot Act, and with lying to federal officers. He could have faced 20 years in prison under the antiterrorist Patriot Act.

Banach was scheduled to be sentenced today in federal court in Newark. While he is not expected to receive prison time because of his plea, he will have the felony on his record for life, authorities said.

White House Firmly Behind Chertoff (AP)

The AP, February 14, 2006

President Bush has full confidence in Michael Chertoff and has not considered asking the homeland security secretary to step down after criticism of his performance on Hurricane Katrina, the White House said Tuesday.

"Secretary Chertoff is doing a great job," White House press secretary Scott McClellan said, answering a reporter's question about Chertoff. "The president appreciates his strong leadership. He is someone who is committed to doing everything he can to protect the American people and to continuing to take steps to make sure we are better prepared to respond to the threats that we face."

A Republican-written House report blamed government-wide ineptitude for mishandling Katrina relief. A report by Congress' investigative arm, the Government Accountability Office, reached similar conclusions and singled out Chertoff for delays.

Former FEMA chief Michael Brown told a Senate panel last week that he dealt directly with the White House in Katrina's aftermath rather than with what he described as a bumbling Homeland Security bureaucracy. Brown said the agency under Chertoff's leadership was preoccupied with terror threats at the expense of preparing for natural disasters.

Days after Katrina struck, Brown quit FEMA under fire.

The Bush administration has been pushing back aggressively against the criticism from Brown and congressional investigators.

Some Wonder If Chertoff Can Survive (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — A year ago, when Michael Chertoff was brought in to run the Department of Homeland Security, he was hailed by Republicans and Democrats as the epitome of competence and good judgment. At his confirmation hearing, one Democratic senator called him "the right man for this job." The Senate confirmed him, 98 to 0.

But as evidence mounts of the department's botched response to Hurricane Katrina, Chertoff's reputation has been impugned. Now some question whether he can survive in the job. The most telling sign of how much heat the Homeland Security secretary is under may be that members of his own party are throwing logs on the fire.

"It's fair to say that he's vulnerable," said Republican Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota, a member of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which has been investigating the government's response to Katrina for several months. Chertoff, Coleman said, "came in with really high expectations. He was a star. Now his halo has been diminished."

Today, one year to the day after he was sworn in, Chertoff is scheduled to testify before the committee — and is expected to face tough questioning. (He was originally scheduled to appear Tuesday, but the hearing was delayed.) Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), the committee member who praised Chertoff as the right man for the job, expressed dismay Tuesday over how the department had responded to Katrina.

"We have found enough pre-landfall warnings of Hurricane Katrina's destructive force to warrant a full-bore emergency response from the top levels of the federal government before the storm struck," Lieberman said. "It is inconceivable to me how the response could have been so weak."

The White House came to Chertoff's defense Tuesday, its words reminiscent of President Bush's praise for Michael D. Brown, the head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency who was forced to resign when his mishandling of the disaster became known.

"Chertoff is doing a great job," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said in answer to a reporter's question. "The president appreciates his strong leadership." Chertoff, McClellan said, "is someone who is committed to doing everything he can to protect the American people and to continuing to take steps to make sure we are better prepared to respond to the threats that we face."

In September, the president — visiting New Orleans a few days after the storm hit — said to Brown, "Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job." Ten days later, Brown resigned under pressure. FEMA is part of the Homeland Security Department, and Brown reported to Chertoff.

Upcoming reports on the government's disaster response effort are likely to hold more bad news for Chertoff.

A select committee investigating Katrina in the GOP-controlled House plans to issue a 600-page report today that accuses Homeland Security of having a "blinding lack of situational awareness and disjointed decision making" that "needlessly compounded and prolonged Katrina's horrors."

The president's domestic security advisor, Frances Townsend, who is heading the White House inquiry on Katrina, is also about to make her report public. A draft version is said to pin much of the blame for the government's ineffectual response on weak management in Chertoff's department.

A big part of Chertoff's problem is that Brown's shortcomings are judged to have been so apparent when measured against the death and destruction of Hurricane Katrina that blaming him for the government's failings may be politically insufficient.

As Coleman put it: "Chertoff should have known that his battleground commander didn't have command."

Chertoff has embarked on a campaign to restore his reputation. Monday he outlined plans to better integrate FEMA into Homeland Security. And defenders note that in August, before Katrina hit, Chertoff unveiled what he called a "second-stage review," in which he described a planned reorganization of his department that included strengthening FEMA.

"Our responsibilities certainly include not only fighting the forces of terrorism, but also fighting the forces of natural disasters," he said at the time.

Homeland Security press secretary William "Russ" Knocke said Tuesday that, "unlike some, the secretary's focus is on preparing FEMA for the next storm season and dramatically strengthening preparedness in our country."

Some domestic security experts said that to blame Chertoff was missing the point. James J. Carafano, a senior research fellow at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank, said the House committee report showed that when Katrina hit, there was no effective national structure for disaster response.

"Headlines are asking whether we should be pointing the finger at Chertoff or Brown, but the point is there's a whole slew of problems they identified," he said. "I don't think the response would have been much different no matter who it was, because we lack the capacity."

Given the political climate in Washington, in which Republicans are beginning to worry that the problems of the Bush administration might become their own, Chertoff may still be vulnerable.

"If pressure builds on the administration to find a second scapegoat, it's Michael Chertoff," said Paul C. Light, a New York University professor of government organization.

At the same time, "it takes an awful lot for President Bush to remove a Cabinet officer," said Norman J. Ornstein, a political analyst for the American Enterprise Institute. Citing the case of former Treasury Secretary Paul H. O'Neill, Ornstein said, "Usually it takes signs of insubordination. If you have demonstrated loyalty, the president will bend over backward to keep you."

Experts Question Proposed FEMA Changes (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

In proposing to bolster the Federal Emergency Management Agency by creating a full-time response force of 1,500 people and expanding 10 regional offices, White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff are grappling again with FEMA's long-term future, a question at the heart of the nation's disaster preparedness.

Should the government's best-known response agency remain a relatively small, 2,500-worker force largely focused on processing disaster claims and coordinating federal help in a crisis?

Or should it be beefed up into a more muscular agency -- a "FEMA on steroids," as planners envisioned in creating the Department of Homeland Security in 2003 -- one capable of being on the ground when required?

Several experts and officials in touch with the Bush administration say the changes proposed Monday -- adding reconnaissance teams, improving vendor databases and strengthening claims management -- only scratch the surface of needed changes.

What Chertoff announced "was a necessary step but not sufficient. I expect him to go further," said Richard A. Falkenrath, a former Bush White House official and a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution who was an original architect of the Homeland Security Department. "It's cultural change [with FEMA] and leadership, and they need more resources, there's just no question."

James Jay Carafano of the Heritage Foundation agreed that the administration's preview Monday "doesn't really solve the problem," which is the ability to push help in the critical first 72 hours of a crisis and unify the government under one command. Both tasks are now beyond FEMA's power, he said.

The real question is whether to shift FEMA from what Falkenrath called "a very pliant posture" of waiting for state and local leaders to ask for help in a disaster, to a more aggressive role without trampling on governors and mayors.

Overall, Townsend and Chertoff began to sketch out their vision in speeches to 50 state emergency managers Monday. In a speech titled "Transforming National Preparedness," Townsend embraced the notion of including state, local and federal agency personnel in bigger FEMA regional offices. That would be a variation on a plan championed by Chertoff's predecessor, Tom Ridge, but rejected largely because of cost.

Without saying that FEMA would be put in charge, Townsend said the Homeland Security Department will play a more robust role in forging a "culture of preparedness," partly by becoming a tougher enforcer of state and local homeland security grants. By the end of 2006, more than $18 billion will have been committed to improve state and local preparedness since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Fewer than half the states say they are prepared to respond to a catastrophic disaster, according to a Homeland Security Department analysis, the Associated Press reported. Asked to assess their plans to respond to a catastrophe, 20 states said they felt confident, 14 states said they were somewhat confident, while 13 reported they were not confident. Only five states said they were confident that their evacuation plans would work during a catastrophe.

Bush's $2.8 trillion 2007 budget would require state and local governments to report more fully on how they spend their money. But it also would trim funds for state and local programs by nearly 10 percent.

While the White House says it wants to increase FEMA discretionary spending by $363 million next year, all but $68 million would go to mandatory programs and disaster funds. The agency's main initiatives would add 220 workers.

FEMA's troubles are making it difficult to find a successor for Acting Director R. David Paulison. State members of the National Emergency Management Association with whom Townsend and Chertoff met said that several members have discussed the job of FEMA chief but expressed little interest. Former California emergency services director Richard A. Andrews has declined an offer.

Democrats 'Pleasantly Surprised' By Katrina Report (RC)

By Steve Kornacki

Roll Call, February 15, 2006

When a select committee was empanelled in mid-September to examine the federal response to Hurricane Katrina, House Democratic leaders scoffed, branding the GOP-led investigation a "sham" and refusing to appoint Members.

But when that committee's report is formally unveiled today, it will portray the response as sluggish and ineffective, with particularly harsh words reserved for Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, according to draft copies circulated earlier in the week.

"I'm pleasantly surprised," Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) admitted on Tuesday. "I think it's an honest assessment of the egregious incompetence with which the crisis of Katrina was addressed by the administration."

Despite some dissent from within the Democratic Caucus, Democratic leaders boycotted the committee chaired by Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.) because it did not give equal representation to both parties. In part, the boycott was aimed at ratcheting up public pressure for a bipartisan Katrina commission, modeled after the 9/11 commission co-chaired by Tom Kean and ex-Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.).

With their leadership's blessing, three Gulf Coast region Democrats — Reps. Charlie Melancon (La.), William Jefferson (La.) and Gene Taylor (Miss.) — joined the committee anyway, arguing that they owed it to their constituents to take part.

The report is already generating headlines because of its tone, considered unusually critical of the Bush administration, given the past reluctance of House Republicans to pursue similar investigations.

Some Democrats feel the leadership's posture effectively put Davis and the committee in a box, forcing them to criticize the response in strong terms or risk being accused of living up to the Democrats' cries that their work would amount to a whitewash.

And yet the Democrats are still free to make that claim, to contend that the report, as one aide suggested, "painted in broad strokes instead of connecting all the dots." Indeed, in the "additional comments" section, the Democrats who participated argue for Chertoff's dismissal, a remedy not endorsed by the Republicans.

From a purely political standpoint, Democrats may have a rare opportunity to double their payday in the message wars, piling on with additional critiques even after the media has reported the damning nature of the report.

"Even a Republican Congress that has refused to perform any oversight of the Bush Administration had to conclude that the response to Katrina was a 'national failure,'" Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said in a release in today.

"Still, the Davis Committee report is incomplete and leaves the American people with too many unanswered questions and absolutely no accountability."

Pelosi renewed her call for a 9/11-style commission.

But, given the bluntness of the report, Republicans also could advance the argument that Democrats forfeited their right to criticize by not fully participating in the committee's work.

"I'm pleased the Democrats didn't take part," Hoyer said Tuesday. "It will be hard for the administration to say this is an ad hominem partisan political attack."

House Dems Are Rethinking 'sham' Panel (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, February 15, 2006

House Democratic leaders had mixed reactions yesterday to a sharply critical report on the federal government's bungled response to Hurricane Katrina, as Rep. Nancy Pelosi called it "incomplete" while Rep. Steny Hoyer said he was "pleasantly surprised" by the findings.

The report was compiled by the Republican-dominated select committee on Hurricane Katrina, a panel that Democrats have officially boycotted on the grounds that a Republican-led committee would not be tough enough in criticizing the administration's mishandling of the disaster. Government Reform Committee Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.) led the House investigation.

Having asserted many times last fall that the committee was a "sham" and would go soft on the administration, Democrats had to soften their rhetoric yesterday and praise the committee's work while still renewing earlier calls for a nonpartisan, independent commission to investigate the government's bungled response to the storm.

Democratic Leader Pelosi (Calif.) said the report, which faults the response of top administration officials such as Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, represented "a vote of no confidence in the Bush administration's ability to keep America safe."

Yet she said much work is left to be done.

"The Davis Committee report is incomplete and leaves the American people with too many unanswered questions and absolutely no accountability," she said.

A Davis spokesperson declined to comment.

The report called the Katrina response "a national failure, an abdication of the most solemn obligation to provide for the common welfare" and "a failure of leadership," according to a summary document leaked to news organizations Sunday. The committee will officially release the report today.

Hoyer (Md.), the House's No. 2 Democrat, declined to denigrate the report itself, saying that he is glad it took the administration to task.

"I am pleasantly surprised. I think it is an honest assessment of the egregious incompetency with which the crisis of Katrina was addressed by this administration."

He went on to reaffirm his support of Democrats' decision to boycott the panel.

"I am very pleased that Democrats didn't participate. It will be hard for the administration to say this is another ad hominem partisan attack."

"A report that was not as stark as this would not have been believable," he added.

Pelosi protested the creation of the select committee last fall, declining to name Democrats to the panel unless Republicans agreed to create an independent investigatory commission. However, she allowed three Gulf Coast Democrats — Reps. William Jefferson (La.), Charlie Melancon (La.) and Gene Taylor (Miss.) — to participate informally since their districts fell in the path of the storm. The committee will officially expire March 15.

Democrats have long complained that Republicans have failed to provide substantive oversight of the administration.

Pelosi's daily talking points dealt entirely with the Katrina report yesterday.

"The American people†— especially Katrina survivors — are paying for the Republican corruption," the talking points read. "Republicans hold no one in the Bush Administration accountable. Americans can't afford to gamble their security on the same Bush Administration team that mismanaged Katrina."

Melancon and Jefferson released a Democratic response to the select committee's report, praising many of the document's conclusions but asserting that the panel was reluctant to assign blame.

"For all it accomplished … the Select Committee adopted an approach that largely eschews direct accountability," the Louisiana Democrats wrote. "The majority report rarely assesses how these problems occurred, why they were not corrected sooner and who in particular was responsible."

On Monday, Melancon called on Chertoff to resign.

Several members of the committee participated in a congressional delegation to coastal Louisiana and Mississippi on Jan. 19 and 20. Davis, Melancon, Taylor, Jefferson and Reps. Cynthia McKinney (D-Ga.) and Bill Shuster (R-Pa.) attended.

Democrats on the panel were upset that Davis never subpoenaed the White House. The committee did subpoena the Defense Department, although Democrats complained that the department never fully complied with that order.

SBA Seeks Additional Funding For Gulf Coast Disaster Loans (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Small Business Administration, running out of money for disaster relief on the Gulf Coast, is pressing for additional funds to support an estimated $6.8 billion in new loans for homeowners and businesses there.

In response to Katrina and last year's other hurricanes, Congress less than two months ago approved $441 million for SBA loan subsidies. But the agency estimates it needs $1 billion more and is asking for action this week before lawmakers leave for the Presidents Day recess.

The situation is unusual both because of the size of the request and because the White House, under attack for failing to respond to Hurricane Katrina more quickly, hasn't been more clear, Republicans say, about the need for funds.

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) said last evening that the House would initiate a bill, possibly as early as today, to meet the SBA's needs. But given their annoyance, the House and Senate Appropriations committees expect to provide only enough to meet loan demands through the end of April.

The White House's Office of Management and Budget has yet to submit a formal request for the needed money. The SBA itself avoided any mention of its funding crisis in a Feb. 7 news release on the disaster-loan program. "SBA Breaks Disaster Loan Record; More than $4 Billion Approved in the Gulf Region," was the headline of that release.

But at the same time, SBA Administrator Hector Barreto was writing Congress Feb. 1 to warn that his funds would soon be exhausted. The administrator wrote again Feb. 8, stating, "Immediate action is needed by the Congress to provide funds to SBA to avoid an interruption in loan assistance to qualified applicants."

SBA officials, who once feared a cutoff next Tuesday, say their funds will be exhausted this month. House Appropriations staff indicated that between $700 million and $900 million in new money will be provided in the new bill. And the House must also act on a separate, Senate-passed Katrina measure, raising the federal flood-insurance program's borrowing by $2.7 billion to $21.2 billion to meet claims from the storms.

Thus far, the SBA estimates that it has approved $4.3 billion in disaster loans but predicts the total demand will be in excess of $11 billion. Loans to cover physical damage to business and economic losses account for a quarter of the total. The greater share of the loans goes to homeowners, who are included in the disaster-relief program. Their larger-than-expected uninsured losses have helped balloon the total.

In preparing its earlier estimates, SBA officials said, they correctly predicted the number of loan applications, which is running close to 400,000. But while a typical disaster home loan in the past ran near $32,000, uninsured losses from Hurricane Katrina are far higher and result in loans averaging closer to $68,000.

The SBA estimates it has 4,000 employees dedicated to assist disaster victims and says loans are being approved at a record pace. The agency hit the $2 billion mark Dec. 30 but was at $3 billion slightly more than two weeks later and reached $3.6 billion by the end of January.

WAR NEWS:

Iraqi Province Cuts Ties With British (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, February 15, 2006

BASRA, Iraq — More than 1,000 protesters burned a British flag Tuesday, and the regional administration in Iraq's main southern province severed all ties with British authorities over video footage showing British soldiers allegedly beating and kicking Iraqi youths.

In London, the British Defense Ministry announced the arrest of two more people in connection with the images. Another person — apparently the man who shot the video — was arrested Monday.

Protesters, many of them supporters of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, marched on the British Consulate in Basra, where they burned the flag and shouted slogans against the alleged abuse of the youths during a riot Jan. 10, 2004, in the southern city of Amarah.

Protesters held banners reading “No, no to Tony Blair” and “Try the British soldiers involved in this aggression.”

With outrage over the video mounting, the governing council for Basra province, which includes Iraq's huge southern oil fields, announced it was cutting all ties with British military and civilian operations in the province, where Britain's contingent in Iraq of more than 8,000 servicemembers is headquartered.

The Basra police chief, Maj. Gen. Hassan Suwadi, said Iraqi security forces would cease joint patrols with the British military in the province to protest the alleged abuse.

“We condemn the abuse of the British forces and demand the British government to adopt legal procedures as soon as possible to punish its soldiers who carried out the abuse,” Suwadi said.

Elsewhere, gunmen killed 11 Shiite farmers north of Baghdad, including eight members of one family, officials told the Associated Press. An American Marine was killed and six coalition personnel were wounded in two attacks in Baghdad.

In Amarah, about 100 miles north of Basra, two Iraqis who claimed to have been beaten on the video — Bassem Shaker and Tariq Abdul-Razzak — told reporters they would seek compensation from Britain, which occupied Iraq for decades after the country was established following World War I.

The beatings allegedly occurred during a violent protest in Amarah by hundreds of people demanding jobs. Six people were killed and 11 injured, according to reports then.

“I was one of 250 unemployed people demonstrating in the street in 2004, but when we reached the governor's office we were surprised by the presence of the British forces,” Shaker said. “We started throwing stones at them because we believed that they were behind all our misery.”

Shaker said British troops “were beating us with fists and batons and were kicking us” before taking the prisoners to a British base “where they also beat us and frightened us with dogs before releasing us before sunset.”

He said he didn't report the treatment because he didn't think officials would listen.

“Those troops humiliated us,” Shaker said.

Hussein Tells Court He's On A Hunger Strike (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2006

BAGHDAD — Saddam Hussein and his co-defendants said in court today that they have embarked on a jailhouse hunger strike to protest their trial on charges of violating the human rights of Shiite Muslim villagers.

"For the past three days, we've been on a hunger strike against you and your masters," Hussein, dressed in his crisp black suit and appearing more subdued than usual, told the judge as he walked into the courtroom.

Again today, the prosecution stumbled and struggled as it sought to tie Hussein and his entourage to the horrific acts of violence and cruelty inflicted upon the villagers of Dujayl after a 1982 attempt to assassinate Hussein while he visited the town.

Three witnesses compelled to testify repeatedly contradicted written statements collected by chief investigator Raid Juhi, the young lawyer who has become the public spokesman for the Iraqi High Tribunal.

After a session that barely clocked three hours, the judge adjourned the trial until Feb. 28 without giving any reason for the two-week recess.

Western officials close to the tribunal have candidly voiced frustration at the trial's slow pace, and the sense that judges have little awareness of the financial and human resources expended each time the proceedings drag on.

Three defendants, Hussein, his half brother Barzan Ibrahim Hasan and former judicial chief Awad Hamed Bandar, said they were on a hunger strike.

Juhi, speaking to reporters after the court adjourned, declined to confirm or deny whether any defendants were refusing to eat. But he pointed out that Hasan had brought bottled water with him into the courtroom.

Defendants have been using the trial as a stage for political antics, and today was no exception. Toward the end of the session, Hussein lambasted the "Americans and Zionists" and, in a segment that was edited, the version broadcast to viewers with a 20-minute delay urged Iraqis to fight the "occupier."

"I urge Iraqis that everyone should fight and defend his country," he said.

The proceedings have been conducted with court-appointed defense attorneys ever since Hussein and his allies' lawyers walked out of the courtroom several weeks ago. Defendants, some of them disheveled, were ordered to appear in the courtroom Monday.

The prosecution team alleges that Hussein and his underlings directed a years-long campaign of torture, imprisonment and execution against the men, women and children of Dujayl.

The five former regime loyalists, compelled to take the witness stand over the past two days, have been able to corroborate few of the prosecutions claims — or even verify documents they have signed.

Prosecutors attempted to use the first witness, a former officer who testified anonymously, to place former intelligence chief Hasan at the agency's Baghdad headquarters the night of the Dujayl incident.

But he repeatedly said he wasn't at the scene, and had only "heard" Hasan was directing operations there against the Shiite village 40 miles to the north.

"Everyone in the department knows that the head of the intelligence directorate is responsible for such actions and leading everything," he told the court. "Everyone on the street knows that."

Afterward, Hasan gave his own version, claiming he obtained the release of 80 people who had been wrongly detained by authorities.

He said he didn't want a repeat of what happened when the late Syrian leader Hafez Assad was the victim of an assassination attempt.

"There was only one thing on my mind," said Hasan, who wore the same rumpled long-sleeve undershirt he wore in court Monday. "When Assad had an attempt against his life, they took helicopters, the army, and took revenge. I said to myself, 'I should not act the same. I should not be violent.'"

One witness, Fadhel Azzawi, a former Iraqi ambassador to Moscow and intelligence official, said he didn't know what was in the statement that Juhi presented to him to sign.

"I signed because I didn't have my eyeglasses," he said. "I didn't see the word. I told [Juhi], 'Frankly, I didn't see what I was signing.' "

Hussein Tells Tribunal He Is On A Hunger Strike (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez And Omar Fekeiki

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Feb. 14 -- Saddam Hussein on Tuesday told the court overseeing his case that he had started a hunger strike in protest of the tribunal's new chief judge, who has vowed to stop the outbursts that have frequently interrupted the former Iraqi dictator's trial.

In an otherwise subdued session, Hussein told Judge Raouf Rasheed Abdel-Rahman that he had not eaten in three days, and three of his co-defendants said they also had refused to eat. Court authorities would not confirm whether Hussein was really on a hunger strike.

During testimony Tuesday, three former officials of Hussein's government pleaded ignorance when questioned about the killing of more than 140 Iraqis from the town of Dujail after a failed assassination attempt against Hussein there in 1982.

The trial will resume Feb. 28.

The court's chief investigative judge, Raeed Juhi, called the hunger strike claim "an administrative problem" at a news conference following the session. "The court is trying to find out and is working to solve it with the responsible authorities who keep the accused in custody," he said.

While the court investigated Hussein and his co-defendants, ordinary Iraqis reckoned with the chaos that has followed his overthrow by a U.S.-led coalition in 2003. Gunmen killed at least nine farmers from the same family and wounded two others in the city of Balad, about 50 miles north of Baghdad, Iraqi police and hospital officials said Tuesday.

Police Lt. Basim Baldawi said armed men in two cars opened fire on the victims while they were working on their farm. News service reports of the same attack said 11 people had been killed, including a 5-year-old boy. Among the dead was Hussein Sarhan Hiyali, a tribal leader in the predominantly Shiite area, according to the reports.

At least five other Iraqis across the country were killed in mortar and gunfire attacks Tuesday, including an Iraqi army major and his son, according to statements by U.S. and Iraqi military authorities.

The latest session of Hussein's trial was among the calmest of the dozen held so far, possibly a result of Abdel-Rahman's stern warnings that disorder in the court would no longer be tolerated. Though Hussein entered the courtroom calling out, "Long live the holy warriors!" and told Abdel-Rahman to hit himself in the head with his gavel, he was silent for much of the proceedings.

Hussein's half brother, Barzan Ibrahim, who attended court for the second day wearing his pajamas, took up the spotlight. Looking like an overgrown child in the adult-size crib that houses the defendants, the former intelligence chief waved a water bottle and pointedly reminded Abdel-Rahman that "I am not your servant."

Ibrahim also spoke for the first time about what he had done after finding out about the assassination attempt in Dujail, a town north of Baghdad. He said he had released 80 people who had been wrongfully detained by police and apologized to each of them.

"There was only one thing in my mind," Ibrahim said. When an attempt was made on the life of Hafez Assad, then the president of Syria, he said, "they took helicopters, the army, and took revenge. I said to myself, 'I should not act the same. I should not be violent.' "

In previous sessions, witnesses have described brutal abuse at the hands of Ibrahim's agents following the Dujail incident. On Tuesday prosecutors tried, largely without success, to link Ibrahim and Hussein to documents related to the massacre. All three of the day's witnesses -- a former provincial governor, a secretary to Hussein and an anonymous intelligence officer -- testified that they knew nothing about what happened after the assassination attempt.

"You were so close to the defendant Saddam Hussein, and yet you do not know anything about it?" the prosecuting judge asked Hamed Youssef Hamadi, who served as a secretary to Hussein.

"Yes, I swore an oath to tell the truth, and that is the truth," Hamadi answered.

Elsewhere in Iraq, residents of Basra and Baqubah demonstrated against the British presence in the country two days after the release of a video depicting British soldiers beating a group of teenage Iraqis. The Basra city council said it was cutting off all cooperation with coalition forces because of the video, according to Maj. Peter Cripps, a British military spokesman.

It was the second time in recent weeks that tension has flared between the British and the government of Basra in southern Iraq. The council recently protested the British detention of several local police officers. The British said they detained the officers because of suspected connections to the Shiite militias that have infiltrated the police in Basra.

In London, the British defense minister announced Tuesday that three people had been arrested in connection with the video. The BBC said Cpl. Martin Webster of the 1st Battalion, Light Infantry, was among those arrested. Webster is apparently the man who shot the footage and is heard taunting the teenagers as they are beaten, the news service reported.

Hussein, Gleeful, Badgers The Judge And Declares A Hunger Strike Over His Treatment (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Feb. 14 — A defiant Saddam Hussein marched into court on Tuesday and declared that he and his co-defendants had begun a hunger strike to protest their treatment by those overseeing their trial.

Mr. Hussein, dressed in a dark suit and appearing more composed than he had the previous day, went on to insult the presiding judge and smile gleefully at impish exchanges between his half-brother, Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, and the prosecutor's three reluctant witnesses, all formerly senior officials under Mr. Hussein.

"We have been on a hunger strike for the past three days in protest of the treatment by you and your masters," Mr. Hussein said to Judge Raouf Abdel-Rahman, who was appointed last month to replace a judge who had resigned. As the exchange heated up, the judge rapped on the table to call the court to order, prompting Mr. Hussein to say, "You should knock your head with your gavel."

Later, Mr. Ibrahim, draped in a white undershirt, said, "I've been on strike for the past few days. You brought me here in my pajamas."

Mr. Hussein and Mr. Ibrahim both appeared robust, with Mr. Ibrahim going off on lengthy, meandering monologues and talking down to the judge and witnesses. Mr. Hussein did not put forward any conditions for ending his hunger strike. Asked about the strike, a spokesman for the court said it was looking into the circumstances.

"The administrative side is trying to find out about this issue and find a way to solve it," the spokesman, Raad Juhi, said after the Tuesday session. "As you have seen yourself, the accused are in good health and Barzan had bottled water."

Mr. Hussein's comments represented his latest attempt to disrupt a trial that has been plagued by political in-fighting, assassinations of lawyers and a judge, and ambiguous witness testimony. Earlier this month, Mr. Hussein and the main co-defendants were ejected from the court by Judge Abdel-Rahman for boisterous behavior. They then pledged to boycott the trial, missed several sessions and only reappeared on Monday after being coerced back into the courtroom.

Human rights observers have raised new concerns about the credibility of the trial, given the fact that the defendants' lawyers have also decided to boycott the proceedings, forcing the court to appoint substitute lawyers for Mr. Hussein and the other defendants.

On Tuesday, the prosecutor's three witnesses appeared reluctant to testify, and their statements failed to bolster any case against Mr. Hussein. The prosecution is trying to prove that Mr. Hussein and the other seven defendants were responsible for the torture and executions of 148 men and boys in the Shiite village of Dujail, where a small group of men tried to assassinate Mr. Hussein in 1982. The prosecutors must establish a chain of command that clearly links Mr. Hussein and his colleagues to the torture and killings.

The three-hour session on Tuesday ended at 2:45 p.m. and was adjourned until Feb. 28.

The session took place as violence exploded in parts of central and northern Iraq, resulting in at least 15 deaths on Tuesday. Crowds in the south protested the mistreatment of detainees by British soldiers, prompted by the release of a video last week showing British soldiers kicking and beating several young Iraqi men during a demonstration in January 2004 in the southern city of Amara. The British government has vowed to investigate and has arrested at least one soldier.

The provincial council of the southern port city of Basra said Tuesday that the council was severing ties with the British forces, which control the far south. In Basra, animosity toward the British has been growing in the last several months over attempts by the British to arrest Iraqi police officers suspected of having ties to hostile militias, and attacks against the British military have been on the rise.

Much of the violence has been attributed to members of the Mahdi Army, the militia that answers to the firebrand Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

On Tuesday afternoon, thousands of protesters flooded Basra's streets to call for the British to cede responsibility for security to Iraqi forces. Leaders in Basra also called for a boycott of Danish goods, in retaliation for the satirical cartoons depicting the Prophet Muhammad that first appeared in a Danish newspaper last September and have ignited outrage across the Islamic world.

The deadliest attack on Tuesday took place at 7 a.m. outside the predominantly Shiite town of Balad, where gunmen in two cars opened fire on a group of farmers, killing at least 11 and wounding at least two, an Interior Ministry official said.

In the evening, a mortar shell landed on a house in the predominantly Sunni Arab neighborhood of Ghazaliya, killing two civilians, the official said. Another round landed on a house in the Sunni area of Jihad, injuring two.

In the town of Taji, north of Baghdad, gunmen killed an Iraqi Army major and his son on Tuesday morning, the American military said. A police colonel was shot dead on Monday evening in southern Baghdad as he was shopping, the Interior Ministry official said. Also on Monday, the police discovered four bodies in two areas of Baghdad; all of the dead had been handcuffed, blindfolded and shot in the head.

A similar body was found Tuesday morning in the town of Latifiya, an insurgent stronghold south of Baghdad.

Iraqi and American officials have been hoping that the trial of Mr. Hussein would help quell some of the violence, by demonstrating that Mr. Hussein and his co-defendants are broken men. Instead, Mr. Hussein has used every opportunity to grandstand, inspiring fierce loyalty in some Sunni Arabs.

On Tuesday, as the trial got under way, Mr. Hussein exclaimed, "Long live the Arab nation!"

Saddam's Half Brother Denies Role In Killings (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, February 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0015217

BAGHDAD — Saddam Hussein's former intelligence chief, again wearing pajamas in court as a protest, on Tuesday became the first defendant in the ousted president's trial to speak at length about the charges of executions and imprisonment of Shiites in the 1980s.

Barzan Ibrahim, who is also Saddam's half brother, denied any part in the crackdown against residents of Dujail, a mainly Shiite town north of Baghdad, after a 1982 assassination attempt against Saddam there.

Speaking in an orderly way from the defendants' pen, Ibrahim said he went to Dujail on the day that gunmen opened fire on Saddam's motorcade, then returned to the village the following day. He claimed he ordered the release of more than 80 detainees held in the town.

"I released all the detainees inside the hall — more than 80 persons. I swear to God I said goodbye to them one by one and apologized," he said.

After those two visits, Ibrahim continued, "I never heard of Dujail ever again. I never got a report on it. It was all handed over to the General Security Services," a separate agency.

In previous sessions, some prosecution witnesses — Dujail residents arrested in the crackdown — have testified that Ibrahim was personally involved in torturing them.

If convicted in the killing of nearly 150 Shiites from Dujail, Saddam and his seven co-defendants could face death by hanging.

In a show-stealing gesture earlier Tuesday, Saddam and three co-defendants, including Ibrahim, said they have launched a hunger strike to protest the chief judge in their trial.

Saddam said he had not eaten in three days, while Ibrahim said he had been on strike for two days. Two other defendants, Awad Bandar and former vice president Taha Yassin Ramadan, also said they were on a hunger strike.

Their claims could not be independently confirmed. Although the defendants are in Iraq's legal custody, they are being held in a U.S. military detention facility. No comment was immediately available from the U.S. military.

Since the trial began, Saddam and Ibrahim have expressed only contempt for the court, interrupting it with outbursts, arguments and insults.

Tuesday's session began in much the same way. Saddam entered and shouted his support for Iraqi insurgents, yelling "Long live the mujahedin!" Later, during the testimony, he shouted, "I say to all Iraqis: Fight and liberate your country!"

He argued with Chief Judge Raouf Abdel-Rahman, at one point telling the judge, "Hit your own head with that gavel."

Abdel-Rahman, who took over the court last month, has tried to impose order in a court where outbursts and abuse, mostly by Saddam and Ibrahim, have frequently overshadowed the proceedings.

After nearly three hours of testimony, Abdel-Rahman adjourned the trial until Feb. 28.

Army IG Reviewing Soldier's Death By Friendly Fire In Iraq (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

The Army inspector general's office has launched a review of a friendly-fire case at a security checkpoint in Iraq that claimed the life of a young Ohio soldier, Army officials said.

Spec. Jesse R. Buryj's death from a gunshot to the back led to a series of investigations by the United States and Poland. Soldiers from both countries were manning a traffic circle in Karbala in May 2004 when a suspicious dump truck crashed through barriers and ignored warnings to stop. A bullet hit Buryj, 21, as he fell from the turret of his Humvee after the truck -- which was carrying an unarmed driver and passenger -- collided with it during the nighttime incident.

Investigations determined Buryj most likely was hit by friendly fire. U.S. officials said Polish troops probably were responsible for his death, while Polish officials vehemently denied that their troops could have shot him. Critical evidence that could have answered the question was not collected, according to investigative reports.

Buryj's family, in Canton, Ohio, was told he died in a car accident. His parents did not learn the truth until nearly a year later, after they asked President Bush for help.

"The IG will review the matter to determine if proper policies and procedures were followed," said Col. Joseph Curtin, a top Army spokesman at the Pentagon. He said the review is not an official "investigation."

After The Washington Post published an article about Buryj's death last month, Polish officials privately complained to the Pentagon that they were unaware that the United States blamed Polish troops for the shooting. It was a rift U.S. officials sought to prevent early in their investigation, which cited the incident's international sensitivities.

"Because they didn't do a proper job after the accident, finding the truth now would be simply impossible," said Marek Purowski, a spokesman at the Polish Embassy, who noted that U.S. officials did not collect weapons in Iraq to compare with ballistics evidence from the bullet that hit Buryj. "It's not our doing, it's not our responsibility. It's not the first story where there are some differences. It happens, even among friends."

Peggy Buryj, Jesse's mother, said she met with Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) on Saturday morning and learned that Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey had assured him that an IG review is underway. Army officials confirmed the review this week but declined to elaborate.

"I don't know what they can do now, because it is what it is," Peggy Buryj said of her son's death, now nearly two years ago. "I don't have any faith that they're ever going to get to the bottom of it. I just want them to admit that things weren't right. I'd like an apology. I have no expectations now."

Peggy Buryj, who met Bush on a campaign stop in 2004 and was asked to appear in a Bush campaign commercial before the election, said no one from the Bush administration has contacted her since her son's story became public. An Army casualty assistance officer called her to offer a meeting with the medical examiner who handled her son's case, but she said she wants access to higher-ranking officials.

Iraqi Premier Outlines His Plans For A More Inclusive Government (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi And Raheem Salman

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2006

BAGHDAD — Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari outlined plans Tuesday to build a broad-based government to tackle the country's woeful security conditions.

Jafari, newly named as his Shiite Muslim coalition's candidate to continue leading the country for the next four years, faced widespread criticism for being ineffective and controlling during his 10-month tenure as the country's top executive. He acknowledged his previous administration's weaknesses and vowed to listen to those outside his political circle in forming a government.

"Any failure or frustration about a minister will be reflected on the government as a whole," he told reporters. "Any party in the government has the right and duty to discuss candidates. No doubt, we will consider all the different parties which form the parliament."

Jafari did not spell out any major proposed changes for his administration, but said he would tighten the screws on ministers, who he suggested had been spending too much time out of the country.

"The manner of work, the pace, the centralization of the government … all will witness a qualitative leap," he said.

Jafari, a 58-year-old physician and theologian who has been active in Islamic politics for four decades, faces daunting challenges. Skeptical political blocs already are allying against him. Followers of Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr within Jafari's coalition demand more radical measures from the government.

The coalition made Jafari its choice for prime minister by a single vote in an election Sunday.

His work will proceed amid sectarian violence that claimed at least 11 lives Tuesday in the Shiite city of Balad, where gunmen attacked a group of farmers. Several large roadside bombs rocked the capital, injuring half a dozen Iraqis.

Jafari said that improving the country's dire security circumstances would be his top priority. But many Iraqis and Western officials regard his government as part of the problem. Another faction in his coalition, followers of Shiite cleric Abdelaziz Hakim, has control of the Interior Ministry, which members of the Sunni Muslim minority have accused of spawning death squads.

The Shiite coalition, which controls 130 of the 275 seats in parliament, cannot form a government without a two-thirds majority of lawmakers and needs to build a coalition with Kurds, secular Iraqis or Sunni Arabs.

Kurdish leaders opposed Jafari and have complicated his task of assembling a government. They say Jafari didn't grant President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, more than a ceremonial role and failed to invoke a constitutional article calling for the return of dispossessed Kurds to the oil-rich city of Kirkuk.

Jafari said he felt sympathy for the displaced Kurds but urged patience.

"We have a constitution and a law," he said. "My success, values and morals aren't based on my feelings but on how well I can apply the constitution and the law."

Now Kurds say they won't form a government without the participation of the Iraqi National List, the coalition of former Prime Minister Iyad Allawi, a secular Shiite.

"We think that it's important not to exclude anybody," Talabani said Tuesday at a news conference with Hakim. "We believe the Iraqi List has struggled against Saddam Hussein and includes many individuals who struggled against the tyrant regime."

Sunni Arabs, with 55 seats in the parliament, and Allawi's followers have allied to form a bloc with the goal of preventing Shiites and Kurds from remaking Iraq as a country divided into federal regions. Their alliance could complicate efforts by Jafari to draw at least some Sunnis into a ruling coalition.

The Shiite Choice (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

It's become a cliche in some circles that Iraq won't be ready for "Jeffersonian" democracy any time soon. And maybe not. But the more we watch the political developments that the U.S. is fostering in Iraq, the more we see the kind of compromise and debate that are crucial to democratic progress.

The latest news is the orderly election this weekend of Ibrahim al-Jaafari as the Shiite Alliance's candidate to serve as Prime Minister for the next four years. Mr. Jaafari has been Prime Minister since the election of Iraq's interim government in January 2005, and he won the permanent nod by a single vote over Adel Abdel Mahdi of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (Sciri). Mr. Mahdi, in turn, gracefully accepted defeat and congratulated Mr. Jaafari. "You should console me in this situation," Mr. Jaafari replied. "This is a big burden and a position of difficulties." He's certainly right about the latter.

Mr. Jaafari has been criticized as a weak leader. But to be fair, his government has only had a short time in office and has suffered from the stigma of being temporary. If he now goes on to win approval by Iraq's full parliament, his legitimacy will not be questioned and he'll have a fairer chance to show what he can do.

Though not the most inspiring of political personalities, Mr. Jaafari is well-liked by the Iraqi public and by his fellow political leaders. He delegates power and is willing to trust the skills of those around him. He has also never been associated with even a hint of corruption. And far from being a reformed Baathist, he has an untainted record of courageous opposition to Saddam Hussein's regime.

Of all the Shiite Alliance's conceivable choices for the post, Mr. Jaafari is also the least beholden to Iran. U.S. diplomats seemed to favor Mr. Mahdi for some reason. But unlike Sciri, Mr. Jaafari and his Dawa Party don't seem dependent on Tehran and are unquestionably indigenous Iraqi patriots.

Mr. Jaafari can also call upon a strong team already in office. We're particularly impressed with Defense Minister Saddoun Dulaimi, a Sunni brought in by the Shiite Alliance despite the Sunni boycott of the January 2005 vote. Mr. Dulaimi has overseen the growth of the Iraqi Army into a better fighting force and he is also uncorrupt and free of any ties to the Sunni insurgents. Another face who could return is Deputy Prime Minister Ahmed Chalabi. Although he didn't win a seat after leaving the Shiite Alliance to lead his own slate for December's vote, he has a good working relationship with Mr. Jaafari, as well as managerial skills and knowledge of financial markets.

Some degree of continuity will be important. The U.S. decision to cashier the postwar Governing Council in favor of Ayad Allawi and a team of unknowns in June 2004 -- only to see Mr. Jaafari and the Governing Council's other leaders win Iraq's first two elections -- was unnecessarily disruptive and delayed the development of Iraqi institutions. The exception here is the Interior Ministry, which Mr. Jaafari delegated to Sciri and which has been credibly accused of mistreating some Sunni prisoners. That has to be cleaned up.

Speaking of Mr. Allawi, we hope he will stay in Iraq to lead the loyal opposition if he doesn't get a post in the new government. Many secular-minded Iraqis gave their votes to Mr. Allawi believing he was the U.S.-favored candidate, and they deserve a strong voice in parliament.

But whatever happens on that front, we trust that the closely divided vote in favor of Mr. Jaafari will allay Western fears of Iraq's domination by a monolithic, Iranian-linked Shiite bloc. The Shiite Alliance is a very uneasy coalition that includes leaders like Mr. Jaafari, Sciri's Abdul Aziz al-Hakim and rebel cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, who don't always get along.

And watching them all as a source of moral authority is the Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, who has also shown himself to be an Iraqi patriot who opposes the imposition of an Iranian-style clerical government. In any case, the Alliance lacks the two-thirds majority in parliament to impose its will, so compromise with Kurdish, Sunni and secular Shiites will be essential to successful governance.

Mr. Jaafari's nomination for Prime Minister is the latest positive step in Iraqi political development -- which includes two elections, negotiations to write a new and liberal constitution and a successful referendum on that document. We'll let the cynics decided if this qualifies as "Jeffersonian," or merely Iraqi pragmatism, but whatever it is we'll call it progress.

Quick Rise For Purveyors Of Propaganda In Iraq (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 — Two years ago, Christian Bailey and Paige Craig were living in a half-renovated Washington group house, with a string of failed startup companies behind them.

Mr. Bailey, a boyish-looking Briton, and Mr. Craig, a chain-smoking former Marine sergeant, then began winning multimillion-dollar contracts with the United States military to produce propaganda in Iraq.

Now their company, Lincoln Group, works out of elegant offices along Pennsylvania Avenue and sponsors polo matches in Virginia horse country. Mr. Bailey recently bought a million-dollar Georgetown row house. Mr. Craig drives a Jaguar and shows up for interviews accompanied by his "director of security," a beefy bodyguard.

The company's rise, though, has been built in part by exaggerated claims about its abilities and connections, according to interviews with more than a dozen current and former Lincoln Group employees and associates, and a review of company documents.

In collecting government money, Lincoln has followed a blueprint taught to Mr. Bailey by Daniel S. Peña Sr., a retired American businessman who described Mr. Bailey as a protégé.

Federal contracts in Washington can supply easy seed capital for a struggling entrepreneur, Mr. Peña says he advised a youthful Mr. Bailey in the mid-1990's when the two men started a short-lived technology company. "I told him, 'When in trouble, go to D.C.,' and the kid listened," Mr. Peña said.

Mr. Bailey defends his company's record, saying, "Lincoln Group successfully executes challenging assignments." He added that "teams are created from the best available resources."

Lincoln won its contracts after claiming to have partnerships with major media and advertising companies, former government officials with extensive Middle East experience, and ex-military officers with background in intelligence and psychological warfare, the documents show. But some of those companies and individuals say their associations were fleeting.

Lincoln has also run into problems delivering on work for the military after its partnerships with more experienced firms fell apart, company documents and interviews indicate. The firm has continued to bid for new business from the Pentagon and has hired two Washington lobbying firms to promote itself on Capitol Hill and with the Bush administration.

"They appear very professional on the surface, then you dig a little deeper and you find that they are pretty amateurish," said Jason Santamaria, a former Marine officer whom the company once described as a "strategic adviser."

The company's work in Iraq, where Mr. Bailey and Mr. Craig visit from time to time to direct operations, is facing growing scrutiny.

The Pentagon's inspector general last month opened an audit of Lincoln Group's contracts there, according to two Defense Department officials. A separate inquiry ordered by Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq, after disclosures late last year that Lincoln Group paid Iraqi publications to run one-sided stories by American soldiers, has been completed but not made public, military officials said.

A spokesman for General Casey, Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, declined to comment on Lincoln Group, citing the ongoing investigation.

In interviews, Mr. Bailey, 30, and Mr. Craig, 31, said they had succeeded by anticipating the military's need for help communicating with and influencing the Iraqi public, just as the insurgency was building. "We saw that it was very hard for the U.S. to do that work," Mr. Bailey said. "They didn't do media and outreach very well. We had local offices in a tough environment where traditional U.S. contractors would not operate."

He disputed suggestions that Lincoln had experienced difficulty delivering on work for the military, saying the firm had "successfully executed" more than 20 contracts from the Defense Department.

Lincoln's roster of advisers and other businesses assisting it has continually changed, Mr. Craig said, because "our work in often hostile environments has occasionally proved to be too risky or challenging for some of our partners."

Little in Mr. Bailey's background indicated he would end up doing propaganda work in Iraq. Born in Britain as Christian Jozefowicz, he changed his name when he graduated from Oxford University and moved to San Francisco during the late-1990's dot-com boom.

There he founded or advised several companies and plunged into the Silicon Valley social scene, according to Mr. Bailey and several friends and former business associates. Among the companies were Express Action, a company that planned to develop an Internet service to calculate duties on overseas purchases, and Motion Power, which intended to invent a shoe that would generate its own electrical power to run portable consumer devices.

"You would have been proud had you seen this 23-year-old kid pitching, with no product, no customers, no business plan," Mr. Bailey wrote in a letter to Mr. Peña, describing how he raised $15 million from investors for Express Action.

Mr. Bailey later moved to New York and sought investors for an investment fund, according to documents filed with the National Futures Association. In 2003, he moved to Washington.

Mr. Craig's path to the capital began when he dropped out of West Point to pursue, he says, his interests in business and national security.

Enlisting in the Marines in 1995, he began working in military intelligence. He earned an undergraduate degree in information technology while stationed in Okinawa and Australia through the University of Maryland and a masters in business administration from National University, which runs academic programs on military bases. He left the Marines in 2000.

By 2004, Mr. Bailey had moved into Mr. Craig's house near downtown Washington, and the two had formed the company that eventually became Lincoln Group.

Their original goal was to make money exploiting Iraq's most obvious surplus — its shattered infrastructure. But those efforts faltered.

A project to export scrap metal fell apart after the Iraqi government banned scrap exports in 2004, Mr. Bailey said. A pile of scrap metal, purchased with a loan from an Indonesian bank, has been sitting in Basra ever since, according to two ex-employees. Like several other former Lincoln workers, they asked to remain anonymous because they had signed confidentiality agreements with the company or still dealt with the firm.

Lincoln also spent about $50,000 for two portable brick-making machines from Texas. The company had hoped to set up a brick plant near Mosul, where the demand for construction materials was vast, according to a presentation Mr. Bailey made to potential investors in Dubai. The machines, though, were principally designed for homeowners or small contractors. Lincoln would not comment on the project.

Eventually, Lincoln began working with the American military, which was spending millions on contractors for a broad range of services. The firm rented a one-story house inside the Green Zone, the heavily fortified government compound in central Baghdad. Furnished with two sofas and a sheet of plywood that served as a desk, the house had a single telephone and an overloaded electrical outlet.

Lincoln formed a partnership with The Rendon Group, a Washington company with close ties to the Bush administration, and won a $5 million Pentagon contract to help inform Iraqis about the American-led effort to defeat the insurgency and form a new government. One contract requirement was to get Iraqi publications to run articles written by the military, according to several ex-Lincoln employees.

Rendon soon dropped out and Lincoln handled the contract alone. But the company had fewer than two dozen workers and little experience with public relations, according to several ex-employees.

Problems arose from the start. In a 2004 briefing to the military, Lincoln conceded that it was "not yet fully staffed" and that "media monitoring software" required by the contract was "not ready."

And the government did not provide that much work at first. The military's public affairs office produced only a few articles a day during that period, one Lincoln ex-employee said. A small State Department contract to assist small businesses had just been cancelled, he said, and the firm was having difficulty making its payroll.

Lincoln lacked the armored vehicles or security guards employed by more established contractors. When venturing outside the Green Zone, employees would grab weapons and climb into one of two beat-up Proton sedans, which employees were told were chosen to blend in with dilapidated Iraqi vehicles on the streets.

After winning a small contract from the Marines to do polling, the company hired Iraqis to go door-to-door in Anbar Province with questionnaires. To protect themselves from possible insurgent reprisals, they were told to say they were working for an Iraqi university, according to a former Lincoln employee.

Last August, gunmen came to the home of one of the Iraqi workers, killing him and three others, according to an ex-employee. Mr. Bailey said it was not clear whether the killing was related to the polling, but the company decided to move a Lincoln office staffed by Iraqis in downtown Baghdad to a less noticeable location.

Back in the United States, Mr. Bailey and Mr. Craig worked to drum up more business.

In late 2004, Mr. Craig traveled to Fort Bragg, N.C., to meet with officers of the 18th Airborne Corps, which was preparing take over management of Lincoln's public affairs contract in Iraq, according to a former employee and company documents. Despite the problems with the existing work, Lincoln said it could assist the military in the more secretive realm of "information operations," according to a transcript of the briefing. Unlike public affairs work, information operations are meant to influence and help defeat foreign adversaries, using deception, if necessary.

The briefing also touted the firm's "strategic advisers," including Mr. Santamaria, the former Marine officer, who received a master's degree from the Wharton business school and was co-author of a business book called "The Marine Corps Way."

Mr. Santamaria said he reviewed several investment proposals for Lincoln during a two-week association in late 2004. But after becoming "concerned about their methods," he said, "I severed ties with them as quickly as I could."

A Lincoln spokesman, William Dixon, said "it was a mistake" to include Mr. Santamaria's name in the December briefing because he was no longer affiliated with the company.

Lincoln may simply have been following another principle taught by Mr. Peña. "How do you create an instant track record?" Mr. Peña says he told Mr. Bailey. "You joint-venture with someone who has a track record."

Early last summer, military commanders made Lincoln Group the main civilian contractor for carrying out an aggressive propaganda campaign in Anbar Province, known as the Western Mission project. Over the next several months, the military transferred tens of millions of dollars to Lincoln for the project, records show.

The company hired dozens of employees, including academics and former military personnel, as well as hundreds of contract workers in Iraq and elsewhere, a number that fluctuates by contract requirements, according to Mr. Dixon, the Lincoln spokesman.

With the new duties came substantial new requirements, including producing television and radio ads, buying newspaper ads and placing many more articles in the Iraqi press. The military also approved paying Iraqi editors to run stories, according to ex-Lincoln employees.

Lincoln also enlisted the New York advertising executive Jerry Della Femina, chairman of Della Femina Rothschild Jeary & Partners. Mr. Della Femina said he was introduced to Mr. Craig last spring by a Washington lobbyist.

Mr. Della Femina said his firm "did a great deal of work" on advertising ideas for Lincoln to present to the military's Special Operations Command, which last summer was soliciting bids for contracts, potentially worth millions, for psychological operations.

Lincoln listed Mr. Della Femina as a "creative director" in materials presented last spring at a meeting with Special Operations officers in Tampa. But Mr. Della Femina said his firm pulled out before executing any of the ideas. Three months after ending the collaboration, Mr. Della Femina said, he discovered that Lincoln's Web site listed him as one of its partners.

"I was surprised that they had our name on their Web site in the first place," he said.

After he asked that his name be removed, Mr. Craig said, "we honored his request within the week."

By that time, Lincoln had already been notified by Special Operations Command that it and two other companies had been chosen to compete for work under the contract.

Lincoln later told Special Operations Command that one of its principal subcontractors was Omnicom Group Inc. of New York, an advertising and marketing conglomerate. A proposal signed by Mr. Bailey in October said Lincoln "has exploited the extensive experience and expertise of the Omnicom Group."

But Pat Sloan, an Omnicom spokeswoman, said she could find no evidence it has ever worked with Lincoln Group. "We're not aware of any relationship with Lincoln Group," she said. She noted that Omnicom had once owned 49 percent of Mr. Della Femina's agency but had sold the stake in early 2005. Michael J. Jeary, president of Mr. Della Femina's agency, said Lincoln's claim of Omnicom as a subcontractor was an "honest mistake" because he had never told the firm Omnicom had sold its minority stake.

Although Lincoln Group's work in Iraq is now under scrutiny in two Pentagon investigations, the firm is hunting for more government work. Last month, Mr. Bailey attended a going-away reception at the Virginia condominium of a mid-level government employee on her way to a new job at the American Embassy in Baghdad. Her job: overseeing contracts.

Around Iraq In 4 Days (LAT)

By Doug Smith

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2006

BAGHDAD — U.S. Army historian Sherman Fleek came to Iraq to write the official record of postwar reconstruction. With thousands of projects underway across the country, there was a sense of urgency to his research.

From Baghdad, he decided, his first venture would be to head north to review work on an academy for Iraqi army officer candidates in Mosul. He gave himself two days to get there, do the research and return, figuring that would be sufficient for the 450-mile round-trip in a Black Hawk helicopter cruising at 145 mph.

But Fleek, a retired lieutenant colonel who teaches military history, was about to become acquainted with the awesome complexity of the system that moves soldiers around a war zone the size of California. With the roads too dangerous for routine travel, about 100 helicopters serve as taxis for soldiers and civilians on U.S. business, carrying them to and from scores of far-flung bases with names like Courage, Danger, Liberty and War Horse.

There are no flight schedules. For security reasons, the military does not disclose details on the number of flights or routes. The Army press office in Baghdad says routes are made up daily in response to need. Any flight can be canceled on short notice because of combat action.

The transit system is a hybrid of military and civilian styles, with hundreds of contract employees working alongside men and women in uniform in makeshift flight operations offices. Passenger manifests are drawn up by computer, but the flights are posted on whiteboards.

If your name is on the list, you will usually get a seat. But most travelers are like Fleek, flying "space available," the military equivalent of "standby."

Because the carrier is the U.S. Army and not JetBlue, a simple ride from Point A to Point B can be a gantlet of inscrutable procedures, unbelievable discomforts, lose-lose choices and long, cold waits.

14:30 Saturday. Baghdad.

Fleek's mission begins at Landing Zone Washington, a field of concrete in the fortified Green Zone, where Black Hawks swoop down in pairs all day long, like airport limousines.

A distant roar announces the arrival of Fleek's flight. Two dark shapes appear in the hazy winter sky, hover, and gently sink to the pavement, unleashing a blast of wind that rips at clothing and obliterates speech.

The flight crews, two members to a helicopter, slide back the passenger doors and beckon to Fleek, another civilian and more than a dozen soldiers. A small group was in Baghdad for a conference. Others are heading back to their posts after leave. One by one they clamber up, swinging M-16s, duffle bags, backpacks and other odd-sized boxes of weaponry and personal belongings.

It takes nearly 20 minutes, blades whirring the whole time, to get passengers snuggled into the helicopters, four each to a bank of canvas sling seats. Baggage is piled in the cavity between the copter's machine guns, on the floor between the riders and on their laps. Further burdened by 30-pound body armor and helmets, the passengers can do little but move their hands. The whine of engines and the battering sound of blades preclude conversation.

Everyone stares ahead blankly, some no doubt pondering the risks ahead. More than 30 U.S. military helicopters have gone down over Iraq since 2003.

The Black Hawks lift off in unison. Cruising about 200 feet off the ground, they afford a dizzying picture of Baghdad rooftops, then fields and mud-and-stone villages. Twenty minutes later, they touch down for refueling. With hand signals, the flight crews direct all passengers to a waiting area behind a concrete wall for 10 minutes.

The next leg is just a hop from the fueling stop to the landing zone on the other side of Forward Operating Base Balad, a transit crossroad north of Baghdad and the end of the line for the flight.

Two hours of daylight left Saturday. FOB Balad. Distance traveled: 45 miles.

Fleek, a former Army helicopter pilot who has lost the battle of the midline but still retains a stride worthy of Gen. Patton, follows the others down a muddy road to the flight operations office in a trailer under camouflage. A young woman behind the counter checks her computer and gives Fleek the bad news. The next flight to Mosul will not be until the next morning, at 08:20.

For such situations, a bus from the flight operations center drives the stranded to a distant barracks for the night. But with a savvy honed by 27 years in the Army, Fleek does better. He chats up some public affairs officers from the flight. Their hospitality includes a semiprivate bunk, an evening of spirited conversation and a wake-up knock.

The knock comes at 06:00. Check-in is 06:50, apparently leaving time for a stroll to the dining facility before the 08:20 flight. When Fleek returns to the flight office at 07:20, the other passengers are gone. There was a 07:10 roll call, and then they were all bused to the landing zone.

"Wait right here," commands a stern young woman with a walkie-talkie.

A few minutes later, a bus pulls up. When it reaches the landing pad, near a helicopter that is already loaded with its rotors turning, the flight chief gives Fleek a look that could be understood even through his black plastic visor: You're late. After that, Fleek would never leave line again.

The helicopters take off into brisk morning air that grows colder as they climb. There is a stop at FOB Speicher near Saddam Hussein's hometown, Tikrit, to let soldiers on and off. The final leg, over low mountain ranges and stretches of wheat fields, lasts a bone-aching two hours, then ends in a familiar pattern: A refueling stop and a short hop to the flight operations center at FOB Diamondback on the south side of Mosul.

Six hours of daylight left Sunday. Mosul. Distance traveled: 170 miles.

After an hour of futile dialing on a field telephone, Fleek finally gets through by e-mail to the Army Corps of Engineers' tiny detachment on the giant base. In a few moments, Master Sgt. Tawna Ayers, who had waited for Fleek the night before, arrives in a mud-splattered SUV.

Ayers drives Fleek to a trailer where she says he can make himself comfortable until the convoy arrives to take him to his destination, FOB Courage, on the north side of the city. He has missed the morning convoy. At 15:00, Fleek reaches Courage, with just enough time to get a bunk and dinner. There will be no more travel that day.

09:00 Monday. Mosul.

The trip to the officer training academy north of the city goes smoothly, and after a brief tour, Fleek is ready for the journey back. It is early afternoon, time enough, with luck, for a quick flight to Baghdad.

But instead of taking Fleek to the airfield, his convoy pulls into another base. Fleek will have to catch the afternoon shuttle from there back to Diamondback, a Stryker convoy leaving at 14:30.

The Stryker troop carrier is a heavily armored steel box on wheels with just enough headroom for soldiers to sit on two unpadded benches. A video monitor provides the only outside contact as the engine revs and the box lurches forward. Muscles strain to anticipate the jerking turns. Rumps turn numb before the 20-minute drive is over.

15:00 Monday.

FOB Diamondback. Distance traveled: 15 miles.

When the vehicle thuds to a stop, Ayers is waiting again. Fleek learns there are no more flights to Baghdad that day, the third day of his trip. But at 10:20 Tuesday, he can catch a one-hour flight on a C-130 transport plane.

"I'll take it," he said.

07:00 Tuesday. Mosul.

Fleek awakes in good spirits. But then he comes face to face with the one person who can make the difficult impossible: an unmotivated civilian contract employee.

"I need your passport and orders," the clerk says.

For the first time, Fleek's frustration boils over. Heatedly, he says he has flown halfway across Iraq without either. It makes no difference to the civilian.

In a flurry of cellphone calls, Ayers determines that orders can be produced.

But the clerk won't budge on the passport. Sometimes, he says, the flight skips Baghdad, and instead goes on to Kuwait. He says he has been chewed out before and he isn't going to let it happen again.

That leaves Fleek with two options: take a helicopter that afternoon back to Speicher outside Tikrit with the hope of a night connection to Baghdad, or wait a day for a Baghdad flight that might be full.

It's no choice, really. Fleek takes the bird in hand. Daylight is fading over Tikrit when the Black Hawk touches down on the pavement at Speicher.

17:00 Tuesday. FOB Speicher. Distance traveled: 120 miles.

Fleek strides into a cylindrical tent that houses flight operations and receives the usual good-news-bad-news. There is a flight at 19:00 to Balad, but the waiting list is overflowing with the names of soldiers stranded the night before.

Fleek gets a burger at the base's imitation Main Street of fast-food eateries and returns to flight operations.

In the darkness, he takes his place near the end of a line of 27, three more than the capacity of two Black Hawks, even if they arrive empty.

At 19:00, his spirits lift when a giant form descends from the night sky.

"It's a Chinook," Fleek says gleefully. "It holds 40 people."

The emotion is fleeting. Shouting over the jet whine and prop blast, the flight leader informs the ground crew that most of the space is filled with cargo and there is room for only a dozen passengers.

Fifteen don't make it, and Fleet is among them. They trudge with their gear back to the tent to find out when the next flight will be. Most are told it will be 21:00 the next day, more than 24 hours away. With polite acceptance, the soldiers step into the night to find their bunks.

The young operations officer is telling Fleek he should return at midnight to get his name at the top of the waiting list. But his luck suddenly turns. The flight leader of the Chinook appears at the door.

"I need three for Balad," he says in a tone that means, "Right now." Miraculously, Fleek has gone from last to first in line.

Minutes later, he is packed in the cold, dark chamber of the helicopter, immobile with soldiers on either side, their baggage forming a wall at their feet. Huge boxes loom in the rear. The rotors blow frigid gusts of wind through the fuselage, biting through Fleek's soft jacket.

The helicopter rises, then flies lumberingly, slower than a Black Hawk. In flight, the wind mercifully stops and the fuselage grows comfortably warm. Fleek gives a satisfied thumbs-up. He believes the goal is near.

Then the Chinook touches down.

"Kirkuk," the flight leader yelled.

18:30 Tuesday. Kirkuk. Distance traveled: 70 miles — in the wrong direction.

This is just a cargo stop. The bay door opens. Eerie shafts of light from a tractor's headlights illuminate the fuselage as half a dozen men struggle to unload boxes and put others in their place. The work goes on for 20 minutes. Again, the rotors are blowing bone-chilling wind over passengers staring silently at one another.

When the Chinook takes off, it makes a short hop to a refueling field, where the passengers sit motionless another 20 minutes.

Then it hops to another part of the base to let a soldier off.

One more hour in the air and Fleek lands in Balad.

22:00 Tuesday.

FOB Balad. Distance traveled: 105 miles.

First comes the cargo stop, with more shuffling of boxes, then Fleek finally is deposited at the flight operations shack he left three days earlier.

DOJ_NMG_0015225

He is told the next flight to Baghdad will leave at 07:10. He has missed dinner. There will be time for five hours of sleep and no chance for breakfast.

"I'll take it," he says.

The knock comes at 05:00. At 06:00, Fleek stands in the dark beside a blast wall. He waits an hour as the crew prepares the craft and day dawns over Balad.

The flight is cold but short.

08:10 Wednesday

Fleek steps onto the tarmac at Landing Zone Washington. His five-hour round-trip has taken four days.

Pass the tweezers

As one gun rights advocate describes the crime scene, James and Sarah Brady, founders of the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence, were "dancing in blood" after Vice President Dick Cheney's hunting accident over the weekend.

(Perhaps one day I'll write about a well-known Washington reporter who peppered a fellow columnist with shotgun blast after aiming low at an elusive bird.)

Mr. Brady, the former White House press secretary wounded alongside President Reagan by John Hinckley Jr., said after the vice president's embarrassing bird hunt: "Now I understand why Dick Cheney keeps asking me to go hunting with him."

Reacts Joe Waldron, executive director of the Citizens Committee for the Right to Keep and Bear Arms: "Only Jim Brady would be allowed by the mainstream press to make such a crude and crass comment and not be called down for it."

'Blood brothers'

On Feb. 3, the day she left for Iraq, Laura Ingraham received a phone call from Vice President Dick Cheney challenging the radio talk-show host to report what is "actually happening on the ground."

Back broadcasting from her Capitol Hill studio yesterday after one week on Iraqi soil, Miss Ingraham feels she accomplished that mission: meeting, interviewing and sharing meals with U.S. and Iraqi troops, Sunnis, Kurds and Shia alike.

At one point, described as a nationally syndicated radio first, she hosted a live call-in segment from Camp Victory in Baghdad, where a crowd of American soldiers talked one-on-one to an audience that listened in on 325 radio stations.

What stands out the most from her trip?

"The genuine brotherhood that I saw between the Iraqi forces and their American military trainers," the radio host told Inside the Beltway. "I mean, these guys are like blood brothers over there. You've even got Iraqi soldiers writing to the wives and families of the American military."

Otherwise, she points to a widespread fear among Iraqi citizens that U.S. troops will pull out of Iraq too soon and former dictator Saddam Hussein will regain power.

"It's a real concern," says Miss Ingraham, who is sympathetic to the fear. "I mean, come on, Saddam has made a travesty of his trial."

Soul lubricant

Greeks insist it was given to them by the goddess Athena. Thomas Jefferson said it was a gift from heaven. Former President George H.W. Bush didn't say where he thought the olive tree came from, but rest assured he likes olives so much that he stokes his martinis with four of the ovoid fruits.

Where are we going with this?

How about Iraq. Uncle Sam knows that the highest-quality olive production occurs in areas that have mild winters and long, hot, dry summers. So the U.S. Agency for International Development is helping establish olive orchards in eight regions of the war-torn country, seeing olive production as "a potentially important cash crop for Iraqi farmers."

We're told that USAID is helping Iraq's Ministry of Agriculture plant 16 demonstration orchards, using thousands of saplings that it hopes one day will branch into symbols of peace.

Food historian Patricia Solley, editor of SoupSong.com, says the "calming and healing properties" of olives have been documented since the beginning of time.

"In the Mideast, the story is told of Adam suffering from pain and complaining to God," she writes. "At that, Gabriel descended from heaven with an olive tree, presented it to Adam, and said, 'Plant it, then pick the fruit and press out its oil. It will cure your pain and all sickness.'

"Indeed, early Mideast civilizations believed it would cure every illness except death. And to this day, many drink half a cup of olive oil before breakfast to keep all systems well-lubricated," according to Mrs. Solley.

Where credit is due

"Where is the love, especially on Valentine's Day?" writes our friend Kevin McCauley, editor of the online version of O'Dwyer PR (odwyerpr.com), which monitors the public relations world from high atop New York's Madison Avenue.

Mr. McCauley, who frequently appears in Inside the Beltway, had sent us yesterday's item about Washingtonian David Keene landing the Algerian government image-improvement contract, but our original credit to him was accidentally dropped from the column. He can expect flowers and dark chocolates next year.

History Lessons (WT)

From New York Times Editorial, Jan. 27, 2000:

The United Nations Security Council's compromise choice of Hans Blix as the new chief weapons inspector for Iraq is a disturbing sign that the international community lacks the determination to rebuild an effective inspection system in Iraq... The further the world gets from the Gulf War, the more it seems willing to let [Saddam] Hussein revive his deadly weapons projects... With the Clinton administration unwilling to fight for a stronger nominee... Mr. Blix may be an unavoidable choice. But the problem of Iraq weapons development is not going to go away. The United States and its European allies may later regret that they were not more energetic in enforcing Iraq's disarmament obligations.

Afghan Suicide Bombings, Tied To Taliban, Point To Pakistan (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan, Feb. 12 — Arrests and interrogations of suspects in a recent series of suicide bombings in Afghanistan show that the attacks have been orchestrated from Pakistan by members of the ousted Taliban government with little interference by the Pakistani authorities, Afghan officials say.

In taped interviews by an Afghan interrogator, two Afghans and three Pakistanis who were among 21 people arrested in recent weeks described their roles in the attacks, which have killed at least 70 people in the last three months, most of them Afghan civilians but also international peacekeepers, a Canadian diplomat and a dozen Afghan police officers and soldiers.

In the tape, the men described a fairly low-budget network that begins with the recruitment of young bombers in the sprawling Pakistani port city of Karachi. The bombers are moved to safe houses in the border towns of Quetta and Chaman, and then transferred into Afghanistan, where they are provided with cars and explosives and sent out to find a target.

The tape appears to confirm Afghan officials' suspicions that the suicide bombings, which are largely a recent phenomenon in Afghanistan, were generated outside Afghanistan, and in particular from neighboring Pakistan. It was shown to The New York Times by an Afghan official who asked not to be identified because of the diplomatic implications of the contents.

A Taliban spokesman, Qari Yousuf Ahmadi, dismissed the claims of the Afghan government. "This is a propaganda campaign of the government," he said by satellite telephone from an unknown location. "Our mujahedeen don't send one group to one area so they can be found and arrested. Our mujahedeen send different people to different areas at different times."

He added that there was no need to recruit Pakistanis for the attacks. "They are all Afghans," he said of the suicide bombers.

But Afghan officials said the confessions provided the proof they needed to demand action from Pakistan. "I think there is a factory for these bombers," said Asadullah Khaled, the governor of Kandahar Province, where 15 attacks have occurred in the last three months.

President Hamid Karzai is traveling to Pakistan on Wednesday specifically to raise the issue with President Pervez Musharraf and in speeches to Parliament and officers at a military academy as well.

"If you are the ones blowing yourselves up, why are you making the explosion in front of the police headquarters, where people like you are standing in front getting passports?" Mr. Karzai said, addressing the bombers rhetorically, in a televised speech to elders from southern Afghanistan last week.

He has spoken increasingly of the need to tackle the problem at the source. Anti-Pakistan sentiment has been rising in Afghanistan, and a popular refrain is that if the hand of Pakistan were cut, the Taliban, many of whom fled over the border when they were ousted in late 2001, would be no more.

"Most of the attackers are non-Afghans," the governor of Kandahar, Mr. Khaled, said Saturday at a memorial service for 14 victims of the latest bombing. "We have proof, we have prisoners," he added. "We have addresses, we have cassettes."

Pakistani officials in the past have said the Pakistanis arrested in Afghanistan are usually illiterate laborers looking for work.

Judging by the tape, Pakistan appeared to be the base for the terror network, however. In the interviews, all of the men appeared to speak freely, some expressing regret for what they had done. Only one showed some nervousness, though the interrogations seemed relatively relaxed.

Three of the men, speaking in Urdu, said they were Pakistanis and had been recruited as bombers.

Two of the men, Akhtar Ali and Sajjad, who only gave one name, said they had been recruited by a man named Jamal, who was working for the Taliban and who owns a bookstore in Karachi. Sajjad had been staying with his brother in Karachi when Jamal showed him video cassettes in which Muslim clerics urged listeners to go and fight a holy war and earn a sure way to paradise.

"I was doing nothing, walking around, playing cricket and football," Sajjad said, adding in reference to a senior cleric: "The maulavi sahib talked to me and showed me a cassette, so I got involved. They were talking on the cassettes and telling us to do this and that, telling me to kill Americans."

Mr. Ali, who is from Karachi and who looked to be in his late 20's, said he received training to fight five years ago, when the Taliban were still in power, but never went to Afghanistan. Muslim clerics speaking on the video cassettes persuaded him to go this time, he said.

"I heard from the clerics there that if you fight jihad, you would go to paradise," he said. "There are cassettes there and they say: 'There is jihad against non-Muslims.' "

The third man, who gave his name as Abdullah, said he had come from Peshawar but was working in Karachi when recruited by a co-worker named Iqbal. "Iqbal was talking of fighting against Americans, he was talking of going to fight jihad there," Abdullah said in his interview. "I said I cannot do it. Iqbal persuaded me."

Separately the three men were sent to Quetta, they said in the tapes, and put in touch with an Afghan member of the Taliban, Abdul Hadi, who had a house in the border town of Chaman. Sajjad was on his second trip in; his first attempt was aborted when the man preparing the car in Kabul blew himself up.

Sajjad and Mr. Ali were arrested with their Afghan facilitator, Nur ul-Baqi, as they drove into Kandahar.

Abdullah, a man with a hard direct gaze, said he had been given shelter for two days in Afghanistan and provided with a car filled with explosives and two gas cylinders. "My other friend told me which button to press," he said.

He was caught by the police on the edge of Kandahar in a car laden with explosives and tried to detonate them as the police stopped him, the interrogator said on the tape. Abdullah denied that and said he had had a change of heart and stopped his car.

The interrogations also indicated that the network behind the men was made up of Afghan Taliban, many of them living in Pakistan. Mr. Baqi, the Afghan courier arrested with Mr. Ali and Sajjad, said on the tape that he had brought four would-be bombers into the country, taking them from Mr. Hadi in Chaman and delivering them to various people in Afghanistan who set them up with cars and explosives.

He said he had brought in one bomber called Imran from Pakistan's North-West Frontier Province, who blew himself up on the road near the Kandahar airport. The other bomber did not go through with his attack, Mr. Baqi said.

He gave names and details of other bombers who had been taken to Kabul and one to Herat to carry out attacks, and of the Afghans who helped them. Among them were an Afghan husband-and-wife team who blew themselves up on the Jalalabad road on the east side of Kabul.

"Most of the attackers are Pakistanis; I can tell you 99 percent are Pakistani," he said. He said he had not seen any Arabs coming through.

Mr. Hadi provided the money to purchase cars, one for $2,000, Mr. Baqi said. He said he had asked Mr. Hadi several times where the money had come from. "It is coming from the sky," was the reply.

"They are getting their logistics there, so it is obvious that Pakistan is also giving them money, in my opinion," Mr. Baqi said, adding that he and the other Afghan Taliban had free movement in Pakistan. "The people who are bringing anarchy in Afghanistan, the Pakistanis don't say anything to them," he said.

Hafiz Bismillah, the last man on the tape, said he was from Panjwai district, just 30 minutes southwest of here. Wearing glasses and a white prayer cap, he was the only one who appeared jittery in his interview.

Mr. Baqi had brought Imran, the bomber, to his house, and he had stayed with them, he said. "We knew he was going to do a suicide mission," he said. "We gave him a place to stay." The police found 80 mines inside large blue plastic barrels at his house, he said.

Afghan Gas Pipeline Nears Reality (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf

The Christian Science Monitor, February 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0015228

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN - If all goes well this week, Afghanistan may soon be on its way to having a gas pipeline going through its territory.

The ninth meeting of oil ministers for Turkmenistan, Afghanistan, and Pakistan started Tuesday in Ashkabad, Turkmenistan's capital. And according to Afghan officials, the three countries are closer than ever to a deal.

"When I met with the Turkmenistan vice president, and with [Afghan President Hamid] Karzai, and with President Pervez Musharraf, they all said this is a very good project, and it will have a good effect on the regional economy," says Mir Sediq, Afghanistan's minister for mines and industry.

Even India is interested in the project, and Indian officials will be attending the Ashkabad meeting as observers. "Manmohan Singh told me, 'We have a population of 1.3 billion people, and we cannot continue to grow without power," says Mr. Sediq. "One or two pipelines are not enough. We'll need three or four.' "

From the time it was first proposed in the early 1990s, after the fall of the Soviet Union, the 1,000-mile-long Turkmenistan-Afghanistan-Pakistan pipeline project, or TAP, has always had a certain unrealistic aura to it. Clearly Pakistan has a growing need for energy. Just as clearly, Turkmenistan has a lot of natural gas. The dilemma has always been Afghanistan: Would you put a gas pipeline through a country with a raging civil war?

For much of the 1990s, American oil company Unocal answered "yes," and hired Afghan consultants - such as the soon-to-be president Hamid Karzai; soon-to-be US ambassador to Kabul, Zalmay Khalilzad; and soon-to-be minister of Mines and Industry Sediq - to help negotiate with tribal chiefs and militia warlords. Eventually, Unocal shelved the project, in part because of the Taliban's intransigence, and in part because of pressure from human rights groups for trying to do business with them.

But with the fall of the Taliban in late 2001, and the support of foreign forces to keep relative peace, Afghanistan has suddenly turned into a "safe" investment choice, at least from the perspective of the oil industry. That is the assessment of the Asian Development Bank, which recently commissioned a study that gave its support to the TAP. Security is an issue, the ADB report says, but an issue that can be resolved with a few protective measures.

Then there's Pakistan: Will it be able to consume enough of Turkmenistan's gas for the project to be viable? At the time the TAP was first proposed, Pakistan's economy was growing at 4.5 percent a year. Today, its growth rate is estimated at 8.5 percent. Pakistani energy officials estimate that they will run out of domestic gas supplies in 2010.

The final cost of the project is currently estimated at $3.7 billion, up from the $2.5 billion price tag estimated in the 1990s. Unocal is now out of the picture, replaced by Argentine energy company Bridas.

For Afghanistan, this project could be a welcome source of jobs and income. After the three-year construction period, annual revenue for the Afghan government would reach around $350 million to $450 million.

This is less than the $2.2 billion in Afghanistan's illicit opium economy, but it has the advantage of being clean.

Afghan Parliament Debates Chaperones For Women (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf

The Christian Science Monitor, February 15, 2006

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN - When Afghan parliamentarians went to London earlier this month to participate in a major donor's conference, it was a milestone of sorts, with a presidency and Parliament working side by side to solve the nation's problems.

But for Al-Hajj Abdul Jabbar Shalgarai, a conservative legislator, the trip was distinctly un-Islamic. He saw the participation of two Afghan women parliamentarians - who traveled without their husbands - as a breach of the law.

So while President Hamid Karzai and his delegation were securing promises of aid, Mr. Shalgarai told his fellow parliamentarians that they were all obliged to follow the Islamic sharia law, which forbids women - including women parliamentarians - from taking long journeys without being accompanied by a male member of the family.

"This country is the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan, and the Constitution says that nothing can be done in Afghanistan that is against sharia law," says Shalgarai, recalling his statements in Parliament. "I don't want to pass a new law into the Constitution; we already have a law, and it is in sharia."

It was a debate that was bound to happen in Afghanistan sooner or later, a clash of two different visions of Islamic society, one traditional, the other modern. But for female parliamentarians hoping to improve the lot of women in this conservative Islamic country, the return of sharia rules - even if they are not specifically stated in the Constitution - is a troubling sign indeed. After all, it was this very same sharia principle that the conservative Taliban regime used to prevent women from going to school, to market, and to work.

"This is not just for women in Parliament, this will create a big problem for all women of Afghanistan," says Safiya Sadiqi, a female parliamentarian from the Pashtun-dominated Nangrahar Province.

"We have international donors who emphasize funding on women's development. They won't be happy to see this backward trend," says Sadiqi, who attended the London conference after being nominated by Parliament to go. "It means probably that soon women can't go to school alone, can't go to market alone, can't work alone." After three days, chaperones needed

Under sharia, the notion of mahram-e sharaii, or male chaperones, allows for women to travel for more than three days if they are accompanied with a male relative. Because mahram-e sharaii has not been introduced as a bill, it is impossible to know just how much parliamentarian support it has. But with an estimated 50 percent of the lower house claiming past experience as fighters in the anti-Soviet jihad, and current affiliation with Islamist parties, it's clear that conservative interpretations of Islamic life have a strong political hold.

"As Muslims, we have a strong book, the Holy Koran, and we believe in the Koran, we don't believe in the Constitution," says Haji Ahmed Fareid, a religious scholar and parliamentarian. "We have given women the right to educate themselves, to take part in government, to participate in political life. But there are special rules."

Haji Fareid says that Westerners pay so much attention to women's rights in Islamic nations, but rarely give Islam credit for the rights it gives to women, such as the guarantee from husbands that they will provide clothes, food, and shelter for their wives, as well as the right of inheritance.

"In some countries, the women work outside the house, and then come home and they have to cook, and wash clothes, and look after the children too," he says. "In Western cultures, women are equal to a pack of chewing gum. You can see their images on a box of soap or a bottle of shampoo. That makes women just a part of business."

Similarly, Shalgarai says the rule of mahram-e sharaii is actually intended as a protection of women.

"If a woman is on a three-day journey, far from home, and she falls sick, who will look after her?" asks Shalgarai. "If someone else's woman is sitting in the same row of seats as you, well, human beings have different drives, including sexual drives. Sometimes these cannot be controlled. This is to save the dignity of women." Selective application of the rules?

Yet women parliamentarians say that such stringent interpretations of the Koran are not appropriate for a modern Afghanistan.

"Islam is a social religion, it is good, and broad, and it covers everything in our lives," says Sahera Sharif, a female Parliamentarian from Khost. "But unfortunately, when there are rules that affect men and women equally, the men in our society only address these rules toward women."

Zeefunun Safi, another parliamentarian, agrees. "If my husband accepts me, and lets me travel and be a member of parliament, then who are you not to accept me?"

Yet she acknowledges that some women parliamentarians may end up supporting mahram-e sharaii, if it ever is introduced as a bill. "There are lots of women in Parliament against this, but they have to support it, because people will say, 'You are not our representative, get out of Parliament.' "

NATO Allies Cut Military Since 9/11 (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, February 15, 2006

America's major NATO allies have cut military manpower and defense funds as a share of their economies since the September 11 attacks, in sharp contrast with the United States, which embarked on deficit spending to boost arms outlays to fight global terrorists.

The downward trend is raising alarms inside the Pentagon, which needs the allies' help to battle al Qaeda and other militants in Afghanistan, Iraq and other trouble spots.

A comparison of force structures in 2001 and 2005 showed countries such as Britain, Canada, France, Italy, Poland, Spain and Germany cut their active-duty forces, according to statistics compiled by the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies. At the same time, the United States increased its ranks from 1.37 million to 1.42 million.

More telling is the share of each countries' gross domestic product (GDP) that is devoted to defense expenditures. The U.S. share has gone from 3 percent to 3.7 percent since September 11, 2001, while other NATO nations collectively have dipped from 2.02 percent to 1.8 percent, according to the Pentagon. Twelve years ago, NATO, excluding the United States, devoted 2.5 percent of GDP to defense.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who once referred to France and Germany as "old Europe" during their vocal opposition to the war that ousted Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein, has stepped into the dangerous arena of criticizing Western allies before. But this time, he is doing it diplomatically as he tries to explain the dangers of declining defense budgets in the age of global terror, which has struck NATO countries Turkey, Great Britain and Spain, as well as the United States.

At last week's NATO defense ministers' conference in Munich, Mr. Rumsfeld gently prodded his colleagues to rethink defense spending after he detailed the job ahead.

"This commitment cannot be done on the cheap," he said. "It's always easier for all of us to use our scarce tax dollars to meet some of the desires and appetites we have at home. But unless we invest in defense and security, the reality is that our homelands can be at risk."

The lack of NATO spending can show up in war. The alliance's 1998 air assault on Serbia was carried out by American warplanes in virtually all strike missions. Other countries had not invested money in the smart munitions needed to hit targets in Belgrade and on the battlefield.

Defense officials say European countries are short on capabilities for unmanned spy planes, cargo airlift, countermine technology and precision-guided weapons. All these shortfalls can affect U.S. troops relying on NATO forces to complement operations overseas in places such as the Balkans, Afghanistan and Iraq.

Retired Army Gen. George Joulwan, NATO's supreme commander in the mid-1990s, said Europe has to be convinced that the war on terror involves a commitment to global operations.

"This is just not the United States in the fight but civilization as they know it," Gen. Joulwan said. "You've go to get them educated to a degree that they understand this is a global war and give them a voice in the process. The initiatives agreed to in Prague in 2002 by all the heads of state need to be fulfilled."

It was in Prague that Europe, prodded by President Bush, agreed to improve defense spending. But the goals remain unmet today, defense officials say.

NATO is taking a historic step later this year when it moves far outside its treaty area and takes command of coalition forces in Afghanistan in the fight against Taliban and al Qaeda.

British Defense Minister John Reid sees NATO at a testing point.

"If we're going to make sure that NATO is a true force in the world, then we Europeans have to step up to the mark and make sure that we are contributing not only towards the discussions in NATO, which are very important, but also the resources, the types of troops that are necessary for today's world," Mr. Reid said.

Marching Orders To Keep Recruits, Boot Camp Gets A Gentle Revamp (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

FORT LEONARD WOOD, Mo. -- New recruits used to be welcomed to boot camp here with the "shark attack." For decades, drill sergeants in wide-brim hats would swarm around the fresh-off-the-bus privates, shouting orders. Some rattled recruits would make mistakes. A few would cry.

Today, the Army is opting for a quieter approach. "I told my drill sergeants to stop the nonsense," says Col. Edward Daly, whose basic-training brigade graduates about 11,000 soldiers a year. Last fall, Col. Daly began meeting with all new recruits shortly after they arrive at boot camp to thank them. "We sincerely appreciate the fact that you swore an oath and got on a bus and did it in a time of war," he recently told an incoming class. "That's a big, big deal." He usually is accompanied by two male and two female soldiers, who can answer questions the recruits may have.

"The idea is to get rid of the anxiety and worry," Col. Daly says.

The new welcome is a window on the big changes sweeping boot camp, the Army's nine-week basic training. For most of its existence, boot camp was a place where drill sergeants would weed out the weak and turn psychologically soft civilians into hardened soldiers. But the Army, fighting through one of its biggest recruiting droughts, now is shifting tactics. Boot camp -- that iconic American experience -- may never be the same.

Once-feared drill sergeants have been ordered to yell less and mentor more. "Before, our drill sergeants' attitude was 'you better meet my standard or else.' Now it's 'I am going to do all I can to assist you in meeting the Army standard,' " says Command Sgt. Maj. William McDaniel, the senior enlisted soldier here.

New privates are getting more sleep and personal time. Even the way soldiers eat has changed. Drill sergeants long ordered overweight soldiers to stay away from soda and desserts. Today, soldiers at Fort Leonard Wood fill out a survey about their boot-camp experience that asks, among other questions, if they liked the food, whether they were "allowed to eat everything on the menu, including dessert," and whether there was enough for seconds.

Recruits still must meet the same basic standards and pass the same tests for physical fitness and marksmanship to graduate, say Army officials. But more variable criteria that in the past might get a recruit expelled -- such as whether a drill sergeant thinks a recruit has the discipline and moral values to be a soldier -- have been jettisoned. "Now it doesn't matter what the drill sergeant thinks. We work off of the written standard," says Capt. Christopher Meng, who oversees a company of 11 drill sergeants and about 200 recruits at the base.

The new approach is helping the Army graduate more of its recruits. Last month, only 23 recruits failed to make the cut at Fort Leonard Wood's largest basic-training brigade, compared with 183 in January 2004. Army-wide, about 11% of recruits currently flunk out in their first six months of training, down from 18% last May.

Full Potential

Senior Army officials say attrition has fallen because the new techniques are helping more soldiers reach their full potential. "This generation responds to a more positive leadership approach. They want to serve and they want people to show respect for that decision," says Maj. Gen. Randal Castro, the commanding general at Fort Leonard Wood. Smarter training also is preventing injuries, Army doctors say.

Some drill sergeants worry that the "kinder and gentler approach" -- as drill sergeants have dubbed the changes -- is producing softer soldiers. "If the privates can't handle the stress of a drill sergeant yelling at them, how will they handle the stress of bullets flying over their head?" asked Staff Sgt. Clayton Nagel as he watched his recruits file past him in the Fort Leonard Wood dining hall. "War is stressful. I think we overcorrected."

The Army's decision to overhaul basic training came last spring. The service was having a hard time bringing in new recruits. It ultimately missed its 2005 recruiting goals for active-duty troops by 7,000 soldiers, or 8%, and National Guard soldiers by 13,000 or 20%.

Meanwhile, boot-camp attrition was climbing. New soldiers brought in to replace those who were tossed out weren't much better. "We realized that the further you go into the barrel, the lower the quality," says Col. Kevin Shwedo, a senior officer in the Army's Training and Doctrine Command in Virginia.

A team of 20 officers from the Army's training command was formed to figure out how the service could help more soldiers survive the first six months. They consulted sociologists and psychiatrists and even flew in MTV's senior vice president of strategy and planning, in search of fresh ideas for motivating today's youth.

The changes, put in place this fall at all five of the Army's basic-training camps, are apparent the moment recruits step off the bus at Fort Leonard Wood. On a chilly Tuesday in January, about 200 new recruits in white Army sweat suits filed into a big auditorium on the base for one of Col. Daly's welcome-to-the-Army talks. Staff Sgt. Mike Gilmore grabbed a microphone and told the recruits what was going to happen: "The brigade commander is going to talk to you. He is a colonel. He is way up here. You are way down here," Sgt. Gilmore explained.

He then coached the recruits on how to spring to attention when Col. Daly entered the room. "When I say 'attention,' you stand up. That's it. You don't say nothing. You do it quietly as possible."

"Attention!" Sgt. Gilmore ordered. The recruits rose slowly and unevenly.

"Could we all just stand up together?" Sgt. Gilmore said, sounding more let down than angry. "It would look so much nicer."

A few minutes later, Col. Daly, a Special Forces soldier who served in Afghanistan and was awarded a Purple Heart after being wounded in the U.S. invasion of Panama, strode into the room. He told the recruits to take a deep breath and a swig from their canteens. "There is no problem that you might have that in last 230 years the Army hasn't already heard," he said.

The recruits then got 40 minutes to fire questions at the four privates accompanying Col. Daly. One recruit asked if any of the privates had failed the Army's physical-fitness test. (Two struggled with it but eventually passed.) Others wanted to know how often they got to talk on the phone (once a week), how long they got for showers (five minutes) and how many hours of sleep they got a night (8 hours). A few asked if they had any regrets about enlisting. All four said no.

Too Easy

After the session, Pvt. Angela Holmquest, one of the privates brought in to answer questions, said she worried that basic training had become too easy. "The drill sergeants tell us we are in the low-stress Army. I'd rather be in the old Army. When we need to lock it up and work together as a team we can. But we should be more disciplined than we are," she said.

In recent months, the Army has told drill sergeants to back off the recruits in the dining halls as well. A few months ago, sergeants would hover over new recruits, rushing them through meals, quizzing them about Army regulations and chastising them for minor infractions like carrying their drinking glass with one hand instead of two.

The dining hall still is far from relaxing. But drill sergeants no longer shout at recruits. They aren't allowed to order overweight privates to skip dessert. At first, some drill sergeants refused to embrace the new directive. "There was a lot of balking on the dessert rule," says Capt. Meng, who oversees 11 drill sergeants. "I have had to say, 'Don't even mention it.' "

The Army also has cut the amount of running troops do in boot camp by more than 60% in the past three years. "A lot of these kids have never done P.E. or sports. We were injuring too many by running too much," says Col. Greg Jolissaint, an Army physician with the command that sets baseline standards for boot camp.

Instead of running, privates do more calisthenics and stretching. They also are spending more time learning the basic combat tasks they will need in Iraq or Afghanistan, such as how to spot a roadside bomb. Last month, Sgt. First Class Kevin Staddie, who spent a year in Iraq, was teaching soldiers how to move through a city under enemy fire. Suddenly he called a halt to the exercise. A private who was slithering on his belly lost his only canteen. Sgt. Staddie asked the private if he knew the temperature in Baghdad in August.

"It is 115 degrees," the sergeant said in an even voice. "Will you give me a solemn promise that you'll do a better job securing your canteen? You'll get a whole lot further."

The private nodded and rushed to continue the exercise.

Soldiers also get a few more chances to succeed, say drill sergeants. Not long after she arrived at boot camp, Pvt. Starr Mosley was accused by another soldier of writing letters home when she was supposed to be training. Her drill sergeant ordered the 18-year-old private to crawl on her belly through the barracks and chant: "I will not write letters in the war room."

Pvt. Mosley, who said she wasn't writing letters, refused. The Army offered her a fresh start in a new platoon. There she struggled to meet the service's marksmanship standards, her drill sergeant says. Sgt. Darren Baker, her new drill sergeant, spent hours coaching her. "Without him I would have quit," Pvt. Mosley says. "He was down there in the dirt helping me."

A year ago, a drill sergeant wouldn't have taken as much time working with one struggling soldier. Today it is part of the job. "We're all working more one-on-one with the privates," Sgt. Baker says.

Soldiers with certain medical conditions get more help as well. Recruits with mild asthma now are allowed to carry inhalers with them. Privates who come to the Army with a history of mild depression now can take Paxil or Zoloft. Both changes, pushed through last fall, are "contributing to the lower attrition overall," says Col. Jolissaint, the physician.

Some basic-training facilities also are setting up special units for soldiers who are hurt or out of shape. In August, Col. Daly created a "Warrior Rehab" unit for injured recruits. Before the unit's creation, soldiers hurt during training often would go home to heal. The vast majority never came back.

Soldiers in Warrior Rehab practice marksmanship, take classes on map reading and do low-impact workouts in the base's indoor pool. So far, 170 soldiers have passed through the program. Only 30 have quit basic training.

Last month, about 40 members of the unit gathered in their barracks for a class on how to ambush the enemy with an M-18 Claymore antipersonnel mine. The troops included Pvt. Matthew Brent, a 29-year-old former hotel manager, who enlisted because he "wanted a personal challenge." He came to boot camp overweight at 5-foot-10, 220 pounds and quickly went down with tendinitis in his ankle. In his five months in Warrior Rehab, Pvt. Brent has lost 57 pounds.

Next to him was Pvt. Richard Hodgson, who has been with the rehab unit since it started in August, trying to recover from stress fractures. He was having doubts about his ability to stick it out. "I've just lost my motivation. I was supposed to have graduated in September and I am still stuck here," he said. The sergeants in Warrior Rehab have been working hard to convince him to stay. "I've had a few mother-son type conversations with him," says Staff Sgt. Nicole Waters, one of the drill sergeants. "We talk about his goals in life. This job is a lot more mental than the typical drill sergeant job."

Not all Army commanders have embraced the new approach to basic training. Col. Daly says one of the 14 company commanders he oversees is a "gung-ho combat arms officer, who right now is just killing me."

Recently, one of that commander's recruits brought a round of live ammunition back from the rifle range, which isn't allowed. The bullet was found by a drill sergeant in the barracks common room. As punishment, the commander ordered the entire unit, which numbers 60 soldiers, to don their helmets when eating in the dining facility. He then threatened to send all the privates, who were just two weeks from graduation, back to the beginning of basic training.

Col. Daly bristled when he heard about the threat. "I am not going to keep 60 soldiers back because one guy made a mistake," the colonel says he told the commander.

Instead, Col. Daly ordered the commander to have his drill sergeants do a better job of searching the recruits' pockets for extra ammunition when they leave the range.

"The commander's leadership style has got to change," says Col. Daly, noting that the commander's recruits have gone absent without leave at more than twice the rate of any other unit in the past two months.

Even among those units that have embraced the new approach, there is debate about whether the changes have been too much, too fast. "It's a hot topic," says Capt. Meng, another one of Col. Daly's company commanders.

Like many of his fellow commanders, Capt. Meng spent a year in Iraq, in a tour that ended in 2004. He was second in command of a 100-soldier armor company. In the past six months, the West Point graduate has been in the forefront in reducing attrition, overseeing drill sergeants and recruits.

Last month, a few dozen of Capt. Meng's privates clambered onto olive-green trucks for one of their final boot-camp exercises. The troops, traveling in an Iraq-style convoy, were "hit" by a series of smoke-spewing roadside bombs. Enemy fighters, represented by pop-up targets, sprung from nearby prairie grass. A broad-shouldered drill sergeant ordered a counterattack.

Instead of leaping off the back of the truck, as they would in a typical exercise, or in actual combat, the privates waited about 10 seconds for someone to walk to the back of the truck and place a ladder on its rear bumper. They then climbed down the 5-foot drop, one at a time.

Falling Short

Capt. Meng conceded it wasn't realistic. He said the Army couldn't afford to have privates twist ankles and wrench knees just a few days before their final physical fitness test. "A few months ago attrition was seen as a good thing," he says. "It meant we were sending higher quality troops to the Army."

Now he says he is racking his brain for new ways to motivate more soldiers who are falling short of the Army's standards. He recently petitioned Col. Daly to let his troops have an extra half-hour of sleep on top of the 30 minutes of additional shuteye all recruits were granted last fall. Standard boot camp sleeping hours are now 9 p.m. to 5 a.m. His troops rise at 5:30 a.m.

"It has been great for morale," Capt. Meng says. "A soldier's happiness is directly proportional to the amount of sleep he gets."

The Iraq veteran says his boot-camp troops are in many ways better prepared for combat than their predecessors were. They spend far more time working with their M-16 rifles and more time in the field training on critical combat tasks like defending a base camp from insurgent attacks.

Asked if his soldiers are as disciplined and tough as their predecessors, Capt. Meng pauses. "There are some who feel we are not sending as high a quality soldier to the Army....I am not smart enough to tell you," he says.

In the near term, he has other worries. "The commanding general's No. 1 priority here is to support the war," he says. "In order to do that right now we have to graduate more privates."

U.S. Attorney Heffelfinger, After Red Lake Probe, To Resign (AP)

By Amy Forliti

AP, February 15, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS - U.S. Attorney Tom Heffelfinger, just weeks after wrapping up his investigation into the worst U.S. school shooting since Columbine, announced Tuesday that he will step down at the end of the month and return to private practice.

Heffelfinger, who was appointed to the post shortly after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, said he was stepping down for personal and family reasons. While the shooting at Red Lake High School was not a reason for his departure, he said, the case did play a role in the timing of it.

"It was very clear to me personally that I was not going to quit this job until after I met with the victims of the tragedy," he said. "This was a very difficult decision."

Heffelfinger oversaw his office's investigation into the March 21 shooting that claimed 10 lives on the Red Lake Indian Reservation in far northern Minnesota. Just two weeks ago, Heffelfinger presented the findings of his investigation to victims' family members and some tribal officials.

Heffelfinger was criticized by some families for not sharing more information about the investigation.

Although he did not make the findings public, relatives who heard the presentation said Heffelfinger told them as many as 39 people had some sort of advance warning of 16-year-old Jeff Weise's plans to open fire at Red Lake High School. Weise killed nine people on the reservation, including seven at the high school, before taking his own life.

The only person prosecuted was Louis Jourdain, 17, the son of the tribal chairman. The teen admitted to exchanging threatening communications with Weise.

Francis Brun, the father of Derrick Brun, who was killed in the shooting, said he was surprised to learn Heffelfinger was stepping down. Though Brun has been critical of the investigation since no one else has been prosecuted, he said he held no ill will toward Heffelfinger.

"I'm just not too happy with the federal court system," he said.

The reservation is a sovereign nation, so crimes committed there are tried in federal court, rather than by state authorities.

Heffelfinger said he worked hard to address issues on the reservation such as family violence, Indian gaming and gangs and drugs. When he returns to private practice, he plans to focus on Indian law, among other things.

This was Heffelfinger's second stint as U.S. Attorney; he also served under President Bush's father, former President George H.W. Bush.

In a news release, Heffelfinger pointed to several prominent issues while he was U.S. Attorney, including the shootings at Red Lake and school violence, methamphetamine cases, gang violence associated with drugs, white collar crime and terrorism.

During his tenure, his office prosecuted Mohammed Abdullah Warsame, a Minneapolis student charged with conspiracy to provide material support to al-Qaeda, and Mohamad Elzahabi, a Minneapolis resident who allegedly lied to federal agents about the shipment of electronics to Pakistan. Those cases are still pending.

Heffelfinger said he balanced the country's priority of battling terrorism with the traditional duties of a federal prosecutor. After the terrorist attacks, Heffelfinger said, the role of the U.S. Attorney's Office grew from that of the government's lawyer to one of the lead agencies in the prevention of terrorist attacks.

"It's really two events that kind of drove the agenda of Tom's tenure," said B. Todd Jones, now a defense lawyer who served as U.S. Attorney for Minnesota from 1998 to 2001. "One at the front end, which was 9-11. ... The other was the tragedy at Red Lake."

David Lillehaug, the U.S. Attorney for Minnesota from 1994 to 1998, said Heffelfinger faced three big challenges during his tenure: the Red Lake shootings, the growth of methamphetamine cases and terrorism. "He dealt with all of them with tenacity and made considerable progress," Lillehaug said.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will name an interim replacement until President Bush appoints a new U.S. Attorney for Minnesota, Heffelfinger said. He said he expects the entire process to take six to nine months.

When Heffelfinger was selected, he was on a list of finalists forwarded to the White House by U.S. Rep. Jim Ramstad. Ramstad took the lead because Minnesota didn't have a Republican U.S. senator and he was the GOP congressman with the most seniority.

This time, Ramstad's office and Republican Sen. Norm Coleman's office said they expect Coleman to be the go-to guy for compiling a list.

There are 93 U.S. attorneys in the United States, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, and the Northern Mariana Islands. They are appointed by the president, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Raleigh-based U.S. Attorney Nominated For Federal Bench (AP)

AP, February 15, 2006

RALEIGH, N.C. — The top federal prosecutor for the eastern third of North Carolina was nominated Tuesday by President Bush for a lifetime appointment to the federal court hearing cases from the state's western third.

Frank Whitney, 46, and his family still live in Charlotte. He would succeed Judge Brent McKnight, who died in November 2004 of esophageal cancer.

Whitney, a former Mecklenburg County Republican Party chairman, had the backing of the state's two Republican senators, Elizabeth Dole and Richard Burr.

Whitney spent 11 years as a federal prosecutor in Charlotte until Bush named him U.S. attorney for the state's eastern district in 2002.

As U.S. attorney, Whitney has overseen the public corruption prosecutions of former U.S. Rep. Frank Ballance and former state Agriculture Commissioner Meg Scott Phipps. The Phipps case, which involved illegal campaign contributions and rigging of bids to operate the state fair midway in Raleigh, led to Phipps' resignation and prison time for the former commissioner.

Ballance, who retired from Congress in the middle of his first term, pleaded guilty to a federal conspiracy charge linked to mishandling of money by a charitable foundation he ran.

Whitney's office is now handling the prosecution of David Passaro, a former Army Special Forces soldier and CIA contractor charged with beating an Afghan prisoner who later died in custody. Passaro is the first civilian prosecuted on charges of mistreating a military detainee in the U.S. war on terrorism, and the first American charged under the Patriot Act.

Whitney's office also has emphasized terrorism prevention, gun-crime and corporate fraud prosecutions, and civil rights and environmental cases. Dole's office said Whitney has increased prosecutions for violent crimes by more than 250 percent.

"I was honored to recommend Frank Whitney and am very pleased with his nomination," Dole said in a prepared statement.

A former military intelligence officer and paratrooper with more than 20 years in the Army and reserves, Whitney spent two months of 2004 on active duty serving as a judge advocate — or military lawyer — assigned to the U.S. Army Special Operations Command at Fort Bragg. He then spent three weeks on reserve duty in Panama.

Whitney is a graduate of Wake Forest and the University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill business and law schools.

Dole and Burr have recommended to the president that Whitney be succeeded by his top assistant, George Holding.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Witness: Skilling Hid Enron Unit's Status From Board (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, February 15, 2006

HOUSTON — Former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling not only hid the sorry condition of the company's broadband operations from investors and analysts, but also hid that information from the company's board of directors, a former Enron executive testified here Tuesday.

Ken Rice, who served as CEO of Enron Broadband Services (EBS) from 1999 to 2001, testified that after preparing a presentation he planned to make about his unit to Enron's board of directors on May 1, 2001, he "discussed it with Mr. Skilling, and he asked me not to give that presentation."

Instead, Rice said, he made a presentation to the board that was not fully candid about the disastrous state of broadband's operations.

Rice's assertions capped nearly a full day of testimony about EBS, a business unit launched with significant hype during the dot-com bubble. Prosecutors contend that by portraying Enron Broadband as a unit with huge growth potential, Skilling and former Enron chairman Ken Lay misled the investing public.

In every quarter during the two-year period that he ran the troubled unit, Rice testified that Enron had to resort to accounting gimmicks, asset sales and speculative investments for EBS to show the revenue growth that Skilling had promised to the public.

Even after announcing a 20-year agreement with Blockbuster Video to deliver movies on demand to customers via the Internet, the only way EBS could generate revenue on the deal was to "monetize" future earnings, Rice said.

Although he didn't like the practice, it became habit-forming. When EBS was going to miss its earnings targets for the first quarter of 2001, Rice testified that the division took "one more hit of crack cocaine" by entering a deal that allowed EBS to book future revenue immediately.

"I felt we were so addicted to quarterly earnings, we were selling our future earnings potential to make the numbers. If you continue to do that, sooner or later, you're not going to have future revenues," the 47-year-old Nebraska native testified.

Prosecutors allege that when losses at EBS became too big to hide, Skilling suddenly quit in August of 2001, leaving Lay to pilot the company during its final months before it collapsed into bankruptcy. Defense lawyers insist Enron was doing just fine when Skilling left and that his decision to step down as CEO after just six months wasn't a surprise.

But Rice testified that when EBS was finally folded into the company's profitable trading unit in July of 2001, he met with Skilling to tell him he was resigning. Skilling urged him to stay, Rice testified, saying he "was going to leave within a couple of years, and he wanted me to stay around."

Skilling Misled Public, Enron Jurors Are Told (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller And Gary McWilliams

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

HOUSTON -- The former chief of Enron Corp.'s telecommunications unit told jurors in the criminal trial of former top two executives Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay that Mr. Skilling took part in misleading the public about the unit's financial health and business prospects.

Kenneth Rice testified that Mr. Skilling, while Enron's president, made misleading statements about the telecommunications unit to stock analysts in 2001. Mr. Skilling also pushed the telecommunications unit, which was called Enron Broadband Services, to come up with financial projections that were more optimistic than warranted by business conditions, he alleged. Mr. Rice added that Mr. Skilling had also directed him to be less than fully candid when making a presentation about Enron Broadband to Enron's board in May 2001.

Messrs. Skilling and Lay are in their third week of what is expected to be a months-long trial on conspiracy and fraud charges stemming from the December 2001 collapse of Enron. Some of the charges in the case stem from alleged misstatements about Enron Broadband, which was devised to provide high-speed telecommunications services to businesses and homes.

Mr. Rice is the second government witness to take the stand. Like the initial witness, former Enron investor-relations chief Mark Koenig, Mr. Rice has pleaded guilty to an Enron-related crime and is testifying under a government cooperation agreement that he hopes will lead to a reduction of any prison sentence.

Mr. Rice said Enron Broadband never lived up to the high hopes for the unit that were presented to the public in 2000 and early 2001 by Mr. Skilling and others. The unit was never profitable, he testified, and by early 2001 was suffering from high costs and little revenue.

In late 2000, Enron Broadband officials estimated that the unit's loss for 2001 would be about $110 million, but Mr. Skilling directed that they lower the estimate to $65 million, Mr. Rice testified. The Enron president said the lower estimate would show investors that Enron Broadband was "progressing," said Mr. Rice, who added that he didn't feel the more optimistic number was achievable.

In early January 2001, Mr. Rice said he asked Mr. Skilling to raise the $65 million loss projection. "Mr. Skilling told me we really needed to stick with that number," asserted Mr. Rice. "He said we were getting a lot of pressure from analysts" on Enron's financial performance and "we didn't need any more bad news." Later that month, the $65 million loss estimate was given to Wall Street analysts.

As he testified, the 47-year-old former executive, with close-cropped hair, often gestured with his hands and turned to the jury to explain points. He appeared to avoid gazing at his former bosses at the defense table.

As problems continued to mount for Enron Broadband in early 2001, Enron held a special conference call with analysts on March 23 to calm market jitters, Mr. Rice said. There, Mr. Skilling made a number of misleadingly optimistic comments about Enron Broadband, he alleged. For instance, he inaccurately said that the unit's two main business areas were growing fast, Mr. Rice said.

Indeed, Mr. Rice said that much of the revenue that Enron Broadband did report came from deals with an outside partnership, known as LJM2, that was run and partly owned by Enron's then chief financial officer, Andrew Fastow. Mr. Rice said a roughly $100 million asset sale in 2000 was done with Mr. Fastow's partnership because "we couldn't find anyone else to buy it" from Enron Broadband at a profit. Without that deal, he added, Enron Broadband wouldn't have achieved its financial targets for the year.

The government alleges that the LJM operation was used to help manipulate Enron's reported financial results in a number of troubled business areas.

The government's questioning of Mr. Rice is expected to conclude today. That will be followed by cross-examination by defense attorneys.

Ex-Enron Chief Lied Often About Web Unit, Witness Says (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

HOUSTON, Feb. 14 — Jeffrey K. Skilling repeatedly lied about the state of Enron's struggling broadband Internet business and stubbornly refused to lower earnings targets, even when it became abundantly clear that the business lacked customers and deals that could generate revenue, the former head of the broadband unit testified Tuesday.

Kenneth D. Rice, taking the stand on Tuesday as the second witness in the criminal trial of the former Enron executives Mr. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay, testified that Mr. Skilling misled analysts time and again by portraying Enron's broadband unit as surviving a meltdown in the telecommunications business.

In truth, Mr. Rice said, the situation had become so dire that Enron was forced to lay off employees and drastically cut costs. When the business needed to meet earnings targets, it turned to complex financial structures like LJM, a secretive, off-the-books partnership run by the chief financial officer, Andrew S. Fastow, and other transactions that sacrificed future revenue to book current earnings, he testified.

Mr. Rice ran the broadband business from mid-1999 until July 2001, when he left Enron.

"We had no customers and no deal flow," he said, "and we were spending $100 million a quarter."

Mr. Rice's testimony strongly supported that of the government's first witness, Mark E. Koenig, the former head of investor relations, who described misleading statements Mr. Skilling made to Wall Street analysts to ensure that Enron's stock would not be affected by bad news about the broadband unit's performance.

But Mr. Rice, who had a close relationship with Mr. Skilling stretching back a decade, described several private meetings with the former chief executive where, he said, Mr. Skilling steadfastly refused to come clean with the unit's failings.

If Tuesday's appearance on the stand was a difficult moment for Mr. Rice, he did not let on. Mr. Rice was once part of Mr. Skilling's inner circle. After Mr. Skilling joined Enron in 1990, they traveled together on exotic vacations to remote corners of Mexico and the Australian outback.

Mr. Rice said he earned $40 million to $50 million during his last 10 years at Enron. But as head of the broadband unit, he soon found himself in the cross hairs of prosecutors investigating the collapse of Enron in December 2001. After he was indicted on 37 counts, he pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud and has cooperated with the government. He faces up to 10 years in prison.

Mr. Rice testified in a matter-of-fact tone, rarely making eye contact with Mr. Skilling, who sat up straight and looked on intently as Mr. Rice accused him of lie after lie.

Prosecutor Sean M. Berkowitz, in a jarring departure from seven days of often repetitious testimony by Mr. Koenig, questioned Mr. Rice at a breakneck pace.

Mr. Rice, 47, joined Enron's predecessor company, Internorth, in 1980 in Omaha. In 1999, Mr. Skilling asked him to run a stand-alone business in broadband. The idea was to create a fiber optic network and trade bandwidth capacity much like Enron traded natural gas and electricity. Enron also planned to charge content providers to use its network to send movies to customers.

Mr. Skilling saw the broadband business as a way to increase Enron's profit and share price. Mr. Skilling was obsessed with Enron's stock price, and installed stock tickers everywhere, from the Enron building's elevators to the parking garage, Mr. Rice said. The day Enron's broadband strategy was announced in January 2000, the stock price rose to $65 a share, from $50.

But the business struggled almost from the beginning, Mr. Rice said. By early 2001, desperate to bolster the unit's revenue, Enron tried to sell a chunk of its fiber optic network to Microsoft's Hotmail group. Microsoft's chief executive, Steven A. Ballmer, declined the offer in a conference call in January 2001 with Mr. Rice and Mr. Skilling.

Mr. Rice said that he lingered in Mr. Skilling's office and told him he was concerned about broadband's ability to meet its earnings targets, which included a promised loss of $65 million for the year. Mr. Rice argued the loss could be twice as large, but Mr. Skilling insisted Mr. Rice stick to the rosier outlook. "He said we had a lot of pressure from analysts," Mr. Rice said, "and he didn't need any more bad news."

As the performance continued to decline, Mr. Skilling agreed to reassign or terminate 240 of the unit's employees. But while Mr. Skilling told broadband employees in Portland, Ore., that the cuts reflected broad cost problems, he told analysts that the move was a simple downsizing and that the division's core businesses were doing well.

Mr. Rice said he later accepted an offer to sell some of broadband's underperforming assets to entities like LJM, which permitted Enron to minimize its losses. But Mr. Rice said he told Mr. Skilling and others that he thought it inappropriate that the company's chief financial officer, Mr. Fastow, was running LJM.

After a crucial, 20-year deal in which Blockbuster customers could use Enron's broadband network to download videos was terminated in March 2001, Enron's broadband business had virtually no customers.

Mr. Rice said he then learned of yet another plan that would permit the division to find earnings by selling future revenue from the contract.

"One more hit of crack cocaine on these earnings," Mr. Rice said. With its options for earnings growth dimming, Enron tried in the spring of 2001 to merge the unit with another telecommunications company. When Mr. Rice and Mr. Skilling decided to scuttle one potential deal, Mr. Rice said, it was clear to him that more drastic measures, including an outright termination of the business, would be necessary.

Mr. Skilling nevertheless pressured Mr. Rice to give a rosier presentation about the unit to analysts in the second-quarter conference call. "I had put together a presentation that was more candid, and Mr. Skilling asked me not to give that presentation," Mr. Rice said.

By July 2001, Mr. Rice had had enough, he testified. He told Mr. Skilling he was quitting but agreed to stay on the payroll until November, when some stock options would vest. On Aug. 1, the two old friends met for lunch. Minutes later, Mr. Skilling revealed that he had decided to leave the company, stunning Mr. Rice.

Mr. Skilling told Mr. Rice "he really wasn't having fun and had personal reasons for wanting to leave." The men spent much of the rest of the lunch talking about Mr. Skilling's plan to buy a boat and sail around the world. "It was more like a ship," Mr. Rice said, "a big boat that you could put cars on and maybe a helicopter."

That afternoon, Mr. Rice went back to his office and started to sell Enron stock.

Enron's Skilling Backed Off-Book Partnerships, Rice Testifies (BLOOM)

By Jef Feeley

Bloomberg, February 15, 2006

Feb. 14 (Bloomberg) -- The former head of Enron Corp.'s broadband unit testified today that ex-Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling backed use of off-the-books partnerships to handle Enron transactions over objections of other officials.

Kenneth Rice, who ran Enron Broadband Services for two years, said at the trial of Skilling and former Chairman Kenneth Lay that he questioned the use of a partnership set up by former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow to help make his unit's 1999 earnings targets. Rice said he told Skilling using such off-the-books entities for Enron-related deals ``looked goofy."

``Mr. Skilling explained that it was something that would facilitate getting transactions done," Rice said during his first day of testimony at Skilling and Lay' fraud and conspiracy trial in Houston. ``He said we needed to do it so that we weren't being stuck by the banks at the last minute to get transactions done."

Lay, 63, and Skilling, 52, have said they weren't involved in the off-the-books partnership transactions, which they said were overseen by Fastow. The CFO, who has pleaded guilty to fraud charges stemming from Enron's collapse, is accused of reaping at least $25 million in illegal profits from Enron- related deals with his partnerships.

Prosecutors contend Lay and Skilling, the company's former chief executive officer, orchestrated a ``wide-ranging" fraud that led to Enron's collapse. They inflated earnings by hiding billions in debt and losses in Fastow's partnerships and deceived investors about Enron's financial performance, prosecutors told jurors in opening arguments.

Lawyers for Skilling and Lay counter that prosecutors are seeking to criminalize normal business practices and that the executives were the victims of thieving subordinates, such as Fastow.

Guilty Plea

Rice, 47, pleaded guilty in 2004 to securities fraud and faces 10 years in prison when he is sentenced after the trial. He testified today that he first learned about some Fastow partnerships called LJM when the first was set up in 1999. Fastow created the entities, named for his wife and sons, to buy poorly performing Enron assets or invest in company deals.

The broadband unit didn't have any business with LJM until the second quarter of 2000, when the subsidiary decided to sell $90 million in fiber-optic wire to LJM, Rice said. Broadband officials needed the $55 million in earnings generated by the deal to meet quarterly targets, he added.

``We couldn't find anyone else to buy it for more than we had in it," Rice noted.

Defense lawyers have described Fastow as a ``crook" who hid the fees from Skilling, Lay and the company's board of directors. They've also said Fastow's partnerships were blessed by the company's lawyers, accountants and directors, and disclosed in Enron's securities filings.

Earlier Testimony

Mark Koenig, Enron's former head of investor relations, testified yesterday that Rice wasn't the only official to question the company's use of the partnerships.

Among Enron executives who challenged Fastow's involvement in the partnerships were Richard B. Buy, the chief risk officer; Jeffrey McMahon, treasurer until he was replaced in 2000; and former chief financial officer Ray Bowen, Koenig said.

Investors also were calling with concerns over the partnerships and a possible conflict of interest, Koenig said. He wrapped up his testimony today.

Koenig pleaded guilty in August 2004 to a single count of aiding and abetting securities fraud in connection with Enron's collapse and faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison.

Lay is charged with seven counts of fraud and conspiracy, plus four counts of bank fraud that will be tried separately after his first trial. Skilling faces 31 counts of fraud, conspiracy and insider trading.

Enron had more than $68 billion in market value before it filed the second-largest bankruptcy in U.S. history in December 2001, wiping out thousands of jobs and at least $1 billion in retirement funds almost overnight. Investors suing the company claim the fraud led to at least $25 billion in losses.

The case is U.S. v. Skilling, No. 04-cr-25, U.S. District Court, Southern District of Texas (Houston).

Enron Internet Chief Tells Of Disinformation Campaign (LAT)

By Thomas S. Mulligan, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2006

HOUSTON — The former head of Enron Corp.'s vaunted Internet unit today described his constant struggle to portray the faltering operation as a fast-growing business that would soon become a profit powerhouse.

Kenneth D. Rice, 47, the second government witness in the fraud and conspiracy trial of Enron's former top two executives, said that defendant Jeffrey K. Skilling, then Enron's chief operating officer, pressured him in 2000 and early 2001 to accept wildly unrealistic performance targets for Enron Broadband Services in order to help persuade Wall Street analysts that EBS was a big success in the making.

Preparing for in-house budgeting meetings for 2001, Rice's EBS subordinates examined their pending deals and expenses and estimated that the unit would lose $489 million in 2001. The climate, Rice testified, was one of sharply rising expenses and a depressed telecommunications market in which few customers would sign the long-term "bandwidth" contracts that were supposed to be EBS' bread-and-butter business.

Bandwidth refers to the capacity for sending data over the Internet. Enron, which had pioneered gas and electricity trading, thought that it could trade bandwidth — and eventually other commodities — on the same model. EBS was important to Enron's image as an increasingly high-tech company that should command a far higher stock market valuation than other competitors in the energy business.

At a November 2000 meeting of Enron's top corporate executives, Rice testified that Skilling told him to accept a loss target of only $65 million — $424 million lower.

Co-lead prosecutor Sean M. Berkowitz asked Rice why he agreed to a target he thought he had no chance of meeting?

"I didn't feel like I had any choice," he said.

Rice told the federal jury that during a major business outlook conference in January 2001, he lied to and misled an audience of analysts and investors to make them think that EBS was on target for achieving its modest loss number.

It was those actions that led to the single securities fraud charge to which Rice pleaded guilty in 2004, agreeing to cooperate with the federal investigation.

Rice also testified today about a telephone conversation in mid-1999 in which he had complained to Skilling about a new partnership, known as LJM, that had been created to do certain deals with Enron and would be run by Andrew Fastow, Enron's chief financial officer.

The deal was criticized within Enron because it seemed to pose a conflict of interest for Fastow to simultaneously run the outside partnership and hold a high executive position at Enron.

Rice said Skilling told him that he favored the arrangement because it would give Enron an alternate source of financing apart from banks.

Rice said he wasn't persuaded by his boss' rationale.

"I thought it looked goofy," he testified.

However, LJM later proved to be a godsend to Enron Broadband Services, agreeing to several deals during 2000 that helped EBS achieve its public business goals. In the second quarter of 2000, LJM bought $90 million to $100 million worth of "dark fiber," or unused telecommunications lines, to generate a $55-million gain for the unit, Rice said. At that time, in the midst of the telecom industry meltdown, no other buyer would have been willing to make such a deal, according to Rice.

Skilling co-defendant Kenneth L. Lay, Enron's former chairman, faces multiple felony counts of fraud and conspiracy. If convicted, they could spend decades in prison.

Skilling Wanted Giant Boat Post-Enron--former Exec (REU)

Reuters, February 15, 2006

HOUSTON, Feb 14 (Reuters) - Former Enron CEO Jeffrey Skilling planned to sail around the world in a large boat that could hold cars and even a helicopter after he left Enron, a former top executive testified on Tuesday.

"All I remember was that it was almost like a ship," said Kenneth Rice, recalling a conversation with his long-time friend Skilling. "It was a big boat you could put cars on and maybe a helicopter."

Skilling is unlikely to be able to do that any time soon, as he stands on trial alongside former CEO Kenneth Lay on charges of fraud that led to Enron's collapse in December 2001.

The tough-talking Skilling surprised Wall Street by resigning for personal reasons in August 2001, just a few months before Enron reported massive losses and collapsed in a heap of debt and shadowy partnerships.

Two weeks before the public announcement, Rice says Skilling told him of his decision to leave Enron during a lunch meeting at a fancy Italian restaurant in Houston.

The two later chatted in depth about Skilling's future plans, including his sailing ambitions, Rice said.

Rice, who oversaw Enron's failed broadband business, came up with his own plans when he heard Skilling would leave.

"I went to my office and sold stock," Rice testified.

Thousands of Enron employees and shareholders bitterly complain that top Enron executives made off with millions while they lost their life savings.

Witness: Skilling Aimed To Please Wall St. (AP)

By KRISTEN HAYS, The Associated Press

AP, February 15, 2006

HOUSTON (AP) — A former top trader who once enjoyed a place in former Enron Corp. chief Jeffrey Skilling's inner circle testified Tuesday that Skilling set earnings targets to please Wall Street and then expected division heads to meet them.

Skilling also led an effort in early 1999 to redefine Enron as a company with consistent growth rather than a trading company with less predictable growth because analysts who influence stock prices supported stability, said Kenneth Rice, the prosecution's second witness in the fraud and conspiracy trial of Skilling and Enron founder Kenneth Lay.

"Mr. Skilling told me on several occasions our stock would get whacked" if the market perceived Enron as a trading company, Rice said Tuesday, his first day on the witness stand.

He said Enron's obsession with maintaining a lofty stock price fueled efforts to maintain Wall Street support.

Prosecutors contend Lay and Skilling lied about Enron's financial health when they knew complicated finance structures hid debt and inflated profits. The defense teams say negative publicity and loss of market confidence — not fraud — fueled the company's collapse.

Rice ran Enron's highly touted broadband unit before it crashed into bankruptcy proceedings with the parent in December 2001. He pleaded guilty to securities fraud in July 2004.

He said the broadband unit never lived up to its hype, had paltry cash flow and millions in losses after he, Skilling and others unveiled it with much fanfare at a January 2000 analyst conference.

But when he told Skilling in late 2000 that 2001 losses would reach $110 million — almost double the $60 million in losses for 2000 — Skilling told him to limit them to $65 million.

Rice said he felt he had no choice but to agree, even though the business was flailing.

"Mr. Skilling would simply say, in fact he did say, 'This is the number, this is what the number is going to be,'" Rice said.

Rice appeared comfortable, though he focused on jurors or prosecutor Sean Berkowitz rather than the defendants. Skilling watched him intently, while Lay took notes. Rice had yet to be questioned by the defense.

He described Skilling as a hands-on boss, who saw broadband as an important venture that could help increase Enron's stock price.

Rice said the broadband unit struggled in 2000 and 2001 to contain losses at the level Skilling told Wall Street to expect and show progress in gaining market share.

But the unit's two missions — creation of an Internet bandwidth trading market and streaming video into homes through a fledgling broadband network — never gained strength, Rice said. Few if any trading partners existed as the telecommunications industry bottomed out, and video streaming never surpassed the testing stage.

So the unit often met earnings targets by selling inoperative fiber-optic cable or "monetizing" a 20-year contract with Blockbuster Inc. to provide video-on-demand by selling an interest in its future revenue. The Blockbuster deal later flopped.

Rice said he called the monetizations "crack cocaine" because Enron was addicted to meeting quarterly earnings targets even if it meant selling future revenue potential.

Rice also said a partnership called LJM, set up by former Enron Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow, "looked goofy to me." The partnership, separate from Enron, was created to conduct transactions to help the energy company meet its earnings targets.

Rice said he asked Skilling whether it was proper for a partnership run by Enron's CFO to conduct deals with Enron. He said Skilling explained that LJM could do transactions fast and that he thought "it was an important thing for Enron to do."

Despite his concerns, Rice's unit turned to LJM to meet earnings targets. LJM bought $90 million in inoperative fiber in the second quarter of 2000.

In March 2001 Skilling told analysts in a conference call that the broadband unit had "strong growth as far as people, budgets, the whole thing."

"The reality was we were cutting people" in broadband and the unit was spending $100 million per quarter without bringing in any significant cash, Rice said. He stopped short of saying Skilling lied.

Rice was more explicit last year when he testified in the 2005 fraud and conspiracy trial of five former broadband executives. Rice said that he, Skilling and most of the defendants in that case lied when they told analysts in January 2000 that the network was up and running when it wasn't, to generate Wall Street buzz and inflate the company's stock price.

Within two days of the conference, Enron's stock price leaped from $54 a share to $72.

A videotape of Skilling's presentation played during the broadband trial showed he alternated between saying what the network could do at the time and what it would do in the future.

That trial ended with acquittals on some counts, and jurors hung on others. Those defendants are to be retried in three separate cases this year.

Rice said he decided in July 2001 to leave Enron when the broadband unit was to be folded into the larger trading division. Skilling asked him to stay, and they both would leave in "a couple of years," Rice said.

About two weeks later, Skilling told Rice that he was going to resign in mid-August.

He said Skilling also told him about plans to get a boat and travel the world.

"All I remember is, it was more like a ship," Rice said. "It was a big boat you could put cars on and maybe a helicopter."

Getting To The Bottom Of Enron (WSJ)

By Holman W. Jenkins, Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

The Enron trial is underway, and may justice be done, amen. For our millions of tax dollars, however, we pray for a parting of the mists around Jeff Skilling's weird, abrupt resignation from the company in August 2001.

There's no doubt that, from a dramaturgical point of view, the resignation is a key to the story. Mr. Skilling was credited with building the Enron trading machine from scratch. He had just formally been awarded the title of CEO, a driven Type A, arrogant, smart, full of blustery camaraderie with his protégés. In our current adopted posture of amorality, we don't care whether he goes to jail. All we want to know is what was going through his multileveled little mind.

Did he sit upright one night and realize he'd lost control of Andrew Fastow, the company's chief financial officer? Did he notice the Fastow black box was beginning to emit strange noises, odors, an occasional wisp of greasy smoke, suggesting all was not right inside?

Did he know Fastow and a close aide had fattened their own wallets with tens of millions at Enron's expense as the price for arranging transactions to conceal losses on various Enron-owned assets that had declined in value? Was his resignation a sublime stratagem to make sure somebody else -- Ken Lay -- would be presiding over Enron when the revelations that Mr. Skilling was fleeing became public?

Recall the clamminess of the news that crossed the wires on Aug. 14, 2001. As told to the press, he wanted to spend time with his kids, slow down, smell the roses. He was concerned about his health. In an off-key note, he told the Journal he might have stayed if Enron's share price hadn't turned south. The more he talked, the clearer it became that no one at Enron had the slightest idea why he was leaving, even as the stock price cratered on the news.

We admit to finding this theory tempting: Mr. Skilling, from the moment he decided on resignation, has been engaged in a high-wire bluff to avoid accountability for Fastow's actions, including his incredibly nervy decision to testify under oath before a Congressional panel even as Mr. Lay did the normal thing and heeded his lawyer's advice to plead the Fifth.

Alas, the Justice Department's Enron Task Force seems unwilling to get to the bottom of Enron, preferring to frame the trial in Houston as a "pump and dump" case, in which Mr. Skilling and Ken Lay talked up the failing company's shares while selling their own. The implicit narrative: Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling are rich and Enron collapsed, so they must be guilty of something that amounts to not announcing to the world that Enron was destined to collapse.

Missing, though, is an important element of narrative credibility in Mr. Lay's case, since his stock sales seem to have been involuntary, forced by margin calls. He even forked over $10 million in cash, his signing bonus for returning as CEO, to prevent further liquidation of his soon-to-be-worthless shares. That one is born every minute might seem betokened, furthermore, by Mr. Lay's very presence as co-defendant with Mr. Skilling in the dock. He's there, it's easy to suspect, mainly because failing to indict Mr. Lay (former friend of President Bush) would have subjected the Enron Task Force to Democratic charges of political favoritism.

Mr. Skilling, after all, persuaded the board to approve Fastow's role in outside companies created to do deals with Enron. He knew some of these transactions, the Raptors, accounted for much of Enron's reported profits in two successive years. He was apparently incurious about how much Fastow was pocketing from his non-arm's length dealings with Enron. When a company insider, Sherron Watkins, finally determined to blow the whistle, she went not to Mr. Skilling but to Mr. Lay. And so forth.

In its first two weeks, though, the trial has already numbed the jury with, in essence, a debate between a former Enron flack, with limited understanding of the company's financials, and Mr. Skilling's and Mr. Lay's lawyers over whether the executives had been on defensible grounds in making certain statements about the company's earnings and revenues in desultory conference calls with analysts and fund managers.

Even the mainstream press has turned a skeptical eye on the government's tactic of naming more than 100 "unindicted co-conspirators," frightening many former Enron executives and outside advisors away from testifying for the defense. All this is done, we suspect, more to protect the government's case against Mr. Lay than its case again Mr. Skilling: Just one more way in which the prosecution may end up hurting itself by needlessly conflating a weak story about Mr. Lay with a plausible one about Mr. Skilling -- that he gave Fastow too much rope and then ran away in full cognizance of what he had begotten, making fools of Mr. Lay, and the board.

Given the inherent difficulties of accounting fraud trials, you'd have thought the prosecution would have seized the opportunity to present a case that any jury could understand: Andrew Fastow was stealing and Mr. Skilling knew, but looked the other way because Fastow's activities were propping up Enron's stock price and reported profits.

Juries, immersed in the evidence for months at a time, have a way of popping out with verdicts that leave the kibitzers confounded. Still, if Mr. Skilling walks, his most brilliant career move may well have been resigning and handing over the hot seat to Ken Lay so the government would feel compelled to muddy its case by indicting him too.

What Enron Fallout? Business Hits A Bump, But It's Only Modest (RC)

By Karlyn Bowman

Roll Call, February 15, 2006

Views about business — and many other key institutions — were unusually positive during the good economic times of the late 1990s. Now, after a flurry of corporate scandals, have more negative views about the business sector set in, or have Americans gotten past the run of CEO misdeeds?

In Pew's 1999 question, 73 percent of respondents said they had a very or mostly favorable opinion of business corporations. Business did take a short-term hit when scandals involving Enron and WorldCom broke in late 2001. More recently, business and other institutions have suffered from a generally sour mood in the public.

Specifically, in Pew's December question, 57 percent had a favorable opinion of business. Gallup's data shows high confidence in big business dropping from 28 percent in the spring of 2001 to 20 percent in the spring of 2002. It's 22 percent today.

In reality, despite the modest dips in support, public attentiveness to business scandals was never especially high. A November 2003 Pew Research Center report concluded that the business scandals had a "minimal impact" on public opinion. There are several reasons.

First, people didn't think the kind of behavior they saw at Enron would happen at their own companies. For example, in six polls conducted by Gallup and UBS since April 2002, more than 80 percent said that the people who run their companies are honest and ethical.

Second, people have long been wary of the honesty and ethics of big business, and in that sense, the scandals were nothing new. Twenty-eight percent told Zogby in July 2002 that the revelations were "relatively new," but 64 percent said that they were commonplace.

Nor did the scandals prove particularly harmful to one party or the other. Americans think that both parties are too close to big business. The lack of a partisan cast appears to have dulled the political impact.

People wanted the wrongdoers punished, but there is no evidence that they wanted to clamp down on business in any significant new way.

A Businessman for President? When asked by Fox News and Opinion Dynamics in early February who they would rather see as our next president, 33 percent said a businessman, 21 percent a general, 21 percent a career politician — and 2 percent an actor.

Congress' Ratings. Pew's Feb. 1-5 poll finds the public's views of Congress "at their lowest point in a decade," with 47 percent expressing an unfavorable opinion, and 44 a favorable one.

Trade Talks. Americans have long been ambivalent about foreign trade, which they like in principle, but worry about in practice.

The Jan. 20-25 CBS News/New York Times poll shows that 67 percent — a number virtually unchanged from the 69 percent recorded in 1996 — say the effects of trade on the economy are good. Twenty percent said the effects are bad.

At the same time, 64 percent (compared to 63 percent in 1996) say trade restrictions are necessary to protect domestic industries.

Of those with less than a high school education, 52 percent say the effects of free trade on the economy are good, compared to 84 percent of those with a postgraduate degree who say the same thing.

Measuring by income levels shows much of the same pattern. Still, 60 percent of those with incomes under $50,000 a year say it is a good thing for the economy.

Blog Readership. When Gallup asked Internet users in early December how they use the Internet, 67 percent said they frequently send or read e-mail. Twenty percent said they did this occasionally and 13 percent said they did it rarely or never.

As for reading Web logs, 9 percent said they did this frequently and 11 percent occasionally (two categories that collectively represent about 40 million Americans), while 79 percent said they rarely or never read blogs.

A third said they spend more than one hour a day using the Internet.

A Woman for President. In 1937, Gallup asked people whether they would vote for a woman for president if she were qualified "in every other respect" (a question that would never be asked today and one which Gallup soon changed). A third of those surveyed said yes.

In the January 20-25 CBS News poll, 92 percent said they would vote for a woman for president if she were qualified for the job. A smaller majority, 55 percent, said they thought America was ready to elect a woman president, while 38 percent said it wasn't.

The early February Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll asked about a group of potential candidates and found that 39 percent said a female candidate would most likely be elected first, followed by an African American (20 percent), a Jew (12 percent), and a Hispanic (6 percent).

Street Sleuth Revenge Of The Retirees May Cut Pay At Lucent (WSJ)

By Sara Silver

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

In recent years, Lucent Technologies Inc.'s retirees have seen many of their benefits cut. Now they are fighting back -- proposing to rein in the compensation of the executives doing the cutting.

Lucent's shareholders today are voting on a proposal to restrict the pay of the top brass. The proxy proposal, which was put forward by retirees, would make 75% of executive stock grants dependent on the telecom-equipment maker's performance. It is partly a reaction to last year's sharp increase in the bonus of Lucent's chief executive, Patricia F. Russo.

It isn't just happening at Lucent. Retirees from a range of companies including Verizon Communications Inc., General Electric Co., International Business Machines Corp., Prudential Financial Inc. and Qwest Communications International Inc. are presenting proposals to restrict executive compensation. The retirees are motivated partly by concerns that the value of their nest eggs can crack when the value of their companies' stocks drops.

"In these years of corporate tumult, which has seen many great companies turn into shells of their former selves, one thing has remained constant -- ever-rising levels of executive and board compensation," said Joanne Raschke, who filed the Lucent proposal. She holds 6,200 shares of stock in Lucent, a legacy of her husband Ken's 36 years with its predecessor companies.

This is actually the second attempt for the Lucent proposal. Last year a similar proposal by retirees received very strong support from shareholders, according to Patrick McGurn of Institutional Shareholder Services, a firm that advises shareholders on corporate proxy votes and is recommending they support this proposal.

Last year's proposal actually received a slim 50.2% majority of votes cast. However, abstentions are routinely counted as "no" votes, which caused the proposal to fail.

Mr. McGurn expects this year's proposal to receive vigorous shareholder support. "The board didn't do anything substantively last year to respond to that vote," Mr. McGurn said. "That will drive strong support for it again this year."

At Lucent, retirees are frustrated by the elimination of a benefit that paid up to a one-year salary to the spouse upon the death of a retired employee, and by lower company contributions for medical-insurance premiums. They have been vigorous critics of CEO Russo's pay: In 2005, Ms. Russo was awarded a $3.6 million bonus on top of a base salary of $1.2 million, and was granted an additional $8.7 million in restricted stock and options. In 2004, she was awarded a $1.95 million bonus on top of her $1.2 million salary, $4.6 million in restricted stock plus $4.8 million in options. Lucent notes that all of the options remain below the exercise price.

Lucent says that the actions were necessary to return to profitability, and that Ms. Russo's compensation was in part a reward for moving the company into the black in 2004 and 2005. "We believe that our long-term compensation plans are aligned with the interests of shareholders," said Mary Ward, a spokeswoman, adding that half of senior executives' compensation comes from Lucent shares whose value is based on its operating performance.

Lucent's stock is widely held, and retirees represent only a fraction of overall shareholders. Yesterday the stock closed at $2.83, up six cents, or 2.2%, in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

U.S. companies have been retreating from their decades-long practice of offering a well-funded retirement for long-time employees. Scores of companies have cut health benefits for retirees, and in recent months, General Motors Corp., IBM and Verizon have joined a wave of companies freezing the level of pension benefits for certain employees.

But even as retiree benefits are being cut, compensation for executives has risen: The median compensation for a chief executive officer in a Standard & Poor's 500 company was $6 million in 2004, up more than 13% from 2003, according to the Corporate Library.

While unions were among the first groups to take to shareholder activism, the retiree groups are largely run by former managers and technical staff, smarting at their diminished voice and the company's often adversarial stance to retiree questions. "We built the company and have been cooperative with them, and we want the dialogue and some answers," said Dick Ciocca, president of the Philadelphia-based National Association of Prudential Retirees. "Executive compensation was where we could get their attention."

The group has submitted a proposal to require shareholder approval of "golden parachutes," or severance payments, for departing executives. These kinds of proposals have had the most success, says Carol Bowie, director of governance research for Institutional Shareholder Services, based in Washington. Companies such as Lucent and Verizon voluntarily incorporated this demand after strong support for proposals that they later negotiated off the ballot.

Other retiree groups are seeking better disclosure of executive pay.

Janet Krueger, a 52-year-old software consultant who quit IBM after 23 years, will resubmit her proposal from last year requiring IBM to fully disclose what executives are paid, including the value of their pensions, retiree benefits and deferred compensation. Although IBM hasn't yet published its proxy proposals for this year, last year it opposed the resolution, saying the company complied with Securities and Exchange Commission requirements.

Private Insecurities (WSJ)

By Kenneth M. Lehn

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

We just marked the 10th anniversary of the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act (PSLRA), which attempted to curb abuses in securities class-action litigation by eliminating so-called "professional plaintiffs" and instituting more-stringent pleading standards. While the PSLRA has discouraged some meritless lawsuits, the evidence suggests that our private securities-litigation system still needs additional reform.

Take a look at the numbers. Since the passage of the PSLRA, the size of securities class-action settlements and the number of companies involved in this litigation have grown substantially. Data compiled by Laura Simmons and Ellen Ryan of Cornerstone Research show that the total inflation-adjusted value of securities class-action settlements increased to $9.6 billion in 2005 from $150 million in 1997. Over the same period, the average inflation-adjusted size of settlements increased over sevenfold, to $78 million from $10.7 million. These increases are largely driven by the proliferation of "mega-settlements" in excess of $100 million, such as last year's WorldCom settlement of more than $6 billion.

Data compiled by the Stanford Law School and Cornerstone Research also show that the percentage of listed companies that were defendants in federal securities class-actions has increased rather steadily from 0.8% in 1996 to 1.5% in 1997, and to over 2% in each year between 1998 and 2005. A disproportionate amount of post-PSLRA class-action suits have been targeted at companies that are large or and have volatile stock prices. Some 60% of the companies in the Dow Jones Industrial Index have been sued in securities class-actions since 1999, including Proctor & Gamble, Johnson & Johnson, Pfizer and Intel, which have remarkable records at creating shareholder value. None of them were defendants in the period from 1995 to 1999.

Almost one-third of the companies in the Nasdaq Biotech Index and more than one-half of the firms in the Nasdaq Internet Index have been targets of federal class-action securities lawsuits since the enactment of the PSLRA. Insofar that some, if not most, of these suits are driven more by the volatility of these companies' stock prices than they are by fraud, these suits have a disruptive effect on important high-growth industries.

Almost none of these lawsuits ever go to trial. Most are settled, even if a company feels that the case is without merit, because the risks and costs of going to trial are great. For example, suppose that a class-action suit is brought against a company with alleged damages of $1 billion. If the defendant believes there is only a 10% probability that the plaintiffs will prevail, the defendant faces an expected judgment of $100 million (i.e., 10% times $1 billion). In this simple example, it would be more rational to settle the suit, even for as much as $99.9 million. Hence, even frivolous suits are settled for large amounts.

A recent study, by Prof. Anjan Thakor of Washington University and Jeffrey Nielsen and David Gulley of Navigant Consulting, followed trades by 2,394 institutional investors and class-action settlements since the enactment of the PSLRA in 1995. It reveals a fundamental problem: The compensation investors receive in settlements of federal securities class-actions does not correspond to the harm investors incur from alleged securities fraud. In the post-PSLRA system, large diversified institutional investors are often overcompensated as a result of a class-action while smaller, undiversified investors, including individual "Ma and Pa" types, are not.

Once a class-action settlement has been paid, the study found, 40% of institutional investors have realized a net benefit. That is because the present system creates asymmetrical payoffs for diversified investors: They receive distributions from settlements when they are harmed by securities fraud but they do not have to pay back any gains they receive from securities fraud.

So what should be done to fix the current system of private securities litigation?

· First, defendants are not currently allowed to appeal motions to dismiss federal class-action securities suits. Congress should pass legislation allowing them to do so.

· Second, damages should be calculated in terms of the per-share inflation of a company's stock price due to alleged fraud, not in terms of aggregate damages. Estimates of aggregate damages require estimates of the number of shares that were purchased during the class period at an allegedly inflated price and subsequently held or sold at a price after the alleged fraud is discovered. But there is no scientifically valid way of estimating the number of these shares. Instead of using untested models that often result in highly inflated aggregate damages, damages should be thought of in terms of per-share inflation, with investors required to come forward to prove their claims.

· Third, the current system of compensation in private securities litigation should take into account what investors receive from the relatively new Fair Funds, which are an outgrowth of Sarbanes-Oxley. Under Sarbox, the Securities and Exchange Commission is allowed to pool disgorgement and civil monetary penalties that defendants pay in settlements to it. The SEC then attempts to distribute the monies in the Fair Funds to investors who were harmed by the defendants' actions. If the total distributions made to harmed investors under the Fair Fund exceed the total damage investors incurred because of the alleged fraud, then investors should not be allowed to collect damages in private securities litigation.

PSLRA improved our system of private securities litigation a bit, but it has not proven to be the panacea that many had hoped for 10 years ago. Congress and the White House ought to build on its modest success with reforms that will lead to a fairer and more efficient system.

Mr. Lehn, Samuel A. McCullough Professor of Finance in the Katz School of Business at the University of Pittsburgh, was the chief economist of the Securities and Exchange Commission from 1987 to 1991.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff Bragged Of Ties To Rove (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger And Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — When the government of Malaysia sought to repair its tarnished image in the U.S. by arranging a meeting between President Bush and its controversial prime minister in 2002, it followed the same strategy as many other well-heeled interests in Washington: It called on lobbyist Jack Abramoff for help.

It was a tall order. The then-prime minister, Mahathir Mohamad, had been chastised by the Clinton administration for repeated anti-Semitic statements and for jailing political opponents. But it was important to the Malaysians, according to a former Abramoff associate who attended meetings with the Malaysian ambassador and the lobbyist.

Abramoff contacted presidential advisor Karl Rove on at least four occasions to help arrange a meeting, the witness said.

Finally, the former associate said, Rove's office called to tell Abramoff that the Malaysian leader soon would be getting an official White House invitation.

Neither the former Abramoff associate nor any others who spoke about the Malaysian contacts wanted their names used, out of fear they might damage future business opportunities.

In May 2002, Mahathir met with Bush in the Oval Office; his photograph with the president was beamed around the world.

Abramoff received $1.2 million from the Malaysian government for his lobbying services in 2001 and 2002, the former associate said. Documents obtained by Senate investigators appear to confirm at least $900,000 of that amount.

It's not clear how central Abramoff was in arranging the Oval Office session. The White House says the meeting was arranged through normal channels.

But it was clear, the former associate said, that Abramoff took credit for it. His reputation for close relationships with the White House and congressional officials enabled him to charge stratospheric fees from his lobbying clients — and the president's meeting with Malaysia's prime minister enhanced that reputation.

The Malaysia episode sheds new light on the practices of Abramoff, the man at the center of a burgeoning corruption scandal, and suggests closer ties than previously acknowledged between the disgraced lobbyist and the highest levels of the Bush White House.

Abramoff has pleaded guilty to improperly influencing members of Congress and their aides — offering foreign travel and other benefits and later seeking favors from some of them. He often routed lobbying fees through nonprofit organizations to evade taxes or hide the sources of the funds.

The Malaysian payments were made to the American International Center, a bogus think tank that an Abramoff partner, Michael P.S. Scanlon, set up at a Delaware beach house. Abramoff and Scanlon have admitted using the center to collect millions from their lobbying clients.

By routing the money in that way, Abramoff identified his client on federal lobbying disclosure forms as the Delaware-based center and avoided having to register with the Justice Department as an agent of a foreign government.

After the Malaysian leader's White House meeting, the former associate said, Abramoff was invited to a dinner honoring the prime minister at the Malaysian Embassy and was given a seat near the head table.

At least one other Washington lobbying firm — Alexander Strategies, which was run by an Abramoff friend and former chief of staff to then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) — was compensated during this period for helping boost Malaysia's reputation in Washington. That firm was also given credit in some circles for helping to arrange the White House meeting and separate trips for leading members of Congress, including DeLay and several Democrats, to Malaysia.

The former associate was the only person to observe Abramoff's direct contacts with Rove, and he heard only Abramoff's end of the conversation. He recalled Abramoff picking up his ringing cellphone, looking at the caller identification and saying, "It's Karl." Abramoff listened for a few seconds and gave the former associate the thumbs-up sign. Abramoff then closed his phone and said the official invitation was forthcoming. "Call the ambassador," he said.

Apart from the direct contacts between Rove and Abramoff, the former associate's description of the Malaysia episode was backed by another former Abramoff associate and by documents released last year by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee.

Both said Abramoff talked of his access to Rove and cited his relationship with Susan Ralston, Rove's administrative assistant. Before joining the White House staff, Ralston was an assistant to Abramoff.

One of the former associates said Abramoff referred to Ralston as his "implant" in the White House.

A White House spokeswoman, Erin Healy, said Tuesday that Rove had "no recollection" of any conversations with Abramoff regarding the Malaysian meeting.

She said the meeting was arranged through "normal staffing channels."

The meeting took place as Malaysian and U.S. officials were discussing that nation's participation in the post-Sept. 11 campaign against terrorism. Malaysia is a heavily Muslim country.

"At the time [Mahathir] was Asia's longest-serving prime minister and an influential Islamic leader," Healy said. "The president met with him to discuss Malaysia's role in the war on terrorism."

Healy said Rove considered Abramoff a "casual acquaintance."

White House officials said Ralston's hiring had nothing to do with her prior association with Abramoff. Healy said she was a "valued member of the White House team."

Although White House officials have taken pains to distance Bush and his aides from Abramoff, hoping to shield the president from the scandal's political fallout, former associates say Abramoff often bragged of his ties to the highest levels of the administration.

One lobbyist recalls Abramoff's frequent refrain when confronting important legislative issues: "I'll call Karl on that."

The Malaysian Embassy did not respond to requests for comment on Abramoff's work.

Bills from the American International Center to the Malaysian Embassy have been turned over to a Senate committee investigating Abramoff's representation of Indian tribes, which he has admitted to defrauding.

Lobbying records show that Abramoff's firm, Greenberg Traurig, received hundreds of thousands of dollars from the center but did not disclose that the funds originated with the government of Malaysia.

According to one of Abramoff's former associates, Abramoff said he did not need to disclose Malaysia as a client on federal lobbying disclosure forms — or to register as a foreign agent with the Justice Department — because the money had come from the American International Center.

Abramoff's lawyer, Abbe Lowell, declined to comment on any aspect of Abramoff's work for Malaysia.

The failure of Abramoff and his colleagues at Greenberg Traurig to register as foreign agents was initially a topic of interest to the Justice Department, which is investigating Abramoff's contacts with lawmakers and executive branch officials as part of an ongoing fraud and bribery case. Abramoff has pleaded guilty in that case and is helping federal prosecutors. But a person familiar with that inquiry said the issue had not been pursued recently, perhaps because the law had many loopholes.

This person, who asked not to be identified because he was not authorized to discuss an ongoing investigation, said Abramoff's relationship with Rove had "not been a matter of any great significance" in the Justice Department inquiry.

The Oval Office meeting with Mahathir, on May 14, 2002, was publicly warm, with Bush praising Mahathir for his "friendship" and "strong support" in the war on terrorism.

The meeting rehabilitated the Malaysian leader's reputation only temporarily, and the appearance of friendliness between the two emerged as a political headache for Bush.

Eight months after the meeting, Mahathir surprised the opening session of the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, by warning the U.S. against its looming invasion of Iraq — "out-terrorizing the terrorists," he called it.

Later that year, he said the U.S. was fighting terrorism "through attacking Muslim countries and Muslims, whether they are guilty or not."

He went on to make anti-Semitic comments, charging that "Jews rule this world" and get "others to fight and die for them."

Democrats charged that Bush was slow to rebuke the prime minister.

DOJ_NMG_0015247

In October 2003, he pulled Mahathir aside at an international economic conference to express his disapproval, calling the remarks "wrong" and "divisive," according to a White House spokesman.

Mahathir later emerged as an issue in Bush's reelection campaign, as Republicans aggressively courted Jewish voters.

One such GOP outreach featured Mahathir pictured beside Democratic presidential nominee Sen. John F. Kerry and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat above a Kerry quote in which he said "foreign leaders" wanted him to win the election. The campaign mailer suggested Mahathir and Arafat, "renowned for their hatred of the Jewish people," supported Kerry.

On one occasion, Abramoff — an orthodox Jew and a supporter of Israel — was asked whether he was comfortable representing a country led by a man known for anti-Semitic comments.

Abramoff responded, "They pay their bills on time."

Jack Who? (WP)

It's not, as photos for a superlobbyist's power wall go, a terribly impressive shot: President Bush, his back to the camera, shaking the hand of Raul Garza, chief of the Kickapoo tribe of Texas. In the foreground, Karl Rove, smiling at a 2001 White House meeting to promote the president's tax cuts. And there at the back of the room, only his slightly blurry head visible, the chief's lobbyist: Jack Abramoff. Which, of course -- along with the refusal of the Bush administration to release information about what Mr. Abramoff was doing at the White House, how often he was there and with whom -- is what makes the picture a big deal.

Kim Eisler of Washingtonian magazine has reported that the disgraced lobbyist met with Mr. Bush almost a dozen times over the past five years and was invited to the president's ranch in Crawford, Tex., in 2003. According to Mr. Abramoff, who raised at least $100,000 for Mr. Bush's reelection, the president was once well acquainted enough with the lobbyist (or at least well briefed enough) to inquire about his twins. But now, as in the photo, Mr. Abramoff somehow has gone blurry in Mr. Bush's memory. The president doesn't recall meeting or posing for pictures with him.

Mr. Rove's memory is fuzzy, too, as luck would have it. His name, according to the Associated Press, was rather routinely dropped by Mr. Abramoff as his big White House contact. Mr. Abramoff's former assistant, Susan Ralston, went to the White House to work for Mr. Rove, and, the Associated Press reported yesterday, Mr. Rove's office helped set up a 2002 meeting between Mr. Bush and the prime minister of Malaysia, another Abramoff client. One Abramoff business associate reported being in the lobbyist's office when Mr. Rove's office called to confirm the meeting.

All of this recalls the question we've been asking for a few weeks now: Why doesn't the White House just release information about Mr. Abramoff's meetings and other visits there? This is a man who has pleaded guilty to trying to bribe public officials. The White House says he turned up for a "few staff level meetings" and two Hanukkah parties. Whom did he meet? About what?

Sensible members of Mr. Bush's own party agree. "I'm one who believes that more is better, in terms of disclosure and transparency," Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) said on "Fox News Sunday." "And so I'd be a big advocate for making records that are out there available." Mr. Bush, said Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), "is a man of unimpeachable integrity. The American people have profound confidence in him. And as Abraham Lincoln said, 'Give the people the facts and republican governance perhaps will be saved.' " Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), speaking on ABC's "This Week," was even blunter. "Get it out. Get it out," Mr. Hagel said. "I mean, disclosure is the real issue. Whether it's campaign finance issues, whether it's ethics issues, whether it's lobbying issues, disclosure is the best and most effective way to deal with all of these things."

Elementary, you would think. But not for this White House.

After Abramoff, Internet Gambling Ban Returns (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, February 15, 2006

Rep. Bob Goodlatte (R-Va.) and other lawmakers on Thursday will re-introduce legislation to ban Internet gambling, a proposal that was blocked nearly six years ago through the efforts of former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, allegedly with help from then-House Majority Whip Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and one of his former top aides.

Goodlatte will be joined on Thursday by Reps. Rick Boucher (D-Va.), Frank Wolf (R-Va.) and other lawmakers as they re-introduce the Internet Gambling Prohibition Act. While Goodlatte's office did not release details on the proposal, the legislation considered by the House in 2000 would have banned nearly all use of the Internet for gambling purposes.

In a press statement announcing his intention to re-introduce the bill, Goodlatte acknowledged the role Abramoff played in stopping the bill six years ago: "The original legislation received support from more than 60 percent of the House of Representatives but fell victim to Abramoff's campaign of misinformation and lacked the two-thirds required for passage under suspension of the rules. Abramoff's total disregard for the legislative process has allowed Internet gambling to continue thriving and it's now a $12 billion industry."

According to the plea agreement Abramoff reached with the Justice Department in early January, Abramoff allegedly sought and received assistance from Tony Rudy, deputy chief of staff to DeLay, at that time the Majority Whip, in blocking the Internet gambling bill. In return, Abramoff allegedly steered $50,000 in 2000 and 2001 through a nonprofit group he was affiliated with to Rudy's wife. Rudy was not named in Abramoff's plea deal, instead being referred to as "Staffer A," although media reports have confirmed his identity. "The total amount paid to the wife of Staffer A was obtained from clients that would and did benefit from Staffer A's official actions regarding the legislation on [I]nternet gambling" and another issue. Rudy has not been charged in the ongoing Abramoff probe.

Rudy allegedly advised Abramoff on how to block the legislation, which was placed on the suspension calendar by House GOP leaders, despite clear majority support for the proposal. Bills considered under suspension need two-thirds support, or 270 votes, to pass, and the Goodlatte bill received only 245 votes when the House considered it on July 17, 2000.

DeLay went on a trip to Scotland with Abramoff in May 2000, shortly before the Internet gambling ban came to the House floor. According to The Washington Post, DeLay's trip, nominally paid for by the National Center for Public Policy Research, was in fact funded at least in part by eLottery, an Abramoff client that was paying the one-time lobbying superstar hundreds of thousands of dollars to defeat the Goodlatte bill.

DeLay has denied any wrongdoing in regards to his dealings with Abramoff, although he had to step down as Majority Leader following Abramoff's decision on Jan. 3 to plead guilty to federal corruption charges. Facing a tough re-election battle, DeLay has told GOP constituents in his district that he and Abramoff were not that close.

3rd Circuit Weighs In On Warrantless Searches (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, February 15, 2006

Police may not "manufacture" an emergency situation to justify the warrantless search of a hotel room, a divided panel of the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled.

The decision in United States v. Coles overturns a conviction for possession of crack cocaine and sharpens a split among the federal circuits in cases where police claim that a warrantless search was justified by "exigent circumstances."

Prosecutors argued that the search of Terrence Coles' hotel room was valid because police heard rustling sounds and a flushing toilet soon after they announced their presence and therefore feared that evidence was being destroyed.

But defense attorney Jeffrey M. Lindy urged the court to focus on earlier events and argued that the police had no excuse for failing to obtain a warrant prior to approaching the hotel door in the first place.

Voting 2-1, the court agreed with Lindy and held that the investigative tactics used by the officers had "impermissibly manufactured the exigency."

Senior U.S. Circuit Judge Leonard I. Garth noted that the agents at first used "subterfuge" to gain entry to the hotel room by falsely claiming they were "room service," and later that they were maintenance workers sent to fix a leak.

It was only after those two attempts failed, Garth noted, that the officers identified themselves as police and then heard the toilet flushing.

"In identifying themselves as hotel personnel providing 'room service' or 'maintenance,' the police resorted to subterfuge, clearly manifesting their intention to mislead the occupants into believing that they were not police officers," Garth wrote in an opinion joined by 3rd Circuit Judge Julio M. Fuentes.

"At the very least," Garth wrote, "the actions of the officers at this time demonstrated that the police had no intention of merely investigating matters further or perhaps obtaining consent to search. As the record plainly indicates, the officers decided to enter [the] room ... without a warrant. It was that decision to conduct a warrantless entry and search of the room, without any urgent need to do so, that impermissibly created the very exigency relied upon by the government in this case."

Garth noted that the police had Coles' room under constant surveillance and had no reason to believe that Coles had detected their presence.

But in dissent, 3rd Circuit Judge Jane R. Roth complained that the majority was misreading a U.S. Supreme Court decision and that its holding "imposes a standard for police behavior that is not derived from the Constitution."

Roth said she would have upheld the search because none of the actions by police had violated the Fourth Amendment prior to their hearing the flushing toilet.

According to court papers, Coles checked into the Hawthorne Suites Hotel in Philadelphia in June 2002, initially saying he was staying for a weekend, but later saying he would stay for 10 days.

After about a week, a hotel manager sought out Coles to discuss payment and let himself into Coles' room to determine if it was still occupied.

The manager testified that he called the FBI because he suspected he had seen evidence of drug dealing, including plastic bags, vials and a white substance.

When agents arrived, the manager unlocked Coles' room and allowed the agents to enter.

Prosecutors conceded that the first entry by the officers was illegal and insisted they were not relying on anything seen during that search.

Instead, they said, police set up a surveillance post in a room across the hall and later watched as Coles and another man entered the room, one carrying a backpack.

Garth found that the officers then decided to enter the room despite not having a warrant, but that their first attempts at subterfuge failed.

When an officer knocked and announced that he was "room service," Coles told him he had not ordered anything and refused to open the door.

The same officer later knocked again and said he was from maintenance and was sent to fix a reported leak. But Coles again refused to open the door, saying there was no leak.

Finally, the officer knocked a third time, more forcefully, identifying himself as a police officer and telling the occupants to "open the door, this is the police."

At that point, officers testified that they heard the sounds of rustling and running footsteps. One officer attempted to open the door using an electronic passkey, but was unable to gain access because there was a bar latch over the door.

After partially opening the door, officers said they heard the sound of a toilet flushing and the sounds of more running.

Coles eventually opened the door, and officers testified that they discovered several containers of crack cocaine and $2,000 in cash.

After Coles was indicted, Lindy moved to suppress the search, but Chief U.S. District Judge Harvey Bartle III refused, concluding that police had exigent circumstances -- the imminent destruction of the evidence -- that justified the warrantless search.

Now the 3rd Circuit has reversed, finding that an exigent circumstances rationale cannot be used where police themselves unreasonably create the emergency.

Garth found that since the police already had probable cause -- based on the hotel manager's statements -- they could have obtained a search warrant.

Prosecutors argued that the police properly used a "knock and talk" investigative tactic and forced their way into the room only when they became aware that Coles and his cohort were destroying evidence.

Garth disagreed, saying that since police already had all the probable cause they needed, they had "no legitimate reason to utilize the 'knock and talk' procedure."

The evidence, Garth said, showed there was "no urgency or need for the officers to take immediate action."

Instead, Garth said, it was only when the officers knocked on the door the third time and announced their presence that they heard sounds indicating that evidence was being flushed down the toilet.

"But that exigency did not arise naturally or from reasonable police investigative tactics," Garth said. "Quite to the contrary, the officers, after their pretextual announcements had failed to gain entry to [the] room ... deliberately created the exigency by knocking on the door ... and demanding entry."

But in dissent, Roth complained that "the majority's decision to focus the exigency analysis on the subjective intent of the investigating officers, and the subsequent, haphazard reaction the investigation generates on the part of the alleged criminal, produces the 'could've, should've, would've' analysis that is so anathema to our judicial role."

Roth said the majority had ignored the point that "knocking and attempting to engage a person in conversation are not violations of the Fourth Amendment," and likewise that entry into a dwelling in the face of exigent circumstances when the police have probable cause is also not a violation of the Fourth Amendment.

"The majority feels, however, that these two otherwise constitutional actions performed in sequence are greater than the sum of their parts and, therefore, constitute a violation of the Fourth Amendment because the police could have and, consequently, should have waited to obtain a warrant," Roth wrote.

Roth said she would have taken a different approach, focusing on the legality of each instance in which the police interacted with Coles.

"Since none of the three interactions violated the Fourth Amendment, and since entry was made only on hearing the toilet flushing, I would affirm the district court's denial of Coles' motion to suppress the physical evidence," Roth wrote.

FBI Operative In Waltz Says Legislators Attended Party In Miami (AP)

AP, February 15, 2006

A former federal agent testified today in Chattanooga that he took at least two Tennessee lawmakers to a yacht party in Miami while posing as an executive for a fake company seeking favorable legislation.

Joseph Carroll, an FBI retiree, did not identify the two who attended the party in 2004.

He testified at the trial of Hamilton County Commissioner William Cotton. He is accused of conspiring with former lobbyist Charles Love to obtain about $4,800 in bribes in return for supporting a resolution to benefit E-Cycle, a phony company the FBI created to seek government favors.

Carroll worked on the Tennessee Waltz investigation that led to charges against seven current or former elected officials and two so-called "bag men."

Earlier today, prosecutor John MacCoon said Cotton took bribes from a courier, or "bagman," in what he called "a corrupt politician's dream."

First Trial In Tenn. Corruption Starts (AP)

By Bill Poovey

AP, February 15, 2006

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn. -- The first trial in a public corruption sting dubbed the "Tennessee Waltz" started Tuesday, with a federal prosecutor telling jurors secretly recorded tapes would show how a county commissioner took bribes.

Hamilton County Commissioner William Cotton is accused of taking $4,750 in bribes in return for supporting a resolution to benefit a phony company created by the FBI.

Cotton, 58, is charged with attempted extortion and conspiracy to attempt extortion.

Seven officials _ including five current or former state lawmakers _ have been indicted in connection with the undercover sting that became public in May. The scandal lead to a special session of the Legislature, which passed a sweeping ethics reform bill earlier this month creating an independent ethics commission, restricting lobbyists and capping cash political contributions.

In his opening statement at the trial Tuesday, Assistant U.S. Attorney John MacCoon said Cotton took bribes from a courier, or "bagman," in what he called "a corrupt politician's dream."

Cotton's attorney, Hank Hill, countered that the prosecution's case would not offer any testimony from the alleged bagman, Charles Love, a former lobbyist who pleaded guilty to delivering payoffs to a state senator.

"The one thing missing from the government's proof is Love," Hill said. "They have chosen not to bring him in. They have chosen not to indict him in this case."

William Cotton Trial Is Underway (WTVC-TV)

By Tracie Grant

WTVC-TV, Channel 9, February 15, 2006

By mid-morning a jury was picked to hear the case against William Cotton...

Shortly after that, attorneys presented their sides of the public corruption case. Both with very different takes on the charges, the proof and what allegedly happened between William Cotton and Charles Love.

The Government says they will show that Hamilton County Commissioner William Cotton knowingly took $4,750 in bribe money for favorable legislation and tried to cover it up. The defense says that no FBI undercover agent ever directly gave money to Cotton and told the jury they would hear a lot of inuendios but no actual proof of corruption.

Prosecutors say Cotton and Hamilton County former school board member Charles Love took bribes, discussed how to do it and not get caught. Leamon Pierce was at the courthouse today to back him up. The Government says Love went to South Florida working as a consulatant for E-Cycle Management, a computer recycling company when in reality it was a front for the FBI sting.

The Government says Love met with E Cycle Management at the Palms Hotel in South Miami Beach and five to six people indicted in Operation Tennessee Waltz including State Legislators met on a luxury yacht but not William Cotton.

The Defenses strategy includes not calling Love to testify, believing that Cotton felt the deal was legitimate, and to disreguard phrases from the undercover agents. The Government says it will show Love and Cotton discussing how to split the money, how much they would get, and how to use it. And how they split $6,000 in a Nashville meeting.

The agent who posed as management of the E Cycle Corporation testified this afternoon and said that Love was in fact untruthful. The Government says that Love had no knowledge that he was wirtetapped and that the sting was underway. If Cotton is convicted, he is looking at a range of zero to twenty years on each of these three counts.

The trial is expected to wrap up this Thursday.

Cotton Called "Corrupt Politician" Who Took Bribes (CHATT)

Chattanoogan, February 15, 2006

Attorney Hill Says Taped Comments Of Commissioner "Taken Out Of Context"

Prosecutor John MacCoon told a federal jury Tuesday that County Commissioner William Cotton is "a corrupt politician" who took bribes from a bogus company that turned out to be operated by the FBI.

In the first trial in the FBI's wide-ranging "Operation Tennessee Waltz," the prosecutor said tapes of Cotton and former County School Board member Charles Love revealed that they considered the operation was something "that fell into their lap. They did what corrupt politicians do. They talked about splitting up the money and how much they were going to get."

But defense attorney Hank Hill said Cotton statements on the tape that appear to be incriminating are "taken out of context." He said Cotton was actually counseling Love about being above board and asking for checks instead of cash.

Attorney Hill lambasted Love as "a con man, a thief and a liar. He even conned the FBI. He stole from the government."

Judge Allan Edgar is overseeing the trial in which Cotton faces a charge of bribery conspiracy and two counts of attempted extortion. He could face up to 20 years in prison if convicted.

A jury of five women and seven men as well as two male alternates was chosen late Tuesday morning, then opening statements were given prior to the lunch break. Three of the jurors are black.

Prosecutor MacCoon told the jurors, "You are about to see public corruption - politicians caught in the act of taking bribes."

He said the sting operation started in West Tennessee, then was expanded across the state, bringing charges against state legislators, including Sen. Ward Crutchfield, down to county officials.

Prosecutor MacCoon said a bogus company called E-Cycle Management was set up by FBI agents. The firm purported to be in the business of paying governments for used electronic equipment, then shipping the equipment overseas for recycling. He said the agents offered money to legislators and commissioners for favorable legislation.

He told the jury that the probe eventually led to those, including Love and Cotton, "who were willing to take a little money to grease the skids."

He said a state legislator told E-Cycle that Charles Love is "the guy to see in East Tennessee. He can fix you up with certain people."

The prosecutor said Love "identified certain people who were willing to take bribes. One he identified was William Cotton."

He said Love eventually "took bundles of bribe money to William Cotton."

He said two FBI agents who took the names of Joe Carson and John Morrow began working with Love and Cotton. He said the agents were wired, and he said they later got a court order to bug Love's cellphone. He said Love was not working with the government during the probe.

Prosecutor MacCoon said Love and Cotton "worked on getting their story straight," and he said, "William Cotton for $1,700 said he's ready to move on it."

He said Love was to set up an office and get monthly payments from E-Cycle.

The prosecutor said "Morrow" met with Love and Cotton at the Southside Grill in Chattanooga on Jan. 20, 2005, and passed Love an envelope containing $3,500 in cash while they were at a table eating. He said Love gave Cotton half the money out in the parking lot, then Cotton called to thank "Morrow," telling him, "You got a friend for life, Doc."

He said Cotton later said to Love, "You can tell your boys to get ready to bring that package in here. I hope it's bigger than the first one."

Prosecutor MacCoon said Cotton admonished Love about being so open about getting the cash, saying he should have gotten the envelope at the Southside Grill in the restroom rather than at the table.

He said Cotton told Love "that's how they got Gass." The prosecutor said that referred to the late Charles Gass, a County Commissioner who was convicted in 1988 of bribery in the same courtroom where Cotton is being tried.

Cotton stated, "I don't trust nobody."

The prosecutor said the jurors will see a video of $6,000 being passed to Love and Cotton in an envelope at a meeting last Feb. 21. He said in exchange "Cotton agreed to push the E-Cycle agenda before the County Commission."

He said Cotton once again called to thank the E-Cycle representative, who asked, "Is there any doubt you can do it?" Cotton replied, "Unless I get struck by lightning." Cotton said, "I'll do my part. I will do what I can to get it through."

Attorney Hill told the jury that one person is missing from the trial - Charles Love. He said, "They've chosen not to bring him in to testify and chosen not to indict him in this case." Love pleaded guilty earlier on other aspects of Operation Tennessee Waltz and is awaiting sentencing.

Attorney Hill said Love "is their bagman, not William Cotton's."

He said the E-Cycle pitch sounded "like a fantastic idea - a win-win." He said governments were going to get paid for items they were having to pay to get rid of, and it would also help free up landfill space.

He said County Mayor Claude Ramsey had one meeting with E-Cycle, and he said, "Great, guys, this is a niche. I love this kind of entrepreneurial spirit."

Attorney Hill said, "It was never the case that Claude Ramsey did anything improper. There is no indication that William Cotton did either."

He said the legislator who led the agents to Love was former Rep. Brenda Turner. But he said Ms. Turner advised them to "stay away from Charles Love. He's dangerous."

Joe Carroll, a retired FBI agent, testified that he took a contract position with the FBI to take part in the sting. He said the FBI had information on bribes going to government officials. He said, "We decided the best way to go about it was to set up a dummy company."

He said E-Cycle Management was to be based in Atlanta with offices in Memphis and Nashville. It was to ship used electronic equipment to the port of New Orleans for shipment to the Phillipines, where the equipment was to be reworked and resold.

He said it actually "made no sense from a business point of view."

He said another FBI agent was the vice president and a third was chief financial officer.

Agt. Carroll said the group found a contact in West Tennessee who introduced them to a number of legislators, including some who agreed to accept bribes.

He said it was during a meeting with then-Rep. Turner that he met Love, who was working in her campaign. He said, "Shortly thereafter, he contacted me about being our representative in East Tennessee."

Agt. Carroll said, "We basically interviewed Mr. Love to determine -being a lobbyist who had various contacts - could he lead us to criminal wrongdoing that he was either involved in or had knowledge of."

He said Love began to introduce them to legislators "who would take bribes for assisting us in passing favorable legislation." He said E-Cycle "made several payoffs to legislators in this area."

Agt. Carroll said it was learned that Love "on occasions would steal money from us and not give the total payment to legislators. We watched Mr. Love as closely as possible through various means."

He said the legislators would get "half or whatever Mr. Love decided to keep for himself."

Agt. Carroll said he got Love to confirm several times the amounts he had allegedly given to others, but he said he did not believe all that money actually did get transferred to those it was intended for.

He said during one conversation with Love the subject came up about Hamilton County officials. He said Love brought up Cotton's name several times.

He said Love said he "was on good terms with about four county commissioners." He listed Cotton, JoAnne Favors, Richard Casavant and Charlotte Vandergriff."

On cross examination, attorney Hill said, "You fooled a lot of people." The agent answered, "I was playing a role."

He said some of the legislators Love took E-Cycle to "didn't require any money." He said in those cases, no money was paid.

He was asked if Love is "a con man." He said, "Mr. Love is a lobbyist. Mr. Love is well liked."

He said it was set up that Love would get monthly payments from E-Cycle. He told of Love being among a group invited to a meeting on a large yacht at Miami, and he said Love was put up at the Palms Hotel.

A video was shown of a meeting with Love at the Marriott in Chattanooga. It shows Love being handed bundles of $100 bills.

The agent said Love "was to give money to a representative at dinner that night."

Prosecutors said they could make Love available as a witness if the defense wanted him. Attorney Hill said it was too late at this point. He said he was advised Love is working at an auto plant in Birmingham, but he didn't know exactly where.

A tape was played of a conversation between Agt. Carroll and Love in Miami. Agt. Carroll, posing as the E-Cycle president, mentioned several legislators that Love was working with, including Sen. Crutchfield, state Sen. David Fowler, R-Signal Mountain; state Sen. Jeff Miller, R-Cleveland, Rep. Tre Hargett, R-Memphis, and several others.

According to the tape, $3,000 had been paid by E-Cycle to Sen. Crutchfield.

They joked about Sen. Crutchfield being paid $150,000 as an attorney for the County School Board, while not handling many of their cases. He actually was paid $53,985.

He said in one conversation with Love he emphasized that he was "trying to get him directed where the FBI wanted to concentrate - not to solicit payments - but on people he had made payments to in the past."

Brian Burns, who is with the FBI in Memphis, said he is "the case agent who initiated the Tennessee Waltz investigation."

He said the initial focus was "on some corruption in the Juvenile Court Clerk's office in Memphis." He said an individual who had been paying bribes agreed to begin working with the FBI.

He said it grew to a probe of "basically systematic corruption through various levels of government throughout Tennessee."

Agt. Burns said during the sting the FBI "was not allowed to visit government officials, throw money at them and see if they take it." He said the focus was on those viewed to be "pre-disposed to criminal conduct."

He said Love made a statement to an informant on tape that "in the past he had made bribe payments."

Agt. Burns said it was decided to wiretap Love's phone. He said that is a drastic action that is not often taken. He said it requires several levels of review, including the main FBI office in Washington, and a federal judge must approve it. He said the wiretap order is for 30 days, and a report must be given to the judge every 10 days.

He said the wiretap for the Love phone was obtained Jan. 11, 2005, and it was renewed for a second month. He said a conversation was taped between Love and Cotton on Jan. 16, 2005.

On the tape, Love explained to Cotton about the E-Cycle operation. Cotton said he served as telecommunications chairman of a seven-state group, and he might get some business for E-Cycle there. He also said he had contacts in cities like Cleveland and Knoxville, noting that a deputy in the mayor's office in Knoxville is a relative of his aide, Sandra Weaver.

Love said he was being supplied $1,700 by E-Cycle to set up an office. He said he wanted to rent a portion of the building owned by Cotton at 3801 Alton Park Blvd.

Judge Orders Iraqi Deported (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 15, 2006

A federal immigration judge in Seattle yesterday ordered the deportation of an Iraqi national with ties to a senior al Qaeda operative suspected of helping plan the attack on the USS Cole in Yemen in 2000 and the bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) spokesman Dean Boyd said U.S. Immigration Judge Kenneth Josephson ordered Sam Malkandi of Kirkland, Wash., removed from the United States. Judge Josephson based his decision on evidence presented by ICE attorneys during hearings that concluded earlier this month, Mr. Boyd said.

Mr. Boyd said ICE attorneys accused Mr. Malkandi of committing fraud against the U.S. government to obtain immigration benefits for himself and his family.

He said the attorneys also introduced evidence, some of which was referenced in the September 11 commission report, that Mr. Malkandi used fraud in an attempt to obtain a U.S. visa for Tawfiq bin Attash, a one-legged al Qaeda operative also known as "Khallad." A trusted lieutenant and former bodyguard of al Qaeda founder Osama bin Laden, bin Attash is suspected of planning the embassy bombings and the Cole attack.

Mr. Boyd said the evidence linking Mr. Malkandi to the al Qaeda operative surfaced in 2003 after bin Attash was captured in Karachi, Pakistan, and turned over to U.S. authorities.

The September 11 commission report said bin Attash told U.S. officials in August 2003 that a person in Bothell, Wash., whose name sounded like "Barzan," had tried to help him obtain a visa to enter the United States. U.S. officials concluded that "Barzan" was a Bothell man named Sarbaz Mohammad, who changed his name to Sam Malkandi in 2001.

Mr. Boyd said an investigation by ICE and FBI agents on the Seattle Joint Terrorism Task Force determined that "Barzan" and Mr. Malkandi were the same person. Among other things, he said, federal agents were able to obtain documents showing that Mr. Malkandi had made arrangements with a clinic in Bellevue, Wash., for bin Attash, under an alias, to obtain a new prosthetic foot in 1999.

Bin Attash was never able to come to the United States because his visa application was denied, Mr. Boyd said.

ICE agents arrested Mr. Malkandi in August on fraud charges. He was accused of falsely claiming to have been incarcerated in Iran for possession of prohibited political materials, which originally qualified him for refugee status to enter the United States in June 1998.

"We are gratified that justice has prevailed in this case," said Dorothy Stefan, chief counsel for ICE in Seattle.

Under the law, Mr. Malkandi has 30 days to appeal Judge Josephson's decision. In the meantime, ICE continues to hold him without bail.

Committee Vote Drops Matter Of DeBerry Cash (TENN)

By TRENT SEIBERT, Staff Writer

Tennessean, February 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0015254

An ethics complaint against Tennessee House Speaker Pro Tem Lois DeBerry, D-Memphis, died in the House Ethics Committee yesterday.

Because seven votes are needed to launch an investigation, and only six on the Democratic-controlled committee voted in favor, committee chairwoman Rep. Kim McMillan, D- Clarksville, said, "I declare the matter concluded."

The vote was the second time the committee failed to act on the complaint alleging DeBerry broke House ethics rules by accepting $200 at a casino from an undercover FBI agent. Actions of the committee require seven votes to pass.

DeBerry took the money and other gifts during a trip to Tunica, Miss., that turned out to be part of the FBI's Operation Tennessee Waltz bribery sting. The undercover operation has since resulted in nine arrests, but DeBerry is not among them.

DeBerry's admission in late July that she took money from E-Cycle was a reversal of what she had told The Tennessean two weeks before when she said she had taken no cash from the company.

"No, no," DeBerry said in a July 13 interview.

"I mean, cash would have been a red flag, anyway. And you learn from other people that have gone through this kind of stuff, and you know that any time somebody offers you cash, that a red flag ... should have gone up."

In her first committee appearance, she told the Ethics Committee in a prepared statement that her trip was a "lapse in judgment."

A partisan vote in that committee delayed action on DeBerry.

In addition, the committee delayed until Thursday acting on an ethics complaint against Rep. Judd Matheny, R-Tullahoma.

Matheny is accused by Rep. Phillip Pinion, D-Union City, of ethics violations because he directed a company from his district to distribute contributions to key legislators a week after accepting a $5,000 campaign contribution from it.

Included with the checks was a letter from Matheny written on his campaign stationery.

Matheny has said he did nothing wrong and was merely helping a constituent in his district. ·

Witnesses: Didn't See Mayor Get Cash (AJC)

By Beth Warren , Jeffry Scott, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 15, 2006

There was more testimony Tuesday about lewd body positions of strippers, machine guns and arson than about any evidence directly linking former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell to bribes.

Once again, government witnesses testified that thousands of dollars in bribes were passed directly to Campbell's former aide Dewey Clark — not to the mayor himself.

In four weeks of testimony, Clark has been the only witness who has said cash bribes from city contractors were passed directly to the mayor's hands.

Prosecutors say Clark was a key bagman who squeezed city contractors on behalf of Campbell and handed the cash to the mayor for use on exotic trips with girlfriends and gambling jaunts with buddies.

Campbell insists he is innocent, and his defense team has portrayed Clark as a greedy wannabe who used the mayor's name to line his own pockets.

Clark testified that he also passed money from Atlanta strip club owner Michael Childs, who wanted the mayor to approve a liquor license for a controversial new night club, Strawberries.

Childs, an admitted arsonist and convicted felon whom the FBI caught plotting to beat up Campbell after the mayor didn't approve the liquor license, has yet to appear on the stand.

Instead, prosecutors Tuesday called Childs' former attorney, Alan Begner, who testified that the club owner told him he had passed a bribe through Clark to the mayor.

"Childs said he was giving money to the mayor through Dewey," Begner said.

As in the case of several other witnesses who have been called by the prosecution, Begner acknowledged under cross-examination that he didn't know whether the money ever made it to the mayor.

Defense attorney Billy Martin also set out to question Childs' credibility given his criminal past, which includes a bribery conviction and a prison sentence for setting fire to competing strip clubs.

Prosecutors have argued that Campbell sat on Childs' liquor license application for Strawberries for nearly eight months, which infuriated Childs.

Former City Attorney Hakim Hilliard testified Tuesday that Childs complained, "I gave the mayor $50,000 to his campaign, and I don't know why he's doing this to me."

Hilliard said Childs identified Dewey Clark as the one who passed the money on to the mayor.

Hilliard said he had his doubts about Childs' story, but he called the city attorney's office to report the allegation against the mayor just in case.

DOJ_NMG_0015255

Prosecutors allege that the mayor retaliated and revoked the liquor license at Childs' Club Nikki V.I.P. and denied his liquor license request for Strawberries.

Martin, however, said the mayor opposed Childs' strip clubs for several reasons, including allegations of body positions of strippers so lewd they were illegal, two shootings — including one fatality — and suspected cocaine dealing, prostitution and pimping.

Another witness, businessman George Greene, formerly the owner of city contractor Sable Communications, testified Tuesday that he had given bribes to Clark, who was living in the basement apartment of the mayor's Inman Park home, with the understanding that Clark was giving it to Campbell.

Greene, however, said he never directly gave Campbell money, although he did once have a coded conversation with the mayor, asking him if he had recieved the "package" — a $750 bribe — that he had given to Clark.

He said the mayor looked annoyed and told him: "Next time that happens, you call."

On cross-examination by Martin, Greene said the mayor never asked him for a bribe or talked about bribes.

"Did you know if that money [$750] ever left Dewey's pocket?" Martin asked.

"No," Greene said.

Prosecution Dealt Blow In Trial (WXIA)

WXIA-TV, February 15, 2006

Government prosecutors in the corruption trial of former Atlanta mayor Bill Campbell will not be allowed to present evidence about two wallets filled with cash.

The government had planned to present two witnesses on Wednesday, Vertis McManis and Joe Reid, who admit they handled the cash bribes. The government's theory is that one wallet was given to Campbell.

But on Tuesday afternoon, Judge Richard Storey ruled there was no evidence that Campbell got the money, and ruled the testimony would not be allowed.

Earlier in the day on Tuesday, government witness George Greene testified about bribes he said he gave a bagman that were intended for Campbell.

Green says he gave Campbell $5,000, calling it a bribe disguised as a speaking fee. Green has previously served jail time for bribing Fulton County officials.

Green testified that on occasion, Campbell associate Dewey Clark would approach him and say that the mayor needed money. Green told the jury that on three occasions, he provided money.

A second witness shed some doubt on other allegations of bribes. Former Atlanta city attorney Hakim Hilliard testified he talked to Clark.

On the stand, Hilliard said, “I asked how he knew Dewey gave the money to the mayor. He looked puzzled and said, ‘I trust Dewey’.”

When Campbell’s lawyers queried Hilliard on cross-examination, asking if he believed Clark, Hilliard replied, “In my mind, I questioned it.”

The Campbell trial is now in its fourth week.

Author Testifies In Illinois Governor Case (BOS/AP)

By Mike Robinson, Associated Press Writer

The Boston Globe, February 15, 2006

CHICAGO --The nun whose best seller "Dead Man Walking" marked her as a leading opponent of capital punishment took the stand at George Ryan's conspiracy trial Tuesday and described the former Illinois governor as "a man of honesty and integrity."

"I find in him a man who is willing to look at public policy issues, even if it means growth and change," Sister Helen Prejean testified during Ryan's racketeering and conspiracy trial.

Federal Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer barred the 66-year-old nun from mentioning the issue that brought her together with Ryan -- the movement to repeal the death penalty in America.

Pallmeyer ruled the issue was irrelevant to charges that Ryan steered big-money state contracts and leases to friends and got free vacations and gifts in return.

Prejean testified that she had repeatedly met with Ryan to discuss "public policy" and "social policy" issues.

Under cross-examination by lead prosecutor Patrick M. Collins, Prejean flashed humor.

"As a product of Catholic education, it's every schoolboy's dream to cross-examine a nun," Collins said with a broad grin.

"You'd better mind your p's and q's, young man, or Sister Godzilla will haunt you for the rest of your life," Prejean said as the courtroom cracked up.

Questioned further, she admitted that she was unfamiliar with the charges against Ryan and knew nothing about his relations with co-defendant Larry Warner and other friends and lobbyists who prosecutors allege showered him with valuables.

Ryan and Warner say they did nothing illegal when Ryan was secretary of state for eight years in the 1990s and governor for four years starting in 1999.

Before leaving office in January 2003, Ryan commuted the death sentences of 167 inmates to life in prison and pardoned four others, declaring the state's capital justice system "haunted by the demon of error." Three years earlier he halted all executions in Illinois over fears that a flawed system had led to the wrongful convictions of 13 death row inmates.

"Dead Man Walking," published in 1993, tells the story of Prejean's work as spiritual adviser to a death row inmate. It later was made into a movie.

Janitor Got Holiday Cash (AP)

AP, February 15, 2006

CHICAGO (AP) — George Ryan wasn't the only one who got a share of the cash flowing around the Statehouse in Springfield over the Christmas holidays when he was governor.

The janitor once portrayed as a possible victim of a plan to grind cash Christmas gifts for Ryan out of low-paid state employees said Monday that he was sharing in the yuletide money, himself, and the source was the governor's own campaign fund.

"No arms were twisted," janitor Don Skoda told Ryan's racketeering and fraud trial.

Although his memory was hazy at first, Skoda eventually acknowledged that he would receive $50 checks from Citizens for Ryan just before Christmas and make a cash gift to Ryan of $15 or $25.

His testimony at Ryan's corruption trial put a new light on a controversy that arose two weeks ago when word of the cash Christmas gifts state employees gave Ryan first surfaced.

Real Estate Expert Says Ryan's Pal Gave State A Good Deal On Lease (AP)

AP, February 15, 2006

CHICAGO A real estate expert testifying at George Ryan's fraud trial says the state got a good deal on property it leased from the former governor's host on annual free vacations in Jamaica.Hugh Edfors told jurors today that another appraiser who testified for the government used flawed methods in concluding that the state paid too much under the lease.The building in South Holland was owned by businessman Harry Klein. He treated Ryan, his wife and some of his supporters to free vacations in Jamaica for years when Ryan was secretary of state.Prosecutors contend Ryan was paying Klein back for his hospitality when he leased the South Holland property as a truck drivers licensing center.But Ryan's defense attorneys say Ryan wasn't doing Klein a special favor because the taxpayers paid the going rate.

Paper Report Possible Petro Probe (AP)

AP, February 15, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio (AP) - Two Akron lawyers who say their firms lost much of their legal work for the state because they refused to donate to Attorney General Jim Petro's campaign said they have been contacted by the FBI about the accusations.

Attorney Ray Weber said Tuesday that he spoke with FBI officials last week about his allegations first published Jan. 29 in The (Cleveland) Plain Dealer.

Jack Morrison, who says Petro told him that his firm would lose state legal contracts because of donations to another candidate in the 2002 race, told the Dayton Daily News he was scheduled to speak with Akron FBI officials on Wednesday.

Petro, a Republican candidate for governor, has denied the accusations. Spokeswoman Kim Norris said federal authorities have not contacted his office.

"No one has contacted us, nor do we expect to be contacted, regarding these false, politically motivated allegations," Norris said.

Scott Wilson, spokesman for the FBI's Cleveland office, would not comment.

Morrison, a lawyer with the Akron firm Amer Cunningham, has said Petro told him at a campaign fundraiser that he would lose his state work but would have a chance to get it back if he made contributions.

Messages were left Tuesday seeking further comment from Morrison.

Amer Cunningham received $356,827 in state legal work in fiscal 2003, but the amount fell to $29,368 last year, The Plain Dealer's analysis of state records showed.

Weber's firm, Renner Kenner Greive Bobak Taylor & Weber, received $3.7 million in state contracts from 1999 to 2003. In 2004, that dropped to $300.

Weber said he believes his firm lost its patent work for the University of Akron and Kent State University because it refused a series of fundraising requests from Petro's campaign.

"I've never met him, I have nothing against him personally, but I think what he did with the intellectual property of these two universities was somewhat outrageous," Weber said.

Petro has said the firms lost work because of their ties to Summit County GOP Chairman Alex Arshinkoff. Morrison is Arshinkoff's personal attorney.

In the past, the state work had been awarded on the suggestion Arshinkoff, Norris said. Petro cut back on the firms' work on the recommendation of his deputy who said continually giving the same offices contracts could damage his reputation for independence and integrity.

Petro's campaign also was accused of trading campaign donations for state legal work in an affidavit filed in December in Cuyahoga County Common Pleas Court. In that statement, Columbus attorney Kevin O'Brien said Petro's chief fundraiser, Amy Gravengaard, told him legal work for the state was available for a $25,000 donation.

Petro's campaign said the allegation was false, and Gravengaard denied it.

FBI Probes Petro Contract Charges (CLPD)

By Ted Wendling And Sandy Theis, Plain Dealer Bureau

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, February 15, 2006

Lawyers: No campaign aid, no work

Columbus

-- The FBI has opened an inquiry into a report that Ohio Attorney General Jim Petro took lucrative state legal work away from two Akron law firms after their principals refused to contribute to his campaign.

Akron lawyers Jack Morrison and Ray Weber said they have been contacted by FBI agents and the Summit County prosecutor's office as a result of comments they made in a Jan. 29 Plain Dealer story.

Both lawyers said Petro punished them in 2002 for not supporting his campaign by withdrawing special-counsel contracts they had received from former Attorney General Betty Montgomery to handle patent and intellectual- property mat ters.

Weber said two FBI agents interviewed him for two hours on Thursday. Morrison said he agreed to meet with agents today.

FBI spokesman Scott Wilson would not comment, but Weber said the agents called the interview a "fact-finding" inquiry. Morrison said an agent told him it was part of a continuing probe.

"He said, We're not initiating a new investigation; this is part of an ongoing matter,' " Morrison said.

Petro's spokeswoman, Kim Norris, said Petro is neither surprised nor alarmed by the inquiry. Petro denies the charges and contends that they were ginned up by Summit County Republican Party Chairman Alex Arshinkoff, with whom Petro has feuded, to damage Petro's campaign for governor. Morrison is Arshinkoff's personal attorney.

"I don't think it's unusual that they would contact anybody who made comments in the paper, but that does not mean there is an investigation under way," Norris said. "No one has contacted us, nor do we expect to be contacted because these are politically motivated allegations."

Petro has been dogged by complaints that he has used the special counsel program as a fund-raising ATM, collecting hundreds of thousands of dollars from lawyers after awarding them unbid contracts.

Greg Coleridge, a member of an Akron social-justice organization who has been outspoken on campaign finance reform, noted that Columbus attorney Kevin O'Brien previously provided a sworn affidavit alleging that Petro's fund-raiser offered him special-counsel work in exchange for campaign contributions.

In complaints that Coleridge filed Jan. 31 with the Justice Department and Franklin County prosecutor, he also accused Petro of "laundering" campaign money through county party accounts.

Records obtained by The Plain Dealer show that Petro and other GOP officeholders have circumvented contribution limits by directing donors to give millions of dollars to state and county parties with the understanding that the money would be earmarked for their campaigns.

Morrison is the first person to publicly accuse Petro of personally overseeing a pay-to-play scheme.

"He said, I want you to know that you and your firm are going to be very unhappy with me next year,' " Morrison said. " I've got to support those who were loyal to me, and you weren't. You supported [former state Treasurer Joe] Deters, and as a consequence you're going to lose all your work, but if you guys want to get on board . . . you can make some contributions, but you're going to sit out a year.'

"I looked at him and I said, So blow the winds of politics. Sometimes you win and sometimes you lose.'

Calif. Prison Guard Convicted Of Aiding Racist Prison Gang (AP)

AP, February 15, 2006

LOS ANGELES -- A former prison guard was convicted Tuesday of aiding a white supremacist inmate gang known as the Nazi Low Riders.

Prosecutors said Shayne Allyn Ziska, 44, helped the gang distribute methamphetamine, heroin and other drugs at the California Institute for Men in Chino.

Ziska was convicted of participating in a corrupt organization's conspiracy, violent crime in the aid of racketeering and deprivation of rights under color of law, said federal prosecutor Adam D. Kamenstein said.

He also was found Ziska guilty of allowing a gang member to stab an inmate.

Ziska faces up to 50 years in federal prison when he is sentenced May 8.

Ziska was placed on administrative leave from the prison in 2000 because of a California Department of Corrections investigation that was later turned over to the FBI.

Kamenstein declined to say what prompted the probe.

Ex-guard Convicted In Gang Case (RPE)

By GREGOR McGAVIN, The Press-Enterprise

Riverside (CA) Press-Enterprise, February 15, 2006

A former prison guard from Fontana was found guilty Tuesday on federal racketeering charges for helping a white-supremacist gang deal drugs and assault other inmates at the California Institution for Men in Chino.

Shayne Allyn Ziska, 44, faces a maximum of 50 years in federal prison when he is sentenced May 8.

Prosecutors said Ziska, who worked at the prison from 1984 until 2000, helped the Nazi Low Riders deal heroin and methamphetamine inside the prison in the 1990s and let gang members jump two inmates, stabbing one underneath the eye and slicing another's neck.

After a two-week trial at U.S. District Court in Los Angeles, District Judge Terry Hatter Jr. found Ziska guilty of federal conspiracy and racketeering and depriving inmates of their rights.

"He helped them do what they wanted to do in prison and they helped him do what he wanted to do," Assistant U.S. Attorney Adam Kamenstein said by telephone.

Kamenstein said prosecutors do not believe Ziska profited monetarily from aiding the gang.

"We believe that the defendant shared in the philosophy and ideology" of the racist gang, he said.

According to the Anti-Defamation League, the Nazi Low Riders originated in California's juvenile prison system in the 1970s and gained power by an alliance with the Aryan Brotherhood, an older white-supremacist prison gang.

Ziska's conviction is the latest in an FBI effort to weaken the Nazi Low Riders' power within the prison system. The federal Department of Justice said the gang is responsible for a large number of the crimes committed by white inmates.

A continuing investigation has led to at least a dozen indictments, including eight convictions, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

Kamenstein would not say whether other guards at the Chino prison have been investigated.

He said 10 former inmates from Chino -- including former Nazi Low Riders and skinheads -- and two guards testifed against Ziska.

Ziska, who was placed on administrative leave in 2000, had worked in the prison's reception area, where inmates are taken before they are assigned to permanent housing.

Attorneys Argue Cubans Denied Fair Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Giovanna Dell'orto, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 15, 2006

(AP) - ATLANTA-Prosecutors and defense lawyers sparred Tuesday over whether five Cuban intelligence agents could have received a fair trial in Miami at the same time the community was focused on the politically charged case of young Elian Gonzalez.

DOJ_NMG_0015259

Prosecutors urged the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to deny the agents' request for a new trial because there was no evidence jurors had any prejudice about their guilt or innocence.

"Nothing indicates that any member of the jury was influenced by anything going on outside," said Assistant U.S. Attorney David Buckner.

Defense lawyers argued that the events surrounding Elian inflamed the community, making it impossible for jurors to be impartial about any case involving Cuba. The then-5-year-old boy was found clinging to an inner tube in November 1999 after a boat carrying would-be migrants capsized in a storm. His mother died, and after a court battle waged by his anti-Castro relatives in Miami, Elian was handed over to his Cuban father by the U.S. government in 2000.

The five Cuban agents were convicted in Miami in 2001 of being unregistered foreign agents.

A three-judge panel of the 11th Circuit threw out all the convictions in August, ruling that pretrial publicity combined with pervasive anti-Castro feeling in Miami didn't allow for a fair trial. The government asked the full appeals court to reconsider.

The five men have acknowledged being Cuban agents, but said they were spying not on the United States but on U.S.-based exile groups planning terrorist actions against the Castro government.

Defense attorney Richard Klugh suggested the government's case inflamed anti-Castro passions because it focused on the agents' intent to disrupt the exile community.

"Nothing could be more offensive," Klugh told the 11th Circuit. "The case played to themes other than crime and espionage."

Buckner insisted the trial was fair because the court took "vigorous and ultimately successful steps" to select and isolate jurors - none of whom was of Cuban ancestry.

The five defendants - Gerardo Hernandez; Rene Gonzalez; Antonio Guerrero; Fernando Gonzalez, also known as Ruben Campa; and Ramon Labanino, also known as Luis Medina - remain in prison. Hernandez also was convicted of conspiracy to commit murder in the deaths of four Miami-based exile pilots shot down by Cuban aircraft in 1996.

Convicted Killer Of Taxi Driver Set To Be Executed In Texas Wednesday (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Graczyk, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 15, 2006

(AP) - LIVINGSTON, Texas-A 32-year-old man convicted of robbing and killing a taxi cab driver 14 years ago is set to be executed Wednesday night.

Clyde Smith, who was also linked to the fatal shooting of another Houston cab driver, will be killed for the murder of David Jacobs.

"I wasn't there when he was killed," Smith said in a recent interview at the Texas Department of Criminal Justice Polunsky Unit, home to the state's death row. "I got there afterward."

Smith, who once worked as a security guard, would be the fourth prisoner put to death this year in Texas and the second of three scheduled for execution this month in the nation's busiest capital punishment state.

Lawyers for Smith filed a clemency petition with the Texas Board of Pardons and Paroles in hopes of stopping the punishment.

In earlier appeals, lawyers pointed out federal judges agreed Smith may have had poor legal help during his trial and that he suffered significant abuse as a child, which they said was not pursued by his trial defense team.

"Nevertheless, ... courts concluded that Smith must shoulder the consequences," Clint Broden, Smith's appeals lawyers, said.

At his trial, defense attorneys presented no witnesses.

"I had no idea how the system worked," Smith said from death row. "All I knew was what I saw on TV. It's much different."

Harris County district attorney Joe Owmby, who prosecuted the case, said defense lawyers "had nothing to work with except ... to discredit the witnesses that we did have."

Owmby said Jacobs used to carry a Bible with him in his cab and spoke of his religion to passengers.

"He would witness to people in his taxi if the conversation came up," Owmby recalled.

Two women, girlfriends of Smith, testified against him. One of them said she was in the cab when he committed one of the slayings.

"Things always went wrong when I was associated with people," said Smith, who was 18 at the time of the slayings. "I didn't actually kill anyone, but it's possible I could be killed by the state."

Smith was 18 at the time of the killing and had been in Houston about 10 months. His mother lived in Mississippi, where he dropped out of school in the ninth grade.

He said from death row that the last time he saw a relative, among them four brothers and a sister, was in 1991. He also has a daughter, about 18, who has no contact with him.

"I didn't want her to be exposed to this," he said.

One of his girlfriends called a crime tip line that led police to Smith, who later confessed to detectives about the Feb. 7, 1992, slaying of Jacobs, 45, and the similar shooting and robbery six weeks later of another cab driver, Victor Bilton, a confession he said he made after police wore him down.

"I realize how bad that looked, because the two were so similar," he said of the two slayings. "But at the same time, I still maintain I didn't kill those persons."

Owmby disagrees.

"He is a cold-blooded, remorseless individual who could have contributed to society, but decided to take the lives of two people who were important to a lot of people just by being who they were - hardworking people who drove cabs and lived good lives in Houston," Owmby said.

Judge Orders A Kinder Execution (LAT)

By Louis Sahagun

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2006

A federal judge today refused to delay death row inmate Michael Morales' Feb. 21 execution, but told prison officials they would have to change how they administer the lethal injection that kills him.

In his ruling, Judge Jeremy Fogel said officials either must kill Morales with barbiturates alone, or provide an anesthesiologist or other medical professional to monitor that the prisoner is unconscious before they deliver a fatal dose of a heart-stopping chemical.

Fogel acknowledged that the change would probably prolong the execution, but said Morales had raised legitimate questions that the state's procedures are excessively painful, relying in part on problems encountered during the recent executions of Stanley Tookie Williams and Clarence Ray Allen.

Lawyers had requested that Fogel stop the Morales execution by arguing that lethal injection is not always a rapid, pleasant way of producing unconsciousness and painless death.

California corrections officials now execute condemned inmates with a combination of three chemicals: sodium pentothal, a short-acting barbiturate; pancurium bromide, which paralyzes all voluntary muscles; and potassium chloride, which causes cardiac arrest.

In theory, the sodium pentothal renders the inmate unconscious long enough for the potassium chloride to kill him. Without the sodium pentothal, the injection of potassium chloride would cause intense burning pain. With it, state lawyers argue, the inmate feels nothing.

Although lethal injections have been used for more than a quarter century, Morales' lawyers argued that they violate the Constitution's ban on "cruel and unusual punishment."

In recent weeks, the U.S. Supreme Court has temporarily blocked executions in two Florida cases to allow time for lower court judges to consider arguments against lethal injection.

Morales' lawyers argued that recent executions have gone awry. On Dec. 13, a profusely sweating prison nurse poked Williams' muscular arm 12 minutes before finding a vein to deliver the toxic cocktail. In Allen's execution, he required a second dose of potassium chloride to stop his heart.

On Monday, Fogel asked the Department of Corrections whether it would be feasible to proceed with the execution using only the bromide chemical.

Morales, 46, of Stockton, was convicted in 1983 of murdering Terri Winchell, 17, who was found beaten, stabbed and raped in a secluded San Joaquin County vineyard.

Fogel's ruling is expected to be appealed to the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals and the U.S. Supreme Court, possibly by this weekend.

The U.S. Supreme Court has never found any method of execution to be unconstitutional. Fogel has previously rejected two other challenges to lethal injection, but those rulings were based primarily on procedural grounds.

Morales' lawyers in the San Jose case are David A. Senior of Los Angeles, John R. Grele of San Francisco and Richard P. Steinken of Chicago.

Earlier this week, former Whitewater independent counsel Kenneth Starr and Senior withdrew unreliable affidavits — purportedly from jurors — which had been submitted to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger as part of a parallel bid to spare Morales.

DOJ_NMG_0015261

The bulk of the documents supporting clemency for Morales were denounced by prosecutors as forgeries. Senior withdrew the papers, saying they should not affect central issues in the appeal.

Judge Rules California Must Alter Protocol For Executions (AP)

By David Kravets

AP, February 15, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - A federal judge ruled Tuesday that California must change its lethal injection method for the execution of Michael Morales next week because the current mix of drugs may constitute cruel and unusual punishment.

U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel in San Jose declined to immediately postpone Morales' Feb. 21 scheduled execution, but he ordered the state to either have an expert present to ensure he's unconscious from a sedative or replace a three-drug death potion with a lethal dose of barbiturate.

Fogel said he was concerned inmates are conscious and undergoing extreme pain once a paralyzing agent and then heart-stopping medication begin coursing through their veins.

If the state declines to choose either new option, Fogel said he would stay the execution and have hearings on whether California's injection protocol was cruel and unusual punishment, a violation of the U.S. Constitution.

"The present action concerns the narrow question of whether the evidence before the court demonstrates that defendants' administration of California's lethal-injection protocol creates an undo risk that plaintiff will suffer excessive pain when he is executed," Fogel wrote. "While the court finds that plaintiff has raised substantial questions in this regard, it also concludes that those questions may be addressed effectively by means other than a stay of execution."

Fogel said his decision "preserves both the state's interest in proceeding with plaintiff's execution and plaintiff's constitutional right not to be subject to an undo risk of extreme pain."

Nathan Barankin, spokesman for Attorney General Bill Lockyer, said the office was reviewing the decision and was not immediately prepared to comment. On Monday, it told Fogel that it rejected those two proposals.

Attorneys for Morales alleged a mistake in the sedation process might mean he would appear unconscious, but internally would succumb to excruciating pain once the paralyzing and death agents were administered.

David Senior, one of Morales' attorneys, said he was mulling the decision.

"To me, telling them they have to change the protocol indicates that it is a constitutional violation or he wouldn't be telling him to change the protocol," Senior said.

Morales, 46 of Stockton was convicted in 1983 of murdering Terri Winchell, 17, who was found beaten, stabbed and raped in a secluded vineyard.

Fogel said he decided to change California's injection protocol because, at the end of the day, neither "the death penalty nor lethal injection as a means of execution would be abolished."

The U.S. Supreme Court has upheld executions in general despite the pain they might cause inmates, but has never directly addressed whether alleged pain in lethal injections is unconstitutionally excessive and can be avoided.

Todd Spitzer, R-Orange, a death penalty supporter, was relieved that Fogel did not declare lethal injection unconstitutional.

"I think you should always evaluate the medical science on what is an appropriate lethal injection," he said.

Thirty-six of the 38 states that have capital punishment use a lethal injection procedure similar to California's.

The state switched to lethal injection after a California judge ruled that San Quentin State Prison's gas chamber was cruel and unusual punishment.

The case is Morales v. Hickman, 06-219.

Judge Sets Conditions For Next Calif. Execution (REU)

Reuters, February 15, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (Reuters) - A U.S. federal judge on Tuesday declined to stay the execution of a California murderer because of his claim lethal injection constitutes cruel and unusual punishment but set conditions on how the process must be conducted.

After rejecting similar arguments in two previous cases, U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel said prison authorities must either alter composition of the lethal chemicals or set up procedures to assure the prisoner is unconscious when the lethal chemicals start flowing.

"Many other courts have reviewed lethal-injection protocols similar to California's," the judge wrote in his order. "To date, no court has found either lethal injection in general or a specific lethal-injection protocol in particular to be unconstitutional."

Judge Fogel expressed concern however that the administration of the chemicals, which should be lethal very quickly, sometimes takes several minutes before the prisoner dies.

The decision sets specific conditions for the scheduled February 21 execution of Michael Morales, 46, at San Quentin State Prison.

Morales was convicted in 1983 of murdering a 17-year-old woman with a hammer to her head and then by stabbing her. He also had sex with her unconscious body.

Police Officer Kept Jailed On Threats Charges (AP)

AP, February 15, 2006

(AP) BALTIMORE A federal judge has refused to release a western Maryland police officer charged with making bomb threats and anthrax threats in Hagerstown.

Jeffrey Shifler is scheduled for a preliminary hearing February 27th in U-S District Court in Baltimore. But the U-S attorney's office says that appearance would be canceled if Shifler were to be indicted in the interim.

The FBI arrested the 41-year-old defendant Thursday. Authorities say the threats began four months after he was fired from the Hagerstown Police Department in November 2003 for falsifying payroll records.

Shifler later joined the police force in the nearby town of Boonsboro, which has suspended him without pay.

Authorities allege he made 14 anonymous telephone calls and sent at least nine anonymous letters, many containing racial slurs. The threats targeted 25 people and institutions, including five public officials, schools, public office buildings and low-income housing complexes.

Desperation, Not Bravado (PHI)

By Sam Wood

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 15, 2006

Alvin Jumpp had a good job teaching history at South Philadelphia's Audenried High School, a wife who loved him, a comfortable home in the South Jersey suburbs - and $310,000 in debt.

His life sank into a tailspin of drinking, depression, and thoughts of suicide. Jumpp decided to put on a ski mask and rob a bank.

But in an age when a man with a computer can steal much more than a man with a gun, the typical bank holdup is no longer the big score it was in the Depression era, when a character like Willie Sutton knocked over dozens of banks in a career that earned perhaps $2 million.

Today's robbers average $1,400 per heist, authorities say, and police catch six out of 10. Only homicide has a higher clearance rate.

To understand why anyone would challenge such odds - placing bank customers and employees at risk and ignoring sophisticated security cameras, man-traps, marked bills, and exploding dye packs - take a look at Jumpp.

He is typical of the region's modern-day robber - an otherwise ordinary man overwhelmed by debt or addiction.

Jumpp, 56, graduated from the University of Pennsylvania and was beloved at Audenried. He was married to a middle school principal, father of two adult sons, active in his church, and known to students for his generosity.

In 2001, he fell behind on the mortgage for his Mount Laurel home. He was buried in debt from 16 credit cards, he said.

"No one, including my wife, knew of my financial difficulties," Jumpp said in one of a series of prison letters about his robbery career. "To make matters worse I started to drink heavily. I sank into a deep depression. It was under these circumstances that I committed the crime."

He chose the Farmers & Mechanics Bank near his home, where he had been a customer for almost 15 years.

He approached a teller and, with his hand covered by a bag, pointed his index finger in the shape of a gun.

"Hold your hands up!" Jumpp ordered the teller, according to prosecutors. He pushed two yellow shopping bags across the counter and ordered them filled with money.

It worked. He got away.

No one was more surprised than Jumpp.

"Several staff and patrons who I knew well recognized me," Jumpp said. "Nobody, however, could believe that it was me or refused to believe it was me."

So he robbed the same bank again. And a third time. He deposited more than $17,600 of the bank's marked money into his account at the same bank.

He got caught because a teller finally recognized his native Caribbean accent.

Jumpp said he was relieved.

"What I have done went against the grain of my values and beliefs," he wrote from prison in Minersville, Pa., where he is serving a five-year, three-month sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0015263

"Sometimes when I reflect, I still wonder how I brought myself to rob a bank. Me, rob a bank? Impossible. But it's true. I'm in prison."

John Dillinger robbed dozens of banks, stole enormous sums of money, and became Public Enemy No. 1 in the 1930s. Dillinger, Sutton, and the other infamous crooks of the era captured the nation's imagination. They were front-page news.

Today's bank robber still makes news, but for different reasons.

"Bank robbery is a crime of desperation, not a crime of passion," said Jerri Williams, spokeswoman for the FBI in Philadelphia. "And where does that desperation come from? Drugs. Gambling. Mental illness."

Of the bank robbers arrested in 2004, the last year for which complete statistics were available, 45 percent were addicted to drugs, Williams said.

Most modern bank robbers are "quite timorous," said James Gilligan, director of the Center for the Study and Prevention of Violence at Penn.

"They're often so frightened, that, like people in combat, they'll lose control of their sphincters," he said.

Gilligan said he considered bank robbery, like other violent crimes, a public health problem.

"When we talk about bank robbers, consider this: No normal person would behave that way," he said. "Most violent criminals are suffering from an undiagnosed and untreated mental illness."

Consider some recent high-profile bank robberies:

Greg Hogan, 19, a Lehigh University sophomore and president of the Class of 2008, was charged with robbing an Allentown bank in December after racking up a $5,000 poker debt on the Internet.

Twin 14-year-old girls from South Jersey were convicted of robbing a bank with toy guns in October 2002 at the Shore, trying to raise money to stave off foreclosure on the family's home. Their mother was convicted of driving the getaway car.

Honors student Chad L. Wegkamp was sentenced to 35 years for an August 2001 holdup at a bank across the street from a Virginia sheriff's office. Wegkamp, a paranoid schizophrenic, said he needed the money to pay for surgery to reduce the size of his scrotum. His sentence was suspended, and he was released to a halfway house after serving three years in a federal prison.

Then there's Phillip Dwayne Fuller, a tall, gangly man with thick eyeglasses who spent 91/2 years in prison for robbing 10 banks in the Philadelphia region in the early 1990s.

Now he's back behind bars for robbing 14 more.

"I was broke," he said. "I needed the money."

Fuller, 41, a self-described pathological gambler, said in letters from prison that he had robbed banks to pay gambling debts. He chose banks, he said, because "unlike liquor stores, someone's not going to have a shotgun behind the counter."

Soon after he was released in August 2003, he got depressed. His wife wouldn't allow him to see his two children. His parents wanted no part of him. There was no program to treat his gambling habit at the halfway house.

So he started doing what made him feel good - gambling.

He met a bookie through a fellow inmate. In a couple of weeks, he racked up a $15,000 debt betting on baseball.

He resumed robbing banks. He hired a car service for each stickup and tipped the drivers up to $1,000.

"What was used was either a Town Car sedan or in two robberies a BMW," he said.

One driver took him to seven heists. He'd call the car service and ride around until he saw a bank he liked - usually a Commerce Bank.

"They had the least amount of obstacles," Fuller said. "They made it easy."

He'd pick the least-threatening teller. He'd smile and try to look benign as he passed notes that read: "Give me all the money" or "Give me all the big bills, 100s, 50s, 20s."

The tellers were terrified.

So was Fuller.

"I just wanted to get out of there," he said. "I was thinking, 'I wish she would just hurry up' and 'I hope she don't push no alarms.' "

After a month of bank holdups in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Connecticut and New York, his luck ran out.

FBI agents tracked the license plate on one of the getaway vehicles to the car service. Agents grabbed Fuller in September 2003 as he left the Hotel Grand Union in Manhattan.

Now he is serving 11 years without parole at the federal penitentiary in Allenwood, Pa.

He desperately wants "to be normal."

"Bank robbery is not a sophisticated crime. But people who need money in a hurry, like myself, are apt to turn to it," Fuller said. "A desperate person can go into a bank and three to five minutes later will have enough money to alleviate his problems."

FBI May Probe Beating Of 5 Organizers (PHI)

By Jane M. Von Bergen

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 15, 2006

The FBI may take over the investigation into the beating of five union organizers at the Philadelphia Airport Marriott last Wednesday.

The men, who were from the Transport Workers Union, were beaten, allegedly by members of the rival International Association of Machinists during a meeting at the hotel.

Investigators from the Philadelphia police and the FBI are to meet today to see which agency will handle the investigation, said Lt. John Walker of the Southwest Detective Division. The TWU had sought federal involvement.

The unions are in competition to represent baggage handlers and fleet-service workers at US Airways, which merged last year with America West Airlines.

Yesterday, Robert Roach Jr., the machinists' union's general vice president, sent a letter to members condemning violence without going into specifics about whether the union had a role in the beatings.

The TWU represents about 2,400 baggage handlers originally with America West, while the machinists represent original US Airways baggage handlers, the majority. Many work in Philadelphia, a US Airways hub. The organizers were in Philadelphia campaigning for a potential election.

Roach's letter said IAM members "may have heard reports that a Transport Workers Union organizing meeting in Philadelphia last week apparently led to allegations of an assault involving IAM members... ."

"Foremost, the IAM does not advocate or condone violence," Roach wrote. The union, he said, will cooperate fully with law enforcement officials. "At the same time," he said, "this matter won't be resolved through the rumor mill or prejudgment."

Roach said the union would fulfill "its legal obligations to represent any member who may be charged by US Airways with violating company rules and regulations."

About 9:30 a.m. last Wednesday, three men identifying themselves as IAM officials warned five TWU organizers to leave the hotel and the city, according to an affidavit filed with the National Mediation Board by one of the TWU organizers. A few minutes later, 25 men entered the room and began throwing chairs, glasses, tables - and punches - according to the affidavit. Two of the TWU organizers were beaten badly enough that they went by ambulance to Methodist Hospital.

Hotel videotape captured the men in the hotel corridors, but not what happened inside the meeting room. US Airways officials were able to identify all those on tape, police said.

Walker said the police had completed their investigation and had sent a report to the Philadelphia District Attorney's Office for a decision on whether to prosecute. The decision will also depend on whether the FBI takes over the case.

Details Of Accused Terrorist Emerge (PHI)

By John Shiffman And Alfred Lubrano

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 15, 2006

A Wilkes-Barre man labeled a terrorist by a federal prosecutor was fired from his job in southern Idaho just days before the FBI arrested him there, a company official said yesterday.

"We got rid of him after about a week," said Mark Mendiola, spokesman for AMI Semiconductor. "He was terminated for performance and work-ethic issues." Mendiola declined to elaborate.

It was among a handful of new details to emerge in the case of Michael Curtis Reynolds, arrested Dec. 5 in an FBI sting in which authorities say he was led to believe that he was plotting with an al-Qaeda operative to attack U.S. pipelines and oil refineries.

Reynolds, 47, is being held in the Lackawanna County jail on unrelated grenade charges. However, as The Inquirer reported Sunday, federal authorities believe he was attempting to commit terrorist acts when he was arrested. That disclosure was made during a Dec. 19 detention hearing at the federal courthouse in Wilkes-Barre.

Yesterday, Reynolds' sister and mother issued their first statement about the case. They said they had "been estranged from Michael for some time now" and referred further questions to the FBI.

"That's all we're going to say for forever," the four-line statement read.

Meanwhile, the Times-Tribune of Scranton reported yesterday that Reynolds wrote a letter to the newspaper in which he denied that he was a terrorist or planned to hurt anyone.

The letter's authenticity could not be confirmed, said the newspaper's assistant metro editor, Chris Imperiale. Janine M. Donate, acting warden of the Lackawanna County jail, saw the envelope and said a prison stamp looked legitimate, but she said she had not seen the letter.

The Times-Tribune reported that the letter was received Monday but was postmarked Friday, a day before The Inquirer's report hit newsstands.

The two-page, typewritten letter says in part: "They are trying to come up with charges under the Patriot Act against me, as I used the Internet to try and catch a person that I had believed to be a terrorist and hand them over to the proper authorities."

The letter also refers to three children and child-support debts: "So I sit here while lawyers play with my life, waiting for what they invent for charges, hoping that I can be released to settle my debt before I have another legal issue."

Also yesterday, Drew Outhouse, the former chief of the fire department in the Westchester, N.Y., community where Reynolds grew up, said that Reynolds attempted to kill his parents in a fire he set in 1978.

Outhouse, then a captain with the Croton Falls Fire Department, said that Reynolds - around 20 at the time - unsuccessfully tried to use propane, cans of oil-based paint, and a detonator to burn down the house as his parents slept.

"It was surreal, like Rod Serling was there," Outhouse recalled. "It was midnight, it happened 30 years ago, but it sticks with you.

"Crazy as it sounds, he didn't get charged with much," Outhouse said. "His father went to bat for him and got the charges knocked down. You try to kill your mother and father - that's kind of bad."

Reynolds was convicted of attempted arson, and was sentenced to a conditional discharge, Outhouse said.

He also said that Reynolds was dubbed the "Phantom of the Hallways" in the yearbook of North Salem High School, from which he graduated in 1976. "He sort of blended in with everyone else," Outhouse said. "It said in the yearbook he wanted to be a doctor someday."

At Reynolds' December detention hearing, a prosecutor laid out some of the FBI evidence of terrorism.

According to a transcript, Assistant U.S. Attorney John Gurganus Jr. said that Reynolds was "attempting to provide material aid to [the] al-Qaeda terrorist group."

"What we're talking about is not only the grenade that he had but his activities... to assist al-Qaeda in the planning and the destruction of fuel facilities," Gurganus said. "And he was doing it as a plan to disrupt governmental function, to change the government's actions in foreign countries and to impact on the national debate about the war."

Reached at his office in Scranton, Gurganus declined to comment. Reynolds' lawyer, Philip Gelso, also declined to comment.

Reynolds' arrest capped a six-week FBI sting operation in which he was drawn to a meeting with a purported al-Qaeda operative in southern Idaho, where authorities say he expected to receive $40,000 to finance the alleged plot.

The al-Qaeda contact was actually Shannen Rossmiller, a 36-year-old judge who lives in Conrad, Mont. She was working for the FBI.

After his arrest, authorities said, Reynolds tried to disavow any intent to conspire with al-Qaeda.

"The first things he tried to claim was that he was not a terrorist," Gurganus said in court, that "... this was just an effort on his behalf to lure al-Qaeda in, that he was later going to communicate to this company that he previously worked for, and that they were going to somehow effect some takedown."

Gurganus said agents didn't believe him.

"He then admitted that he had, indeed, provided two target cities in Pennsylvania and New York for these terror cells, one being in Benton, Pa., and the other in Newark, N.J.," the prosecutor said. "And there was talk of this in the e-mails that he had left there."

Gurganus said agents asked him why he would send information on bombs to terrorists.

"He responded that he only gave them some plans and that he was not going to give them all the plans," Gurganus said.

Fla. Killer Asks Judge To Spare His Life (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mitch Stacy, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 15, 2006

(AP) - SARASOTA, Fla.-A weeping Joseph Smith apologized Tuesday for the abduction, rape and murder of 11-year-old Carlie Brucia two years ago, telling a judge he had taken large amounts of cocaine and heroin that day in hopes of killing himself.

Smith told Circuit Judge Andrew Owens, who will sentence him to death or life in prison, "I do not ask for mercy for myself. The only thing I can see to give me a life sentence is for my family. I do not want to see them hurt any further."

Carlie was abducted while walking home from school in February 2004, an attack that was caught on a car wash surveillance tape and broadcast nationwide.

Friends and even Smith's brother said they recognized the burly mechanic grabbing the young girl's wrist on the tape as Smith. A jury found the 39-year-old guilty last November and recommended by a 10-2 vote that he be executed.

Owens will ultimately sentence Smith on March 15. Under Florida law, he must give the jury's death sentence recommendation "great weight."

Smith told Owens during the second day of the sentencing hearing Tuesday that he had been a heroin addict since he was 19 and had unsuccessfully tried to quit several times. He said his wife had kicked him out of their home in January 2004, he had lost his job and, in the hours before abducting Carlie, he tried to overdose.

"I just wanted to die that day," he said. But, he said, "I take responsibility of my crimes."

Defense attorney Adam Tebrugge on Monday cited medical records as early as 1992 showing Smith had been involuntarily admitted to a hospital, and said Smith also had been arrested at least 13 times since 1993, mostly on drug offenses.

Smith's 15-year-old niece, identified only as KS because of her age, also testified about his character, saying Monday that she enjoyed seeing Smith at family holidays and barbecues and walking dogs together.

But Carlie's friends and family members talked of the desperation and grief the man had caused.

Carlie's mother, Susan Schorpen, could not appear because she is jailed on drug charges, but in a letter read by prosecutor Debra Riva, Schorpen said she had institutionalized herself three times, and was trying to self-medicate with drugs to numb the pain of losing her daughter.

Noel Gilliland, Carlie's former sixth-grade teacher, said two of the girl's friends failed the sixth grade after her slaying.

"Carlie's future and life have been stolen from her and from her family," her aunt Lori Brucia said on behalf of the girl's grandmother, Andrea Brucia. "We will never know her as a teenager.

"Our family is forever broken. Our nightmares about what you've done to her - our hearts will never heal."

Broader Inquiry Examines Ovitz Ties To Detective (NYT)

By David M. Halbfinger And Allison Hope Weiner

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 14 — Federal authorities have engaged in a far more extensive investigation than was previously known of the ties between Michael S. Ovitz, the former Hollywood power player, and Anthony Pellicano, the celebrity private detective who was indicted on federal wiretapping charges.

Mr. Ovitz has been called before a grand jury to testify about his dealings and conversations with Mr. Pellicano, who pleaded not guilty to charges that were unsealed last week in a 110-count indictment.

Government prosecutors have also examined Mr. Ovitz's legal fight with Cathy Schulman, a producer who once ran the film operation of his failed talent conglomerate Artists Management Group, and who sued him after leaving the operation in April 2002.

According to a lawyer involved in the case, Ms. Schulman told F.B.I. agents in an interview in June 2004 of conversations in which Mr. Ovitz recounted to her details of her private discussions with major Hollywood figures as soon as a day after they had occurred, and told her that he had sources who could provide him with such information.

The lawyer said Ms. Schulman told investigators that on Dec. 1, 2001, she had met secretly with Ron Meyer, the head of Universal Studios, to discuss issues involving a joint venture partner, Studio Canal, and Artists Management.

The next day, Ms. Schulman told the F.B.I., Mr. Ovitz confronted her about the meeting. Ms. Schulman asked how he knew about it, to which Mr. Ovitz responded: "I have eyes and ears everywhere. There's nothing you can do that I won't find out about."

Lawyers for Mr. Ovitz say he remains only a witness in the case.

"Michael has answered all the questions of the government on more than one occasion," said Bart H. Williams, Mr. Ovitz's lawyer.

"He never knew about or asked Pellicano to use illegal means to obtain information at any time with respect to any person," Mr. Williams said.

And James Ellis, a lawyer for Mr. Ovitz at Artists Management, said both he and Mr. Ovitz learned about Ms. Schulman's private talks with Mr. Meyer and others through office gossip after her own secretary told co-workers about them.

The far-reaching government inquiry has sent shudders through the upper reaches of the entertainment industry, where Mr. Pellicano was often employed by top-ranked lawyers and executives. Investigators have made clear their belief that at least some of the ex-detective's clients were aware of and benefited from his illicit methods.

Officials have looked closely at Mr. Pellicano's work for Bert Fields of the Greenberg, Glusker law firm, which has a long roster of star clients, and at lawsuits in which Mr. Fields used the investigator to help, among others, Brad Grey, who at the time headed the Brillstein-Grey management agency and now is the chairman of Paramount Pictures. Mr. Fields and Mr. Grey have repeatedly denied any knowledge of Mr. Pellicano's illicit activities.

No major Hollywood figure is among the seven individuals indicted so far. But investigators and lawyers in the case have indicated that further charges are expected, possibly as early as this week.

Mr. Ovitz, who founded and ran the Creative Artists Agency, spent a difficult 14 months as president of the Walt Disney Company in the mid-1990's, and sold Artists Management under financial pressure in 2002. He was involved in disputes with several people who were listed among the victims of Mr. Pellicano in the Feb. 1 indictment.

Those people, who were all at odds with Mr. Ovitz in the period of 2001 and 2002, even as his management company was struggling and then collapsing, subsequently either were wiretapped or their names were illegally checked in law-enforcement databases, prosecutors say.

The indictment of Mr. Pellicano names at least six people who were adversaries of Mr. Ovitz when they came under Mr. Pellicano's scrutiny.

¶From January 1999 on, Mr. Ovitz's former protégés at Creative Artists, including the top agents Bryan Lourd and Kevin Huvane, waged open war on his new company, Artists Management, first by refusing to share clients with A.M.G., and then by recruiting clients and employees to leave Artists Management. On Aug. 10, 2001, prosecutors say, Mr. Pellicano had a police source illegally check motor-vehicle records on Mr. Lourd and Mr. Huvane.

¶From March 22 to May 8, 2002, Bernard Weinraub, a New York Times reporter, and Anita Busch, a freelance reporter, collaborated on seven articles about Mr. Ovitz's financial troubles. On May 16, prosecutors say, Mr. Pellicano had a police source illegally run Mr. Weinraub's and Ms. Busch's names through the F.B.I.'s National Crime Information Center database. Ms. Busch was also wiretapped by Mr. Pellicano, prosecutors say.

¶Arthur Bernier, who was fired by Artists Management Group in 2001, sued it and Mr. Ovitz for $500,000 on April 19, 2002. Three weeks later, prosecutors say, Mr. Pellicano had Mr. Bernier's background checked in the N.C.I.C. database.

¶James Casey, a so-called street agent for National Basketball Association players, sued Artists Management and Mr. Ovitz on March 27, 2002 for $450,000. Seven weeks later, prosecutors say, Mr. Pellicano had Mr. Casey's background checked.

Mr. Ovitz's representatives have previously said that Mr. Ovitz's only dealings with Mr. Pellicano were through an outside law firm, Gorry Meyer & Rudd, that represented Mr. Ovitz and Artists Management in the lawsuits brought by Mr. Bernier and Mr. Casey, and that the law firm had elected to hire Mr. Pellicano after Mr. Ovitz had declined to choose from among a list of investigators the firm recommended to him.

But two lawyers in the case confirmed that Mr. Ovitz was questioned by the federal grand jury last summer about his conversations with Mr. Pellicano, some of which were secretly recorded by the private detective. Mr. Ovitz's lawyer, Mr. Williams, declined to discuss Mr. Ovitz's grand jury testimony.

Timothy Gorry and Christopher Rudd, partners in Gorry, Meyer & Rudd, which handled the Bernier and Casey lawsuits, did not return phone calls to their offices Tuesday.

Gorry, Meyer & Rudd also successfully defended the actor Steven Seagal in a defamation case in December 2001. In July 2002, the firm sued Mr. Seagal to collect an unpaid bill of more than $260,000. In litigation over that bill, it was revealed that the firm had hired Mr. Pellicano to help it collect from Mr. Seagal.

The link to Mr. Seagal is doubly intriguing because Ms. Busch, who had written the New York Times articles on Mr. Ovitz with Mr. Weinraub, took a job at The Los Angeles Times in June 2002 and began investigating Mr. Seagal's former producing partner. On June 19, 2002, Ms. Busch was threatened by someone who put a note on her car saying "STOP," and she initially believed the threat was connected to her coverage of Mr. Seagal.

Ms. Busch later covered Ms. Schulman's dealings with Mr. Ovitz, including her lawsuit. Ms. Schulman claimed she was fired on Feb. 14, 2002, after telling auditors from Vivendi Universal, a venture partner through its Studio Canal unit with Artists Management, that Mr. Ovitz had misused Vivendi's money. (An arbitration award to Mr. Ovitz was overturned; the case is pending.)

The lawyer involved in the case said Ms. Schulman told the F.B.I. that a few days after her meeting with Mr. Meyer, she met secretly with Mr. Lourd, of Creative Artists, at his home. Again, the next day, Mr. Ovitz confronted her about the meeting, which Ms. Schulman denied having attended and said she believed it was impossible for Mr. Ovitz to have known about. "You can't deny anything," Mr. Ovitz replied, Ms. Schulman told investigators.

Private Eye's Arrest Causes L.A. Jitters (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf, Usa Today

USA Today, February 15, 2006

LOS ANGELES — The latest buzz around Hollywood, aside from the Oscars, is who could be ensnared next by a federal grand jury probe into alleged wiretapping by the "private investigator to the stars."

Celebrity private eye Anthony Pellicano, 61, was indicted last week on charges of racketeering, wiretapping and conspiracy. He pleaded innocent. Five co-defendants also pleaded not guilty Tuesday. The 110-count indictment alleges that Pellicano's clients in business and divorce disputes gained unfair advantages from "confidential, embarrassing or incriminating" information he gleaned from snooping.

Though the indictment relieved many in Hollywood because it didn't mention any A-list figures who hired Pellicano, bigwigs in the entertainment industry "are not out of the woods yet," says Jesse Hiestand, legal affairs reporter for The Hollywood Reporter, a trade newspaper. "Prosecutors are still on the track of some higher targets."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Saunders says the indictment came from a three-year investigation that's continuing. The FBI has questioned lawyers, talent agents, studio executives and stars, including Sylvester Stallone, Warren Beatty and Garry Shandling.

Pellicano allegedly eavesdropped on Stallone's phone calls and obtained law enforcement computer records illegally on Shandling and former Saturday Night Live star Kevin Nealon. Pellicano allegedly bribed police officers and telephone-company workers to help him dig up dirt, according to the indictment.

Pellicano's indictment casts a spotlight on Hollywood's hardball tactics in scaring off lawsuits or winning them, says Nikke Finke, entertainment-business columnist for LA Weekly. "There's a real underbelly of Hollywood," she says. "There's drugs, there's sex, there's blackmail, there's bullying."

Some prominent people "are scared to death" about the inquiry, says Victor Sherman, a former lawyer for Pellicano. "The lawyers that may have used Anthony's services are scared, and (their) clients are concerned because their suits might be overturned."

Sandra Carradine, 58, the former wife of actor Keith Carradine, pleaded guilty last month to charges that she lied to the FBI when she denied knowing that Pellicano was tapping phones to help her divorce case.

'The presumption is that he never will talk'

Several Hollywood players have been drawn into the fray:

· Bert Fields is a lawyer whose firm has retained Pellicano for years. Fields, in a 2003 written statement to the news media, described himself as a "subject" of the investigation. He has represented Beatty, Tom Cruise, Michael Jackson and film executive Jeffrey Katzenberg. "I have never in any case had anything to do with illegal wiretapping," Fields said.

· Brad Grey, chairman of Paramount Motion Pictures Group, has denied knowledge of wiretapping. Grey formerly managed the careers of Brad Pitt and other stars. Pellicano worked on Grey's behalf in several business lawsuits.

· Michael Ovitz is the former head of Creative Artists Agency and No. 2 executive of the Walt Disney Co. Several alleged victims of Pellicano had links to Ovitz. James Ellis, a lawyer for Ovitz, has said he "fully cooperated" in answering FBI questions.

FBI agents have been investigating Pellicano's activities since they arrested him on weapons charges in December 2002. In 2003, he pleaded guilty to illegally possessing explosives and served 30 months in prison. Since his indictment last week, he has been in jail without bail.

Sherman, a lawyer for Pellicano in the weapons case, contends the Justice Department threw the new charges at Pellicano "to get him to turn on other people." Pellicano has said his clients are innocent and he won't cooperate.

Pellicano's testimony would be crucial to prove that clients ordered him to act illegally. "The presumption is that he never will talk. People who know him say that," says Peter Bart, editor-in-chief of Variety and a former vice president of Paramount Pictures.

Sherman says Pellicano avoided telling clients how he worked. "Anthony always did things very mysteriously. ... It was an aura that he perfected to make his services seem extraordinarily effective."

Still, in Hollywood "it's a very nervous time," says Laurie Levenson, a professor at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles. She says lawyers who hired Pellicano are more worried than their celebrity clients, who are "probably pretty well-shielded."

Known as 'Tony Fortune' and 'the pelican'

Pellicano, raised in Cicero, Ill., started a private-detective firm under the Hollywood-style alias Tony Fortune in Chicago in 1974. He wrote an episode of TV's Magnum P.I. in 1980. A defense lawyer in auto executive John DeLorean's trial on cocaine-dealing charges brought Pellicano to California in 1983. After DeLorean was acquitted, Pellicano, an electronics expert, got assignments from so many high-profile clients that Entertainment Weekly in 1993 ranked him as one of the most powerful people in Hollywood.

Pellicano, who liked girlfriends to call him "the Pelican," cultivated a tough-guy reputation. Profiled by GQ in 1992, he said he had engaged in blackmail and had beaten a man with a baseball bat.

Pellicano's legal problems began in 2002. Los Angeles Times reporter Anita Busch was working on a story about actor Steven Seagal and a business partner with alleged links to the Mob. The reporter found a bullet hole in her car windshield, along with a dead fish, a rose and a note that said "stop."

An ex-con told an FBI informant that Pellicano had hired him on Seagal's behalf to scare the journalist off the story, court documents say. Last year, Los Angeles County charged Pellicano with criminally threatening Busch. That case is pending.

In connection with the Busch incident, the FBI searched Pellicano's office in late 2002. Agents seized hand grenades and plastic explosive. A week after Pellicano was arrested and accused of weapons violations, another search turned up audiotapes that he allegedly had amassed through wiretaps since 1997.

Briton Accused Of Hacking U.S. Networks Could Be Prosecuted Under Terror Laws (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

LONDON -- A Briton accused of mounting the largest ever successful hack of U.S. government computer networks could be prosecuted as an "enemy combatant" under U.S. anti-terror laws, an expert witness told his extradition hearing Tuesday.

Gary McKinnon, 40, of London, is wanted in the U.S. over allegations that he illegally accessed 97 computers, including U.S. Army, Air Force, Navy and NASA systems, causing $700,000 in damages.

Mr. McKinnon's lawyer, Edward Lawson, told Bow Street Magistrates Court the suspect could face prosecution by a military commission if he is sent for trial to the U.S., under powers ushered in following the Sept. 11 attacks.

Mr. Lawson said he is continuing to seek safeguards to ensure President George W. Bush isn't able to deem the ex-computer administrator an enemy combatant. Such a designation would leave him vulnerable to indefinite detention and trial by military commission.

Expert witness Thomas Loflin III, a U.S. civil rights lawyer testifying for Mr. McKinnon, said the court must be given a diplomatic note of assurance by the U.S. before it can be satisfied any extradition wouldn't result in such a scenario.

Mark Summers, an attorney for the U.S. government, told the court an assistant U.S. attorney from the eastern district of Virginia had sworn an affidavit pledging that Mr. McKinnon will be put before a civilian court.

He said the assurance should guarantee the suspect wasn't made the subject of a military order -- usually reserved for suspects accused of involvement in terrorism.

Some detainees are held at a U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Mr. McKinnon is accused of hacking into U.S. government computers in 14 states, including two at the Pentagon, between February 2001 and March 2002.

At an earlier hearing, McKinnon's lawyers claimed he had been carrying out his actions to expose lax computer security and because of his belief that the U.S. is withholding information about UFOs.

Though Mr. McKinnon was able to view sensitive details about naval munitions and shipbuilding, he didn't access classified information, an investigation found.

Mr. Loflin told the court the alleged hacker faces up to 60 years in prison if convicted on eight counts. The suspect would face a lengthy jail term if a district court applied sentencing rules brought in to penalize those connected with terrorism, he said.

The case is expected to continue until Thursday and will included testimony from British human rights lawyer Clive Stafford-Smith.

Computer Hacker Fights Extradition To US (REU)

By Chris Johnson

Reuters, February 14, 2006

LONDON (Reuters) - A British computer enthusiast accused by the U.S. government of the world's "biggest military hack of all time" began a court fight against extradition to the United States on Tuesday.

Gary Mckinnon was arrested last June following charges by U.S. prosecutors that he illegally accessed 97 government computers -- including Pentagon, U.S. army and navy and NASA systems.

Prosecutors say he hacked into sensitive networks over a one-year period from February 2002 and caused $700,000 (400,000 pounds) worth of damage, after crippling U.S. defence systems in the wake of the September 11, 2001 attacks.

If found guilty, Mckinnon could face up to $1.75 million in fines and 60 years in jail.

Mckinnon's lawyers say he might be prosecuted under military law if he were sent to the United States and could be subjected to "special administrative measures" such as solitary confinement and other tactics to persuade him to plead guilty.

He could even face the prospect of being sent to Guantanamo Bay with no chance of parole, they say.

Bow Street Magistrates' Court in London is expected to hear from Clive Stafford-Smith, a human rights lawyer who acts on behalf of detainees in Guantanamo Bay.

Mckinnon -- whose hacking name was Solo -- admits gaining access to U.S. government computers but denies he caused any damage. His supporters say the U.S. government should be grateful to him for highlighting its security shortcomings.

U.S. prosecutors say there is no evidence Mckinnon downloaded classified information or forwarded files to foreign governments.

DOJ_NMG_0015270

At the time of the indictment, Paul McNulty, U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia, said: "Mr McKinnon is charged with the biggest military computer hack of all time."

Mckinnon, from Wood Green in north London, was released on bail in July 2005 and banned from using the Internet.

The 40-year-old appeared relaxed in court where he was supported by more than a dozen friends and supporters.

Governments have become increasingly nervous over hackers in recent years and there have been several high profile prosecutions.

One of the allegations relates to McKinnon deleting files from computers at a U.S. naval station during a critical time following the September 11, attacks, rendering the base's network of computers inoperable.

'Hacker' Extradition Case Reopens (BBC)

BBC News, February 14, 2006

Gary McKinnon's lawyer says he "vigorously contests" the claims The extradition hearing of a British man accused of hacking into the US military computer system has resumed.

Gary McKinnon, 40, is accused of causing damage to 97 US government computers estimated at £370,000.

His lawyers want US authorities to give reassurances he will not get a military order and face being sent to Guantanamo Bay with no prospect of parole.

Mr McKinnon, of Wood Green, north London, is contesting extradition at Bow Street Magistrates' Court.

He is alleged to have infiltrated the military system from his home computer between February 2001 and March 2002.

In total, Mr McKinnon is said to have accessed 53 US Army computers, 26 US Navy computers, 16 Nasa computers, one US Department of Defence computer and one US Air Force computer.

Intimidation claim

The entire network of more than 300 computers at US Naval Weapons Station Earle, in New Jersey, is said to have been left inoperable after Mr McKinnon deleted files.

The prosecution alleges that his ultimate goal was to gain access to the US military classified information network.

At a hearing last July, Mark Summers, representing the US government, claimed Mr McKinnon's conduct was "intentional and calculated to influence and affect the US government by intimidation and coercion".

Computer programmer Mr McKinnon, who was granted bail at the July hearing, could face more than 45 years in prison in the US.

Mr McKinnon was first arrested in 2002 but action against him was discontinued before extradition proceedings began.

Extradition Hearing Begins Over Nasa Hacker (ZDNET)

By Colin Barker

ZDNet UK, February 15, 2006

Gary McKinnon has begun what could be his final battle to avoid extradition to the US and decades in prison

Gary McKinnon began the next stage in his fight against extradition to the US to face charges of hacking US Army, Navy, Air Force and NASA computers on Tuesday.

The British hacker is facing extradition to the US on charges of hacking and causing damage to US defence sites. If found guilty he could face over $1m in fines and 60 years in jail.

When the US request for extradition was first made, McKinnon admitted that the prospect of facing court in the US "terrified him". Now he faces a hearing scheduled to last three days to see if he will remain a free man.

McKinnon was arrested in June last year on charges of computer fraud, and claims that he had illegally accessed 97 US Government computers. McKinnon told ZDNet UK in July 2005 that his actions were prompted by an interesting in the US space programme and the search for extraterrestrial life.

The US prosecution team alleges that McKinnon hacked into sensitive equipment over a one-year period from February 2002 and caused $700,000 worth of damage. McKinnon, though, denies causing serious damage.

Although McKinnon was arrested in the UK shortly after his hacking activities were first exposed, he was released under caution. Since being charged by the US authorities he has been banned from using the Internet.

Texas Tech Student Accused In Federal Sweep (AP)

Associated Press

AP, February 15, 2006

A Texas Tech University student faces federal charges of conspiracy to commit copyright infringement after allegedly reproducing and distributing pirated movies, games and software.

Matthew Thompson, 22, a sophomore computer science major, was indicted on the felony charges after a two-year undercover FBI operation targeting the originators of pirated material on the Internet, according to court documents.

A message left at Thompson's Lubbock residence was not immediately returned Tuesday.

He and the nine others named in the indictment are scheduled to be arraigned Feb. 22 in a San Jose, Calif., courtroom.

FBI spokeswoman LaRea Quy said the indictment was part of a continuing investigation, Operation Copycat, that involved one of the largest operations of pirating software, movies and games.

"It was the biggest site in the United States _ probably the biggest in the world," Quy said.

Thompson was indicted in late January on charges of conspiracy to violate federal copyright law and violating the No Electronic Theft Act.

Also indicted on the same charges was a Spring man, Johnny Russell, 34. He declined to comment Tuesday and his attorney, Peter Goldscheider, did not immediately return a call.

If convicted on both counts, Thompson and Russell face a maximum eight years in prison and five years supervised release, Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Krotoski said.

Court documents describe an exclusive network of users protected by a system of passwords and invitation-only access the users believed would help them fly under the radar of law enforcement agencies.

The government believes the 10 men, ages 19 to 34, were a source for illegally copyrighted materials distributed across the Internet, according to the indictment.

Ten of 15 people accused earlier have been convicted.

Cyberstalking Law Opens Debate On What's Annoying (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — It didn't get much publicity, but an anti-stalking bill passed by Congress recently makes it a federal crime to “annoy” someone over the Internet.

And that's really beginning to bug some people.

“It's a stupid law that has slipped in under the radar,” says Clinton Fein, a San Francisco-based artist who runs annoy.com, a website that he says offers “unique and irreverent” commentary on politics and culture. “Who says what's officially annoying? Is that a business we really want our government to be in?”

The law makes it a crime to anonymously “annoy, abuse, threaten or harass” another person over the Internet.

Rep. Jim McDermott of Washington inserted the provision into legislation that reauthorized the federal Violence Against Women Act. It carries a prison sentence of up to two years and an unspecified fine for those convicted of violations. President Bush signed the bill into law Jan. 5.

McDermott said he was prompted to act by the case of Joelle Ligon, a Seattle woman who was sent menacing e-mails, falsely accused of résumé-padding in messages to co-workers and impersonated in sex-oriented Internet chat rooms from 1998 to 2003.

Some of the communications were traced to a former boyfriend in South Carolina. He was sentenced to five years of probation and 500 hours of community service after he was prosecuted under a federal telecommunications law that protects against harassment.

To eliminate questions over whether phone law applied to the Internet, McDermott pressed for the new legislation. The language “annoy, abuse, threaten or harass” was taken directly from the telephone law.

Mike DeCesare, a spokesman for McDermott, says the new law is not intended to curb free speech.

“This is about bad people doing bad things. … It relates to somebody who does something to somebody else,” he says. “It's not about posting something on a message board. It's got to be direct, one-to-one communication.”

No one has been prosecuted under the new law, DeCesare says.

Critics aren't satisfied. Fein says it is unclear whether the law refers to annoying “conduct” or simply an e-mail whose message irritates its recipient.

“No one knows what this means,” Fein says. “That in itself has a chilling effect.”

Barry Steinhardt, a lawyer who specializes in privacy issues at the American Civil Liberties Union in New York City, says the new law's chief problem is the “subjective nature” of the word annoy. “Words like threaten, harass and abuse can be defined by what a reasonable person understands them to mean,” he says. “Anyone who's ever had their spam filter stop something they wanted, or let something through that they didn't, knows that deciding what is annoying is something else again.”

He says the ACLU is considering whether to ask a federal court to declare the new law unconstitutional because it's too vague.

A scholar who specializes in cyber law says the law could be difficult to overturn. Susan Brenner, a University of Dayton law professor and a consultant to the Secret Service on cyber laws, says courts likely would read “annoy” together with the words that follow it — “abuse, threaten or harass” — and conclude that the law refers to specific behavior.

In 2004, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 6th Circuit used that reasoning to uphold the conviction of Erik Bowker, an Ohio man who had stalked a Youngstown television reporter via telephone.

But in 1999, a federal appeals court in Washington, D.C., ruled that a man could not be prosecuted for “annoying” conduct because he had telephoned the U.S. attorney seven times to complain about a case that had been brought against him. The calls, the court found, were political speech protected by the First Amendment.

David Hudson, a lawyer with the First Amendment Center, a speech-rights advocacy group in Nashville, says the different ways that courts have interpreted the word “annoy” make the new anti-stalking law “ripe for a challenge.”

CIVIL LAW:

Security Agency Whistleblowers Seek Stronger Protections (GOVEXEC)

By Chris Strohm

Government Executive, February 15, 2006

Whistleblowers who have alleged misconduct or criminal activity at national security agencies told lawmakers Tuesday that they have been retaliated against for their disclosures, and urged stronger rights for both federal employees and contractors reporting wrongdoing.

In an unusual move, whistleblowers from the FBI, National Security Agency, Defense Department and Energy Department were allowed to testify before the House Government Reform National Security, Emerging Threats and International Relations Subcommittee. Congressional committees usually hear from senior agency managers, not rank-and-file employees.

The whistleblowers recounted their allegations and how they were retaliated against, in some cases by having their security clearances revoked or their careers ruined. They said agency managers seemed more focused on cover-ups and retaliation than investigating allegations or addressing exposed problems.

"I became a whistleblower not out of choice, but out of necessity -- necessity to tell the truth," said Army Lt. Col. Anthony Shaffer, who said he was retaliated against after reporting pre-9/11 intelligence failures.

Shaffer is scheduled to testify in a closed session Wednesday before the House Armed Services Committee. Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., said the session will be "a hearing that is going to change . . . the nature of this city."

Weldon said Congress needs to pass legislation to protect workers who come forward with critical information.

"If we don't fix the problem . . . then we're sending a signal to every other employee in the federal government not to speak up," Weldon said. "If we don't take action, we're all in danger."

Other whistleblowers said their allegations were never fully investigated.

"I'm here today to tell you about a system that is broken," said Mike German, who resigned from the FBI after reporting that bureau agents and managers mishandled a major counterterrorism case in 2002 and falsified records. The Justice Department inspector general confirmed German's allegations that the case was mishandled and records were falsified, and that he was retaliated against after making his allegations. But the IG said the case was not a counterterrorism case.

"I am here not because I think you can help me," German said. "I am here because your actions are needed to fix a broken system before another counterterrorism investigation is about to fail."

He added: "This is not a question of balancing security interests against liberty interests. It's a mater of competence and accountability."

Army Spc. Samuel Provance said he believes the military has covered up the extent of abuses at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, and has not adequately investigated those abuses. Provance was one of the first military soldiers to come forward with allegations of abuse at the prison.

"I am concerned about what the Army is becoming," he said. "Honor cannot be achieved by lies and scapegoating. Honor depends on the truth."

Several lawmakers said they would support new legislation to give stronger protections to employees and contractors at national security and intelligence agencies. Those employees are exempt from protections under the 1989 Whistleblower Protection Act.

"Seldom in our history has the need for the whistleblower's unfiltered voice been more urgent, particularly in the realms of national security and intelligence," said subcommittee chairman Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn. "But those with whom we trust the nation's secrets are too often treated like second-class citizens when it comes to asserting their rights to speak truth to power."

By a party-line vote, the House Government Reform Committee rejected a measure last fall that would have provided stronger protections for national security whistleblowers. At the time, committee Chairman Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., said he did not know enough about national security issues.

Some whistleblower advocates were outraged over Davis' statement, especially since his committee includes a subcommittee on national security.

"My hope is that ... we can work together on a bipartisan basis to introduce new legislation that will provide national security whistleblowers with basic protections," Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., said during Tuesday's hearing. "No one with a security clearance should have to fear that his or her clearance can be pulled in retaliation for truthfully reporting corruption or abuse."

Panel Weighs Whistleblower Law Changes (AP)

By KATHERINE SHRADER, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Five government whistleblowers said Tuesday they had faced retaliation for calling attention to alleged government wrongs, such as prisoner abuse in Iraq and illegal surveillance at the National Security Agency.

They told their stories to the House Government Reform Committee's national security subcommittee, whose chairman, Rep. Chris Shays, R-Conn., indicated an interest in altering the law to better protect national-security whistleblowers.

Shays said they are vulnerable to unique forms of retaliation, including suspension or revocation of security clearance, which can have the same "chilling effect" as demotion or firing.

"The system is broken," Shays said.

In written testimony, inspectors general from the Defense, Justice and Energy departments said complaints of reprisals involving security clearances were rare.

"The allegations were either not substantiated or were closed after a preliminary inquiry determined there was insufficient evidence to warrant a full investigation," acting Defense Department Inspector General Thomas Gimble said.

The five whistleblowers, who have made headlines before, offered their stories at Tuesday's hearing. Many described their inspector general as ineffective or co-opted by the security offices.

Army Spc. Samuel Provance laid out what he considers to be a pattern of systemic abuses at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison. He said his rank was reduced for disobeying orders not to speak about mistreatment he saw at the prison.

Russ Tice, a former NSA analyst, has called attention to possible constitutional abuses and security breaches at NSA. He said he was given psychological evaluations deeming him mentally unstable, and his clearance was revoked. He's now unemployed.

Lt. Col. Anthony Shaffer says the Defense Intelligence Agency has made a series of allegations against him since he disclosed information about a program known as Able Danger. He says the program identified four Sept. 11 hijackers before the attack. Government officials have raised doubts about his claims, which are the subject of another hearing Wednesday.

Richard Levernier, a retired Energy Department nuclear security specialist, said he lost his security clearance and effectively his job for giving the media an unclassified report about shortfalls in nuclear security.

And former FBI special agent Michael German said the Justice Department's inspector general found his claims of a botched terrorism investigation in Florida were substantiated. He says he faced retaliatory actions, some of which the inspector general also found.

In the written statements from the inspectors general, many of the whistleblowers' individual claims were not addressed.

"Whistleblowers who raise good-faith allegations of misconduct about activities at their agencies play an important role in ensuring transparency and accountability throughout government," Justice Department Inspector General Glenn Fine said.

Senate Votes To Send Back Asbestos Bill (USAT)

USA Today, February 15, 2006

The Senate voted Tuesday to send an asbestos-compensation bill back to a committee because it violates budget rules. The vote was 58-41. Sixty votes were needed to move the bill forward. It was “the key vote on this bill,” said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said before the vote that “if we are unsuccessful this week in addressing asbestos, that's it for this year.”

The measure, sponsored by Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., would shield manufacturers and insurance companies from asbestos lawsuits by taking injury claims out of the courts and paying them from a $140 billion fund financed by asbestos companies and their insurers. Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., who led the challenge, said claims would drain the fund and leave taxpayers responsible for billions of dollars.

A House version of the bill would allow asbestos lawsuits to go forward only if claimants meet certain medical criteria. Asbestos is a fibrous mineral used until the mid-1970s in insulation and fireproofing. Inhaled fibers have been linked to cancer and other diseases.

White House says Chertoffhas Bush's full support

President Bush has full confidence in Michael Chertoff and has not considered asking the Homeland Security secretary to step down after criticism of his performance on Hurricane Katrina, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said.

Former FEMA director Michael Brown told a Senate panel last week that the agency under Chertoff's leadership was preoccupied with terrorism threats at the expense of preparing for natural disasters. A Republican-written House report blamed government-wide ineptitude for mishandled relief efforts.

Scalia scoffs at ideaof 'living Constitution'

Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia said people who believe in a "living Constitution" that changes with the times are "idiots."

In a speech to the Federalist Society in Puerto Rico, Scalia said "the argument of flexibility (says) the Constitution … has to change with society. But you would have to be an idiot to believe that. The Constitution is not a living organism, it is a legal document. It says something and doesn't say other things."

Scalia said his philosophy of the document, "originalism," has no room for personal beliefs.

US Senate Vote Kills $140bn Asbestos Bill (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir

Financial Times, February 15, 2006

Legislation to resolve the asbestos litigation crisis failed in the US Senate on Tuesday night, dashing hopes that Congress would step in where the US courts have failed to compensate victims and halt litigation that has bankrupted scores of US companies.

The Senate voted by 58 to 41 on a procedural motion put forward by Democrats to block the bill, which would have established a $140bn compensation fund for asbestos victims. Sixty votes would have been needed to defeat the motion.

Senator Bill Frist, the top Republican, said before the vote that there would be no chance of a congressional fix for the asbestos crisis this year if senators rejected the bill.

Lobbyists close to the legislation said some members of Congress might try to put forward a different asbestos bill this year.

But they said the passage of such legislation would be a long shot.

Lawmakers on the influential Senate judiciary committee have been working for years to write a bipartisan bill to tackle the asbestos litigation crisis, which has cost more than $70bn and bankrupted nearly 80 companies.

The bill would have set up a fund to pay asbestos victims on a no-fault basis, while limiting the exposure of companies and insurers to lawsuits. The fund would have been managed by the federal government but privately financed by asbestos defendants and insurers.

It was defeated on Tuesday night on the grounds that it would have increased the federal budget deficit, in spite of the fact that the Congressional Budget Office said on Monday that the fund would not require federal money.

Senator John Cornyn, a Texas Republican, is now expected to introduce a bill to curb asbestos claims by allowing people to file only if they meet certain medical criteria. A similar bill has been introduced in the House. The prospects for early passage of such legislation are considered slim.

Senate Foes Block Proposed Trust Fund For Asbestos Victims (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

In a cliffhanger procedural vote, the Senate derailed legislation to create a trust fund for asbestos victims, a victory for Democrats and their trial-lawyer allies who waged a relentless campaign to defeat a bill that took five years to negotiate.

Supporters of the bill, including most Republicans and some Democrats, held out hope for a return to the legislation after it failed, in a 58 to 41 vote, to gain the support of 60 senators needed to overcome a challenge over its potential budgetary impact. "We believe there is overwhelming support for this bill," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), who had switched his vote from a "yes" to a "no" to leave open the option of bringing the bill back to the floor, if and when a yes vote can be mustered.

After the vote, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), the ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee and a co-author of the bill, told reporters that the proposed fund is not dead and that he had counted the vote of one absent senator -- Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii) -- for his side. Republicans also said that they might be able to flip the vote of one of the 11 GOP senators who sided with Democrats to defeat the legislation.

But despite an unusually intensive effort by Leahy and the bill's principal author, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), to make the fund work, critics have argued it is too complicated and financially risky to advance much beyond the Senate -- should it ever manage to pass that chamber. GOP Sens. George Allen and John W. Warner of Virginia voted for it.

The debate did shine some light on one of the most intractable problems facing the legal system: the thousands of asbestos-exposure claims that are the churning through the courts. Sen. Richard J. Durbin (Ill.), the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate and a leading opponent of the trust fund, acknowledged that "significant changes in the existing tort system" are needed, and that all the principals -- including the trial lawyers who sought to defeat the proposed fund -- must give ground.

"We have to find a reasonable way to help those victims," Durbin said. He suggested reviving an approach, which Republicans had not advanced for years, to establish medical criteria for asbestos lawsuits within the current system. Trial lawyers opposed that approach, as did most Democrats, which is one reason the fund idea became popular.

"We should put our heads together," Durbin said. "I don't know if we can reach an agreement, but I sure want to try." He added that the current legislation "was a clash of the special-interest titans on both sides."

The trust fund bill created unlikely coalitions, both within the Senate and among the many interest groups with a stake in the outcome. Yesterday's vote to block the fund was brought by fiscal conservatives, who feared that it would eventually run out of money, leaving the federal government to pay claims. They were joined by most Democrats, including Sens. Barbara A. Mikulski and Paul S. Sarbanes of Maryland, who believed the fund gave short shrift to certain types of victims and who faced intense lobbying from one of the Democratic Party's wealthiest and most influential political allies, the Association of Trial Lawyers of America.

The alliance "is a little strange," said Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.), a conservative who raised the budget objection. "I feel a little uncomfortable in this position, to be honest with you."

A new Congressional Budget Office examination of the bill did little to clear up the debate. In a letter from acting Director Donald B. Marron to Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), the CBO estimated that payments, start-up costs and other expenses would total $64 billion over 10 years, 2006 to 2015, while the fund would collect an estimated $58 billion from asbestos companies, insurance firms and existing private trust funds.

Because the 10-year corporate income-tax receipts would also decline by an estimated $1.1 billion, from contributors paying into the fund, the CBO estimated a net revenue shortfall of about $7 billion. "I believe this bill is fiscally irresponsible to the taxpayers and the future," Ensign said.

Opponents also argued that the legislation is incomplete. Sen. Kent Conrad (N.D.), the ranking Democrat on the Budget Committee, said the CBO did not take into account dormant claims, claims that do not fit into specific categories of illness and claims from family members of exposure victims.

Conrad cited a section of the Senate bill that states that "an asbestos claimant who meets the requirements . . . shall be entitled to an award." If private funding were to ever run out, Conrad said, it would fall to the federal government to make good on that promise. "Are these all just words or numbers on a page, or does this have some real-world consequence?" Conrad asked.

But the CBO letter concluded that because the bill exempts the federal government from financial liability, "the legislation would be deficit-neutral over the life of the fund." Leahy underscored that sentence in a four-page statement on the budget challenge. He asserted that "this is not a federal entitlement program." Leahy later stressed on the Senate floor: "It just does not add to debt."

Asbestos Trust Fund Bill Is Defeated (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A handful of Republicans joined most Democrats in dealing a deathblow last night to a $140 billion asbestos-litigation overhaul bill on Capitol Hill.

On a 58-41 vote, supporters of the asbestos bill failed to muster the 60 votes needed to clear a procedural hurdle raised by their opponents.

After the vote, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's office said that Republicans may bring the legislation back to the Senate floor later this year. Earlier in the day, Mr. Frist told reporters that this was the only week he would devote to the bill on the Senate floor.

However, proponents are unlikely to be successful this year. As it languished on Capitol Hill, a growing number of states, including Texas, have approved their own asbestos-overhaul laws that many U.S. corporations and insurance companies find favorable.

The bill under consideration in the Senate sought to revise the asbestos-litigation system by creating a $140 billion trust fund to pay health-care and other costs incurred by Americans injured by asbestos. The fund would be paid for primarily by companies with asbestos liabilities and their insurance companies.

Large U.S. manufacturers of asbestos and some insurance companies backed the bill because it would have reduced the amount of money they would have to pay in asbestos liabilities through the legal system.

But a growing number of smaller manufacturers and insurers opposed the legislation because it would increase the amount of money they would have to pay. Most trial lawyers also opposed the bill.

Since the early 1970s, industry has paid $70 billion to settle 730,000 asbestos claims, according to a recent Rand Corp. survey. At least 77 companies have filed for bankruptcy-court protection because of asbestos liability.

Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania crafted legislation that won the backing of a coalition of Republicans and Democrats. Mr. Specter argued that the bill would help asbestos victims receive compensation for their illnesses and give companies certainty about how much they would owe.

But the bill was attacked by an odd coalition of conservative Republicans like Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, who believed the trust fund was too generous, and liberal Democrats like Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, who said the bill was a giveaway to big business.

"It does not provide a reliable guarantee of just compensation to the enormous number of workers who are suffering from asbestos-induced disease," Mr. Kennedy said last week.

Opponents of the bill defeated it by raising a procedural motion that required Mr. Specter to find 60 senators to support the bill, rather than the usual 51 votes. Using a parliamentary tactic, opponents noted that the asbestos trust fund would need to borrow federal funds at the beginning to get off the ground, a violation of the chamber's budget rules.

Even if Mr. Specter had prevailed, he faced more challenges in the days ahead. Mr. Reid and Senate Democrats planned to launch a filibuster against the bill, forcing Mr. Specter to again find 60 votes to defeat his opponents.

Last night, Mr. Specter held out hope for the bill. He said Sen. Daniel Inouye of Hawaii was the one senator who didn't vote, and had planned to vote with Mr. Specter on the bill. According to Mr. Specter, Mr. Inouye left the Capitol because his wife was sick. With Mr. Inouye's and Mr. Frist's votes, the bill would have the requisite 60 votes. Mr. Frist had changed his vote to oppose the bill, so under Senate rules he would be able to bring the bill back to the Senate floor.

Among the Republicans who voted against Mr. Specter were Sens. Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, James Inhofe of Oklahoma and John McCain of Arizona. Democrats voting to defeat the bill were Mr. Reid and Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts, Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Kent Conrad of North Dakota. The Democrats who supported Mr. Specter included Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont.

Asbestos Bill Is Sidelined By The Senate (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 — The Senate decided on Tuesday night to all but kill legislation to create a $140 billion fund to compensate victims of asbestos poisoning.

Supporters of the measure, led by Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, fell just short of the 60 votes needed to waive a budget objection raised about the legislation. The final vote was 58 to 41, and with powerful interests on both sides it did not break down along party lines.

Senator Bill Frist, the Republican majority leader and a strong supporter of the legislation, changed his vote from yes to no at the last moment so he would have the option of calling for a recount "at some later date," he said.

Still, advocates for the measure held out hope that they could reverse the outcome. On Tuesday night, Senator Specter, its chief sponsor, issued a statement that the one senator who was absent from the chamber, Daniel K. Inouye, Democrat of Hawaii, had told him he would vote to waive the budget objection but he had gone home because his wife was ill.

"We will have him on the motion to reconsider," Mr. Specter said, "and we may change another vote or two, so we may win this one yet."

Nonetheless, the vote meant that the courts were likely to remain the primary forum for processing thousands of asbestos cases in the foreseeable future.

President Bush has made changes in the treatment of asbestos claims a legislative priority, and the Senate action was a major setback for the White House.

The bill, more than two years in the making, became a casualty of powerful business interests opposed to it, as well as of a forceful coalition of conservative and liberal senators. The conservatives argued that the measure could lead to a new and expensive federal entitlement program. The liberals maintained that the asbestos fund was not large enough to compensate victims and was a bailout for asbestos companies and their insurers.

Supporters said the bill was needed to compensate victims and their families, alleviate a crisis among manufacturers and deal with a growing number of cases in the courts.

An estimated 10,000 people die each year from exposure to asbestos, primarily in the workplace. Dozens of companies have sought bankruptcy protection to control their asbestos-related legal costs.

And by many estimates, about 60 percent of the money available to compensate victims is going to lawyers for the plaintiffs or the companies. The courts, facing growing numbers of asbestos cases, have repeatedly called on Congress for a legislative solution.

The measure failed in large part because of opposition from some asbestos makers and insurers, as well as from trial lawyers and labor unions. Some companies opposed to the legislation declared that they were being forced to pay too much into a new compensation fund, while the unions and trial lawyers saw the bill as a bailout without enough money for the victims.

Senator John Ensign, Republican of Nevada, lodged the procedural objection to the bill. He maintained that it violated a Congressional limit on spending. Conservatives have raised concerns that the fund could be insufficient and therefore require a federal bailout. Liberals also hold that the fund is insufficient, but say that is because manufacturers and insurers are not being required to contribute enough.

Earlier in the day, Senator Frist said he would not try to resurrect the legislation if it ran into obstacles this week. "If we are unsuccessful this week in addressing asbestos," he said, "that is it for this year."

Asbestos has been widely used as an insulation and construction material, and exposure to it in the workplace may not manifest itself in harmful ways until decades later. It can cause illnesses ranging in severity from relatively mild to lethal.

A study issued in May by the Rand Institute for Civil Justice found that more than 730,000 people in the United States had filed compensation claims for asbestos-related injuries from the early 1970's through the end of 2002, costing businesses and insurance companies more than $70 billion.

The legislation shunted aside on Tuesday night had been intended to replace the current civil court approach to compensating victims with a no-fault program financed by manufacturers and their insurers and run by a new compensation office at the Labor Department.

The bill would restrict asbestos victims in bringing their claims to court and limit the liability of manufacturers and insurers, but require them to make contributions to the fund.

It would set up a schedule of payments, based on the severity of the illness, ranging from $25,000 for breathing impairments to as much as $1.1 million for victims of mesothelioma, an often fatal cancer of the lungs.

Fees for lawyers would be limited to 5 percent of final awards.

Both supporters and opponents of the legislation relied on a new analysis by the Congressional Budget Office to support their positions. Senator Specter emphasized the budget office's conclusion that the legislation "would be deficit-neutral over the life of the fund."

But the opponents, including trial lawyers' groups and some manufacturers and insurers, pointed to other parts of the budget office analysis showing that its effect would not be deficit-neutral if the administrator of the $140 billion fund had to borrow heavily or if courts ruled that there was a government obligation to pay victims despite the terms of the bill.

The fund in its initial years would be financed through significant borrowing, and critics of the legislation have raised concerns about its impact if some asbestos companies were unable to meet their payments.

Illustrative of the complex political calculations on Tuesday were opposing statements by the two Democratic senators from California.

Dianne Feinstein, one of 20 sponsors, said that while the bill was not perfect, it was necessary to compensate victims and reduce high court costs. She disputed the argument that taxpayers would ultimately have to bail out the trust fund, saying asbestos victims would be able to return to the courts if it did not have enough money.

But Senator Barbara Boxer said that the bill was giving asbestos victims false hope. "Companies will go into bankruptcy," she warned. "It's a giant nightmare.

"I am very fearful that a lot of people who are going to depend on this trust fund will find out that it is not all it is cracked up to be. "The bill promises the moon. But it will not even deliver a sliver of the moon."

Senate Defeats Asbestos Trust-fund Legislation (WT)

By Charles Hurt

DOJ_NMG_0015278

The Washington Times, February 15, 2006

Liberals and conservatives in the Senate joined together last night to stop legislation that would have created a massive trust fund for victims of exposure to asbestos.

Years in the drafting, the bill is disliked by conservatives who fear that the costs will be passed on to taxpayers and by liberals who worry that victims will lose their rights to sue companies that, however unwittingly, exposed workers to a substance now known to cause cancer.

The key vote, on a procedural issue, was initially 59-40 in favor, one short of the 60 votes required, effectively killing the bill. Ten Republicans joined 30 Democrats to block the measure.

Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, Hawaii Democrat, could have given the bill the needed 60th vote but missed last night's roll call.

Once Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist realized that the bill would fail, he switched his vote to "no" for reasons of parliamentary procedure -- giving himself the right to raise the bill for another vote. The final official result was 58-41.

The Tennessee Republican said he did so "to keep a heartbeat, at least, in this piece of legislation, because it is so important to victims, to our economy, to jobs."

Sen. John Ensign, Nevada Republican, a fiscal conservative, raised a point of order, saying that the legislation would break future spending caps, meaning 60 votes are required to approve the bill.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter said after the vote that Mr. Inouye would have secured victory for the bill.

"As John Paul Jones said, 'We have just begun to fight,' " he said. "Senator Inouye told me he would vote to overrule the point of order, which would have provided the 60th vote and victory, but he went home because his wife was sick. We will have him on the motion to reconsider, and we may change another vote or two, so we may win this one yet."

After voting against the bill, Senate Minority Whip Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, said: "I hope now we can work together in a bipartisan basis to find some accommodation, not to create a trust fund in an amount that's never been established."

Supporters argued, however, that the bill is a bipartisan one, authored by Mr. Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the ranking Senate Judiciary Committee Democrat.

The bill would create a $140 billion trust fund to compensate the victims of asbestos exposure. The money would come from the employers and their insurance companies.

Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican, a supporter of the bill, criticized opponents of the bill for blocking the measure without offering an alternative.

"For the past decade, there has been a thundering silence from too many on the other side of the aisle," said the former chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "They are quick to criticize what has been suggested, but not once in more than a decade have they proposed their own solution. Not once have they come up with one idea that might possibly help solve this crisis."

Among the Republicans who bucked the leadership were some of the chamber's most fiscally conservative members, such as Sen. Jim DeMint, a freshman from South Carolina.

"This bill fails to solve the real problem, which is our out-of-control junk-lawsuit system, and simply trades one flawed system for another," he said.

"We have a serious problem with asbestos litigation that has already forced 70 American companies into bankruptcy and cost over 60,000 Americans their jobs. But creating a multibillion-dollar government entitlement program that punishes taxpayers and rewards trial lawyers is not the answer."

Senate Kills Fund For Asbestos Victims (LAT)

By Jonathan Peterson

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate rejected a new plan Tuesday to compensate asbestos victims, apparently dooming a proposed $140-billion fund that would have handled claims now battled out in court.

Under the legislation, asbestos makers and their insurers would have contributed to a trust fund to pay claims for illnesses in amounts from $25,000 to $1.1 million. But the measure faced attacks on several fronts.

Trial lawyers and their Democratic allies argued that efforts to take claims out of the courts threatened the ability of victims to obtain sufficient restitution.

Fiscal conservatives feared that the approach would set up a federal entitlement program, along the lines of "black lung" compensation, with insufficient limits on payments and a growing bill for taxpayers.

The final vote was 58 to 41, with advocates of the asbestos legislation failing to get the 60 votes needed to beat back a procedural challenge. Proponents of the bill, who initially had 59 votes, said they might try again, but they were sobered by a defeat that included votes of Democrats and Republicans.

"The consequence of the vote tonight is that victims who are in need are not going to receive fair and just compensation," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said after the vote. "They deserve it. They need it."

At the end, Frist shifted his vote from yes to no, a parliamentary maneuver that he said would enable him to bring the matter up again if he chose.

By all accounts, the outcome was a stinging defeat for advocates of the plan and raised questions about the approach that had been painstakingly established by a coalition of Republicans and Democrats in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The vote was over a technical issue — whether the proposed $140-billion fund would exceed budgetary limits. Proponents argued it would not, noting the fund was to be financed by private companies and insurance firms. They also cited a recent analysis by the Congressional Budget Office that the fund would not expand the federal deficit over the long haul.

"It's abundantly clear that this legislation will not be a burden on the United States Treasury," Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said.

Opponents maintained that the fund was insufficient for long-term asbestos claims and could ultimately saddle taxpayers with new costs or leave claimants in limbo if the money ran out.

"In addition to being unfair to victims, the bill is unfair to the federal taxpayer," said Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.), the Senate minority leader, who led the opposition. The bill, he added, "may be well-intentioned, but it is ill-conceived."

Supporters sought to establish a system for asbestos claims that would be similar to the workers' compensation program for workplace injuries. Workers would not have to prove that their symptoms were caused by a particular exposure to asbestos.

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), chairman of the Judiciary Committee, had urged senators to keep the bill alive and invited colleagues to address their concerns by amending the measure in the coming days.

"To have it rejected on a technicality is just a terrible waste of so much time and effort," Specter said of the bill that had passed in committee in May.

Afterward, Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), an opponent of the measure, tried to sound a conciliatory tone.

"We have to find a reasonable way to help these victims," he said. "I don't know if we can reach an agreement, but I sure want to try."

Asbestos Bill Blocked Again (RC)

By Emily Pierce And Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, February 15, 2006

The Senate killed a controversial asbestos trust fund bill Tuesday night, but Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) vowed to bring the measure up again soon, indicating he believes he is only one vote short of prevailing.

The potential death of the bill last night leaves the backers of multimillion-dollar lobbying campaigns on both sides of the bill scrambling to reposition themselves and pursue new methods of curbing asbestos-related lawsuits.

In a vote, the outcome of which remained uncertain even while the Senate roll was being called, 30 Democrats voted with 11 Republicans to block the bill from moving forward. Supporters, who drew only 58 votes, needed 60 to overcome the procedural hurdle. Frist at the last minute voted with opponents so that he might be able to demand a revote at a later date.

Sen. Daniel Inouye (D-Hawaii) was absent from the vote, and Frist said “that absentee vote could have made the difference” in keeping the bill alive. As of press time, it was unclear what Inouye’s vote would have been had he been present, although there were some hints that he would have allowed it to go forward.

Frist spokeswoman Amy Call said the Majority Leader considers the bill “still alive” but it was unclear whether Frist would call for another vote this week or after next week’s Presidents Day recess.

The bill would put an end to asbestos-related lawsuits, while establishing a privately funded $140 billion trust to compensate those who claim illnesses caused by exposure to the deadly fibers.

The vote was on a budget point of order brought by Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.). Ensign and his backers argue that the trust fund will not be adequately financed and would eventually require taxpayer funds to keep it solvent.

Even before votes were cast Tuesday evening, lobbyists on both sides of the debate were mulling the consequences of the bill’s defeat and beginning to plot their next moves.

A broad array of corporations have spent tens of millions of dollars promoting the trust fund approach, but speaking privately, lobbyists for those interests said they were unsure where they would go from here.

“Everybody’s just been focused on the votes,” one lobbyist said. Another added: “Nobody is even speculating at this point. At a minimum, we’ll have to let this stuff digest, and then figure out our next steps.”

Meanwhile, the assortment of odd bedfellows lined up against the trust fund appears ready to split now that the measure may be dead. The trial lawyers' lobby and some corporate opponents of the bill could forgo a legislative fix altogether and support simply allowing asbestos cases to return to the court system, while many of the business and insurance companies working against the bill are ready to push Congress to establish medical criteria that asbestos claimants must meet before heading to court.

"We are strongly in favor of a good medical criteria bill," said Tom O'Brien, chairman of the Coalition for Asbestos Reform, the lead business-backed group opposing the trust fund. He pointed to measures crafted by Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) and Rep. Chris Cannon (R-Utah) as starting points.

In fact, Cornyn said he wants to keep the issue alive even if the measure is filibustered, by pursuing a bill that allows only individuals with asbestos-related illnesses to bring suits against companies that manufactured or sold asbestos products.

Cornyn said he has talked with Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Minority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) about pursuing a bill that lays out the medical criteria for people allowed to bring suits.

"If we could take up the Texas medical criteria bill, then that's something they could live with," said Cornyn, referencing a medical criteria measure enacted in Texas last year.

But Frist dismissed Cornyn's medical criteria measure, noting that last week's vote on a similar proposal that did not precisely mirror the Texas law was overwhelmingly defeated on the Senate floor.

"We brought medical criteria to the floor, and it got 27 votes," Frist said.

Indeed, Democrats, including Reid and Durbin, opposed Cornyn's original medical criteria amendment, largely because they have been focused on eliminating the bill's trust fund provisions and because they sought changes in Cornyn's approach.

But Cornyn said Democratic opposition was changing rapidly. "One of the consequences of filing the medical criteria amendment early [in the asbestos bill debate] is that it got a lot of people thinking about it," Cornyn said.

The National Taxpayers Union, one of several nonprofits active in the debate, is looking ahead to the House, where the group hopes the medical-criteria approach will gain steam. And the National Association of Mutual Insurance Companies, a group claiming 1,400 members, plans to promote the approach during 35 days of Capitol Hill visits it has planned for spring and early summer.

It is unclear what method the biggest labor umbrella group, the AFL-CIO, will back. Early in negotiations around the trust fund bill, the labor group was supportive and eager to stem the job losses from the tide of asbestos-related bankruptcies. But the organization dropped its backing for the measure after the specifics emerged.

Bill Samuel, the group' s director of legislation, said the AFL-CIO could support a "properly designed trust fund."

"Everyone needs to take a deep breath right now," Samuel said. "The two sides are pretty dug in, and that's not the best atmosphere for legislating."

Both sides have spent the week coordinating sprawling teams of lobbyists with frequent conference calls. The Asbestos Alliance, a group of old-line manufacturers and insurers backing the bill, has held joint calls with the team from the Asbestos Study Group, which includes companies with less direct ties to their asbestos liabilities, such as Viacom, Pfizer and General Electric.

"There are calls all day, all the time," said one lobbyist familiar with the groups. Lobbyists on the calls discuss target lists and divvy up new assignments.

On the other side, lobbyists for the Coalition for Asbestos Reform had been calling in new information to a war room the group set up in the downtown offices of lobbying and public relations firm Fleishmann-Hillard.

"The guys at Fleishmann-Hillard have their hands on the knobs," CAR's O'Brien said. "They keep the data together and run everything through me to the people who are active."

All the outside help has not come cheap. Recent disclosures show K Streeters working on asbestos issues pulled in some of the largest lobbying receipts for the first half of last year. The law firm Swidler Berlin had the single largest lobbying contract in town — worth $4.8 million through the first half of 2005 — for its work for the Asbestos Study Group, according to PoliticalMoneyLine.com. Sonnenschein Nath and Rosenthal claimed the fourth-most lucrative contract for its work on asbestos. It earned $1.2 million lobbying for Federal Mogul Corp., a bankrupt auto parts manufacturer.

Lawyers Argue That Boy Scouts Deserve Space At San Diego Parks (AP)

By PAUL CHAVEZ, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 15, 2006

LOS ANGELES -- An attorney for the Boys Scouts of America and a lawyer from the Bush administration's Justice Department told an appellate court panel Tuesday that a lower court erred when it ruled that San Diego was promoting religion by granting the youth organization long-term leases to city parklands.

George Davidson, an attorney for the Boy Scouts, said the group has no theology and only holds the position that children should "do duty to God" in order to become productive citizens. The organization has few references to religion in its manual and has a practice of "punting it back to parents and religious leaders" when it comes to religious matters, Davidson told the court.

Eric Treene, a Justice Department lawyer in the Civil Rights Division, told the three-judge panel of the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals that the Scouts have a nondiscrimination policy when it comes to who can use its space and the city has more than 120 leases with other groups who use park areas in exchange for maintenance and improvements.

The Boy Scouts has been the target of preferential treatment lawsuits since the U.S. Supreme Court in June 2000 ruled that the organization has a constitutional right to exclude openly gay men from serving as troop leaders and because it compels members to swear an oath of duty to God.

The American Civil Liberties Union sued San Diego and the Boy Scouts of America over the leases in August 2000 on behalf of a lesbian couple and an agnostic couple, each with scouting-age sons.

U.S. District Judge Napoleon Jones Jr. ruled in July 2003 that San Diego acted improperly when it leased 18 acres of Balboa Park camp space to the Scouts. The judge ruled that the group is a religious organization and the lease violated the federal establishment clause that prohibits the government promotion of religion.

The city's action was an implicit endorsement of the Scouts' "inherently religious programs and practices," Jones ruled.

The same judge later ruled that the Scouts' lease with the city for a separate aquatics center at Fiesta Island in Mission Bay Park also was illegal.

Jones said the city has shown preferential treatment to the Boy Scouts, "an admittedly religious, albeit nonsectarian, and discriminatory organization," because it had negotiated exclusively with the Scouts for the lease of the aquatics center.

The Scouts had leased the half-acre Fiesta Island property since 1987 at no charge. The group spent $2 million to build the aquatics center and provided for its maintenance.

The Balboa Park camp was developed by the Scouts after World War II and in 1957 the group signed a 50-year lease with the city. The lawsuit was brought after the City Council voted to extend the lease for 25 years.

Mark Danis, an attorney for the plaintiffs, told the appellate court Tuesday that the Boy Scouts reserves six weeks during the height of summer for itself on Fiesta Island and other groups have "inferior access" to both sites. The group also has its local headquarters on the site, he said.

"San Diego city land can't be used as the headquarters of a discriminatory organization," Danis said outside court. "This organization kicks people out if they don't believe in God and our clients are agnostics, they chose to not believe in God, and they can't use city land on an equal basis with Boy Scouts."

The Bush administration in March 2004 filed a friend of the court brief arguing that even though Boy Scouts believes in God and members take an oath to do their duty to God, the group is not a religious organization.

The panel did not release a decision, which typically isn't announced until three to six months following the hearing of arguments.

U.S. Justice Department Investigates Decrease In Student Population (WTVM-TV)

WTVM-TV, Columbus, GA, February 15, 2006

Schools in Barbour County are becoming predominately black.

A problem Superintendent Vic Adkinson is out to change. "From a legal sense, the status-quo cannot be continued where an open enrollment is allowed and students are allowed to come and it's being selected cased on, whether it's been based on race, academic performance or socio-economic status. You know it's got to stop," says Barbour County Superintendent, Vic Adkinson.

During the past few years Adkinson says he's seen a decrease in the student population in Barbour County. Many of those students he says have transferred to the Dale County School System.

A problem that has prompted an investigation by the U.S. Justice Department.

Information released by its Civil Rights Division says during the 2004-05 school year Barbour County enrolled 1,222 students... of whom 94% were black and only 63 students were white. We're told Dale County accepted 168 students from Barbour County...of those, 78% were white and all were allowed to transfer.

"The Justice Department has asked them to stop accepting students and to give them a response on how they're going to deal with the students that they have now that are from Barbour County," says Adkinson.

Gloria Witcher has worked for the Barbour County School District for 33-years.

She says the school district is changing for the better and that every child receives a quality education in all of the county schools. "I think the school district is getting a bad rap because of ignorance, ignorance meaning not knowing a lot of people don't know about the shcools and don't know about the system and hear from others," says Witcher.

Adkinson says students crossing county lines for Dale County are costing his school system more than one million dollars annually.

Federal Government May Challenge South Carolina Primary (AP)

By JIM DAVENPORT, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 15, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department is challenging the way South Carolina conducts primaries and that could change the long-used calendar for primary runoffs that now come two weeks after the first round of voting.

A spokesman for the Justice Department said Tuesday the agency is enforcing laws intended to make sure people living overseas or serving in the military abroad have the same opportunity to vote as those living here. Several states, including South Carolina, were asked several months ago to show how they would make sure ballots were sent and received in time to be counted, Justice Department spokesman Eric Holland said.

He would not say whether the agency is considering an injunction against South Carolina that could delay primaries. "We're working with those states to resolve those issues," Holland said.

Sen. Larry Martin, R-Pickens, said he wanted to rush a bill through the Senate to avoid the potential for a federal injunction on the issue that could delay the June 13 primary and plans for runoff voting on June 27.

Martin said the legislation he was introducing would delay any primary runoff by two weeks, pushing it back to a month after the primary.

Without the delay, there "most likely would be an effort to enjoin our primaries," Martin said.

State Election Commission Director Marci Andino was not immediately available to talk about the situation.

While the agency knows of no formal complaints on the issue, "we have known that this has been an issue for some voters for some time," spokesman Chris Whitmire said.

"We have taken steps to address the problem," he said.

For instance, the state already sends blank ballots to be used for runoff voting and has set up systems that let voters return ballots by fax or electronically, Whitmire said.

"The Department of Justice is still concerned about it and has indicated again that if something isn't done about it, they will seek some relief through the courts," Whitmire said.

Harvard Study Blasts Bush Education Policy (REU-Y2)

By Jason Szep

Reuters, February 14, 2006

President George W. Bush's No Child Left Behind education policy has in some cases benefited white middle-class children over blacks and other minorities in poorer regions, a Harvard University study showed on Tuesday.

Political compromises forged between some states and the federal government have allowed schools in some predominantly white districts to dodge penalties faced by regions with larger ethnic minority populations, the study said.

Bush's 2001 No Child Left Behind Act was meant to introduce national standards to an education system where only two-thirds of teenagers graduate from high school, a proportion that slides to 50 percent for black Americans and Hispanics.

But instead of uniform standards, the policy has allowed various states to negotiate treaties and bargains to reduce the number of schools and districts identified as failing, said the study by Harvard University's Civil Rights Project.

"There's a very uneven effect. There are no clear uniform standards that are governing No Child Left Behind. If one state gets one thing, another state can do something else," the study's lead author, Gail Sunderman, said in an interview.

In Washington, a bipartisan commission announced on Tuesday that it was being created to take a "hard, independent look" at the law's problems and promises, and then make recommendations to Congress before the law's expected renewal in 2007.

Under No Child Left Behind, children in every racial and demographic group in every school must improve their scores on standardized tests in math and English each year. Failure to achieve annual progress can lead to sanctions against schools.

Children in poorly performing schools can switch schools if space is available. In extreme cases, schools can be closed.

But a surge in the number of schools identified as "needing improvement," including many considered top performers in their state, has stirred opposition to the law nationwide -- from a legal challenge in Connecticut to a rebellion by state legislators in staunchly Republican Utah.

The 60-page study examines letters sent by the Department of Education to all 50 states on how each state can administer the law and on their accountability plans.

Forty-nine states have taken some action to amend the law or been granted waivers to provisions in No Child Left Behind, the study said. "The problem with this approach is that it does not affect all schools equally," said Sunderman. "No two states are now subject to the same requirements."

In one example the study cites, states in rural Midwestern regions were granted extensions to deadlines to meet requirements on teacher qualifications that were unavailable to poorer rural regions with greater numbers of black Americans and ethnic minorities in southeast and southwest states.

"The policy is essentially a product of negotiation, of power and discretion, not law," Gary Orfield, director of Harvard's Civil Rights Project, said in the report.

Chad Colby, a spokesman for the U.S. Department of Education, called Harvard's study "misinformed" and "flawed." "We leave it up to the states to determine how they are going to get there. It's exactly the opposite of one-size-fits-all."

Judge Allows Week To Craft Youth Facility Injunction (HSB)

By B.J. Reyes

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, February 15, 2006

A federal judge has given attorneys one week to draft an injunction to protect lesbians, gays, bisexuals and transgender wards at the Hawaii Youth Correctional Facility until a lawsuit alleging abuse and harassment of such inmates can be decided.

Attorneys for the state and the American Civil Liberties Union of Hawaii say they are far apart on an agreement but will try to negotiate something by next Tuesday's deadline.

When asked whether he was confident that an agreement could be reached, Attorney General Mark Bennett flatly replied, "No."

"I'm not confident that we can reach an agreement on the language of an injunction, no, but we'll certainly try," Bennett said. "We've been trying; it didn't succeed. We'll try some more."

Lois Perrin, legal director for the ACLU of Hawaii, echoed his sentiments.

"We're certainly willing to try and come up with agreed-upon language," Perrin said. "Our objective here is to ensure that the discrimination and harassment of (lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender) wards at HYCF is fixed and that it's fixed promptly."

The ACLU sued in September on behalf of three former wards who alleged they were harassed and abused because of their actual or perceived gender identity and that administrators knew of the problems but did nothing to stop it.

U.S. District Judge J. Michael Seabright ordered the injunction last week, finding that there was enough evidence to support their claims.

He left it up to the state and the ACLU to draft the injunction to be consistent with any agreement reached between the state and the U.S. Department of Justice over reform at the youth prison. An agreement on a three-year plan to improve conditions at the facility was announced the same day as Seabright's injunction ruling.

If the two sides cannot reach an agreement on an injunction, Seabright said he would issue one himself.

Bennett said the ACLU's proposed language was too broad and not specific enough to inform workers at the youth prison of what they would be barred from doing.

The state also objected to having a monitor appointed by the court to oversee the policies and procedures being implemented to prevent abuse and harassment of wards.

Bennett noted that as part of the negotiated agreement with the Justice Department, the state has retained a national expert on secured youth facilities who will work with the state to implement the agreed-upon reforms.

Perrin said she wanted to make sure that any expert retained by the state has experience working with "vulnerable" youths, and in particular experience working with lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender youths.

She said her main objection to the state's injunction proposal was that it "doesn't have a lot of teeth."

"It does not set forth any sort of comprehensible deadline," she said. "It doesn't have any intermediate benchmarks to determine when policies and procedures need to be in place."

Behind L.A. Jail Clashes: Rising Pressures (CSM)

By Daniel B. Wood

The Christian Science Monitor, February 15, 2006

LOS ANGELES - Riots that rocked Los Angeles County jails this month can be attributed to overcrowding, say some criminal-justice analysts. Other observers cite rising gang conflicts between blacks and Hispanics throughout the L.A. area, which they say are increasingly spilling into a jail system ill-equipped to deal with it. To still others, blame lies with a society eager to punish wayward young men harshly, with little thought to the fact that they will one day be released to walk the streets.

Whichever explanation hits closest to the truth, the violence in the nation's largest jail system - which has involved 2,000 inmates and resulted in two deaths and nearly 100 serious injuries - points to rising pressures inside the jails and the challenges of containing them. On Monday, jail authorities, who have come under fire for not quelling the violence, began transferring hundreds of county jail inmates to state prisons in a bid to separate the most violent offenders from the general jail population.

The riots, which began Feb. 4 at a correctional facility 40 miles north of Los Angeles in Castaic, involved dormitories of more than 100 men, who attacked one another in succession and tossed beds from balconies. Inmates beat a black prisoner to death at Castaic's biggest jail, Pitchess Detention Center. Fighting broke out last week at the two smaller jails at Pitchess. Despite lockdowns of facilities across the county - meaning restricted movement inside and limited visitation - similar incidents followed. A second inmate died Sunday after a racially motivated fight at Men's Central Jail.

Investigators initially said nonjailed members of the Mexican mafia ordered Latino inmates to attack black prisoners in retaliation for an earlier attack, outside of jail, on a Latino by black gang members in Los Angeles. Inmate-on-inmate attacks at the Castaic facility have nearly doubled since 2003, officials said. Violence between blacks and Latinos has tripled on the streets since the 1990s, as the Latino population has increased and moved into black neighborhoods. Overcrowding: a national problem

Though the Los Angeles County system is the one now under the microscope, law-enforcement officials say rising violence and overcrowding in prisons and jails are a national problem.

"The explosions of violence we are seeing in Los Angeles are systemic nationwide," says Terry Jungel, past president of the National Sheriffs Association. Years of get-tough-on-crime policies have emphasized rhetoric over funding, and strict confinement instead of programs to address prisoner problems or conditions, he says. "You are taking the troublemakers and rule-breakers of society all together in a confined space with close contact in an environment that was not designed for more violent criminals or for long periods of incarceration."

What might help ease tensions are programs that provide outlets for prisoners under stress - from more exercise time to anger-management classes - and for greater help for prisoners upon release from jail, some say.

"No one really knows yet exactly how this started, but it is clear that this is an opportunity to do everything we can to keep it from happening again," says Lita Herron, director of Mothers on the March, a community-based group that addresses crime and punishment issues in L.A. "There's no question this city has turned its back on incarcerated youth and turned our jails into a byproduct of such neglect. Now, we've seen the consequences of what happens if we continue to do nothing about it." Possible solutions

In recent years, L.A. County Sheriff Lee Baca twice tried, unsuccessfully, to get voters to approve sales-tax increases to upgrade facilities and staff.

Others suggest jail officials should segregate inmates by their proclivity toward violence, instead of by race or gang affiliation. And they say voluntary and state-funded counseling programs can help prisoners overcome the problems that landed them in jail, including drugs and domestic violence. Physical activities can keep inmates from going stir-crazy.

"There are places in L.A. County jails where people of all races and security risk are housed in dorms and getting along just fine," says Jody Kent, coordinator of the Jails Project at the ACLU of Southern California. "What is the difference? There are physical fitness programs to keep them from remaining in a tight space that would agitate anyone and ... educational programs that don't necessarily require extra staffing or supervision."

The public, however, is more concerned about punishing offenders than rehabilitating them, say Mr. Jungel and others.

"It is always hard to define the line between social retribution and meeting the needs of the inmate without appearing to have the comfort of a country club," says Jungel. "We are finding that incarceration costs more than Americans are currently willing to pay. But we are also finding that if we don't pay for the price of security, the price of no security is even higher."

Urgent Appeal For Jail Safety (LAT)

By Megan Garvey And Jack Leonard, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2006

Supervisors want to know why inmates of varying threat levels are placed together, a practice called 'not permissible' a year ago.

A black inmate who died Sunday after a fight with Latino cellmates at Men's Central Jail had been placed in a group cell with inmates considered serious security threats, despite repeated warnings to sheriff's officials that mixing nonviolent and violent inmates can be deadly.

The death brought new criticism of the Sheriff's Department, which has struggled to calm racially charged violence in the jail system. It has faced scrutiny in the past for killings inside the jails when high-risk and lower-risk inmates are placed together.

Sean Anthony Thompson, 38, had been arrested last week on suspicion of drug possession after he ran a stop sign in Long Beach. Jailers designated Thompson, the father of three, a "moderate security risk" because he had previous convictions for nonviolent felonies. Authorities said he was attacked after coming to the aid of a 63-year-old black cellmate, also charged with drug possession, who was threatened by three younger Latino inmates trying to take over a bunk bed that had the best light for reading. A fourth Latino in the cell did not take part in the attack.

Deputies had classified the three Latinos as so-called "level 8s" — the second-highest threat level in the county's inmate classification system and a designation given to inmates with a history of assaults or escapes. The men — ages 18, 21 and 25 — were in jail on such charges as robbery, felony assault with a gun and a parole violation on a previous attempted-murder conviction, Sheriff's Department sources said.

The Sheriff's Department continues to combine inmates of notably different threat levels even though the practice was deemed "not permissible" under any circumstances in a confidential report to the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors more than a year ago that raised numerous safety concerns about the jail's use of security classifications.

That report by Merrick Bobb, who oversees the Sheriff's Department for the supervisors, was commissioned after the killing of five inmates over seven months in late 2003 and early 2004 — with three of the deaths blamed on victims being housed with more violent offenders.

Thompson's death marks the second time in three months that a jail inmate has died after being placed with more dangerous inmates. In November, a mentally ill man was stomped to death by violent gang members in a room with no supervision at Men's Central Jail in downtown Los Angeles.

Sheriff's officials acknowledged the practice is dangerous.

"We won't be doing that in the future. We're going to stop that," said Marc Klugman, head of the Correctional Services Division.

But he said the mixing of moderate-security threat inmates with more violent offenders will continue through the end of March, when jailers will be able to shift high-risk offenders to facilities such as the Twin Towers jail downtown.

In heated questioning of sheriff's jail officials at Tuesday's board meeting, county supervisors warned that they were facing massive liability if such mismatches continue.

"We are in a war," said Supervisor Mike Antonovich. "As we delay these ideas … we continue to provide a threat to the safety of our sheriff's personnel and other inmates who are in those facilities…. Somehow, you have a week of rioting, there can't be a greater sense of urgency for us to make timely decisions to bring on the additional personnel and make the necessary changes."

Supervisor Gloria Molina expressed growing frustration with the sheriff's effort to reduce jail violence in a testy exchange with Klugman during Tuesday's board meeting.

"Everything that's going on in our communities is coming into our jails in a concentrated form," Klugman said. "I agree with you that we need to do better. We're trying to do better."

That prompted Molina to retort: "That really leaves me almost hopeless about some of the issues that are going on…. Right now, we are creating a real Band-Aid operation out there."

Bobb called the dynamics in the six-man cell at Men's Central Jail where Thompson died "a tinderbox." He said that not only was the mixing of security levels dangerous, but the matchup of four Latino inmates to two black inmates was in itself a problem, particularly more than a week into large-scale racial rioting in the jail system.

"I am dismayed," Bobb said Tuesday, adding that he did not understand why changes recommended more than a year ago were still not implemented.

Sheriff Lee Baca is an elected official, not an appointee of the Board of Supervisors, although he and other sheriff's officials regularly appear before the board to answer questions. The supervisors fund the Sheriff's Department out of county revenue.

Thompson wasn't even in the system when rioting began at Pitchess Detention Center in Castaic on Feb. 4. He was stopped three days later by Long Beach police for allegedly running a stop sign and was arrested after officers found a small rock-like substance believed to be cocaine.

He pleaded not guilty Thursday to one felony count of possession of a controlled substance, according to the Los Angeles County district attorney's office. His bail was set at $35,000 and he was transferred to county jail.

Thompson's sister, Trina Thompson, said deputies did not tell her the other inmates were more dangerous.

They told her that her brother, a large man who suffered from high blood pressure and chronic asthma, tried to protect the older black cellmate.

"They shouldn't have placed that old man in there with those high security risk Latinos," she said. "My brother was outnumbered."

DOJ_NMG_0015286

Sheriff's officials said one of the four Latinos, a 30-year-old man charged with spousal rape and ranked a moderate security risk, did not participate in the fight.

Thompson complained of chest pains and shortness of breath after deputies broke up the disturbance. He died a short time later.

His autopsy was performed Monday, but Los Angeles County coroner's officials said the results would not be released until toxicology tests come back, probably in six to eight weeks. Sheriff's homicide detectives are investigating the case.

Thompson's longtime girlfriend, Joey Dasecke, 37, of Bellflower, said she did not learn what had happened to her companion of seven years until she tried to check on his whereabouts using the jail's Internet inmate finder Monday. On the site she saw Thompson listed as "deceased."

Criminal court records show a few drug possession charges for Thompson that date back to the early 1990s. Dasecke said he had had some problems with drugs but she knew of no instance when he had been violent.

At Tuesday's board meeting, Antonovich faulted sheriff's officials for the slow progress in recruiting deputies and attempts to improve security in the jails.

Reacting to news that Thompson had been housed alongside much more dangerous inmates, Antonovich said: "Doesn't that indicate that it's not working?"

Though no new major disturbances have occurred since Sunday, the riots and fights had gone on for the previous nine days, involving thousands of jail inmates.

In addition to Thompson's death, a black inmate was beaten to death in the first riot and more than 100 inmates have been injured, some seriously.

Sheriff's officials told county supervisors that they would not segregate inmates by either gangs or race.

Chief Sammy L. Jones, who heads the department's custodial division, said the jails do not have the space to properly separate gangs — an action that would leave many beds empty in dorms assigned to particular gangs.

Supervisors Zev Yaroslavsky and Don Knabe called on their colleagues to stop blaming sheriff's officials for the jail's problems, noting that the department was in the middle of revamping the way it decides where inmates should be housed.

"There's plenty of blame to go round," Yaroslavsky said, addressing sheriff's officials. "But I think that these guys are problem solvers."

Evolution Supporters Win In Ohio (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

USA Today, February 15, 2006

In the first major vote since a federal judge ruled last year that intelligent design can't be taught in public schools, the Ohio Board of Education voted Tuesday to eliminate science standards that asked students to apply a “critical analysis” to Darwin's theory of evolution.

Scientists had assailed the Ohio standards as an attempt to repackage intelligent design and introduce religious principles into science class. Intelligent design holds that life on Earth is so complex that it could have been created only by an “intelligent designer” such as God.

Tuesday's 11-4 vote rejected a short passage that said students should be able to “describe how scientists continue to investigate and critically analyze aspects of evolutionary theory.”

The board also rejected a model biology lesson that critics said promoted intelligent design. Three board members who voted in January to keep the optional lesson were absent Tuesday, and supporters of the materials said they would force a new vote to get the material back into students' hands.

In December, U.S. District Judge John E. Jones rebuked supporters of intelligent design, saying a 2004 effort by the Dover, Pa., school board to challenge Darwin violated the constitutional separation of church and state and was a thinly veiled attempt to introduce religion into science class.

Ohio Gov. Bob Taft called for the state board review earlier this month and warned members that he expected them to defend evolution. Board member Martha Wise, a 28-year member of the state board who had pushed for Tuesday's vote, later said she was “ecstatic.”

Wise, 72, a Methodist who says she believes in creationism, says the principle should not be taught in science class.

“I believe that religion and teaching of church and God should be done at home, should be done at church and can be done in any other classroom besides science.”

Taft, a Republican, set the stage for the vote earlier this month when he said intelligent design shouldn't be advocated by the state board.

He also challenged board members to keep evolution in the education standards, which guide educators' decisions on how to build lessons.

Four state board members are up for reappointment at the end of the year. Taft told The (Cleveland) Plain Dealer, “I want to know what their views are before I decide whether to reappoint them.”

Ohio Board Undoes Stand On Evolution (NYT)

By Jodi Rudoren

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Feb. 14 — The Ohio Board of Education voted 11 to 4 Tuesday to toss out a mandate that 10th-grade biology classes include critical analysis of evolution and an accompanying model lesson plan, dealing the intelligent design movement its second serious defeat in two months.

The board, which became the first in the nation to single out evolution for special scrutiny under the academic standards it adopted in 2002, stripped the language from the curriculum partly out of fear of a lawsuit in the wake of a December ruling by a federal judge that teaching intelligent design in the Dover, Pa., public schools was unconstitutional.

While the Ohio lesson plan does not mention intelligent design, which posits that life is too complex to be explained by evolution alone, critics contend that the critical analysis language is simply design in disguise.

"This lesson is bad news, the 'critically analyze' wording is bad news," Martha W. Wise, the board member who offered the emergency motion, told her colleagues during 90 minutes of contentious debate here Tuesday afternoon. "It is deeply unfair to the children of this state to mislead them about the nature of science."

Darwin's defenders celebrated the reversal as a sign of a backlash against the inroads made last year by critics of evolution. But leaders of the Discovery Institute, the intellectual home of intelligent design, warned that Ohio's move would create a backlash of its own.

"It's an outrageous slap in the face to the citizens of Ohio," said John G. West, associate director of the Center for Science and Culture at the institute, referring to several polls that show public support for criticism of evolution in science classes.

"The effort to try to suppress ideas that you dislike, to use the government to suppress ideas you dislike, has a failed history," Mr. West said. "Do they really want to be on the side of the people who didn't want to let John Scopes talk or who tried to censor Galileo?"

But Eugenie C. Scott, director of the National Center for Science Education, called the Ohio vote "a significant victory" and said it should give pause to school districts and states considering changes in how evolution is taught.

The Discovery Institute had offered Ohio as a national model for its "teach the controversy" approach on evolution. Kansas, Minnesota, New Mexico and Pennsylvania have adopted similar "critical analysis" standards, and the South Carolina Board of Education is scheduled to vote next month on whether to add a similar phrase to its curriculum guidelines.

"This language from Ohio, the critically-analyze-evolution type language, is sprouting up all over, in both the local level, as well as with other state standards," Ms. Scott said. "The Ohio board has recognized its error, and other school districts should not make that same error."

The model lesson plan is voluntary, and it is unclear how many of Ohio's 613 local school districts use it. At Tuesday's meeting, Robin C. Hovis, a board member who urged its deletion, said that "we allow a Dover risk to remain if we leave this lesson plan on the shelf."

The vote followed Mrs. Wise's failed effort last month to kill the lesson plan, after which Gov. Bob Taft, a Republican, called for a legal review of the lesson in light of the Dover ruling. On Tuesday, a board member who supports the critical-analysis approach tried to pre-empt Mrs. Wise's motion by asking the attorney general to take a formal look, but defenders of evolution prevailed in a parliamentary maneuver.

Michael Cochran, one of three lawyers on the 19-member board, criticized Mrs. Wise's supporters as undoing a lengthy process that had led to adoption of the standards with an emergency motion on an afternoon that four members, three of whom support the lesson, were absent.

"It is absolutely disgraceful that we've had this for three years, and we can't wait another month," Mr. Cochran said. "I think that's by design. Not intelligent design, but by design."

Deborah Owens Fink, who along with Mr. Cochran voted against eliminating the critical-analysis language, said after the meeting that the vote was just another round in the culture war, not a knockout.

"There are no permanent victories in politics," Ms. Fink said. "You do not get paradigm shifts overnight. Whether the ultimate victory is today or it's tomorrow or it's two years from now, people demand that they get open discussion of this issue."

Ehrlich To Veto Bill On Felons (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0015288

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, February 15, 2006

ANNAPOLIS -- Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. yesterday vowed to veto a bill that would restore voting rights to felons, including the state's most violent criminals, immediately upon their release from prison.

"I don't think you reward the franchise to those who commit the most horrific crimes," Mr. Ehrlich, a Republican, told The Washington Times. "Full restoration of every right is inappropriate."

Dozens of House Democrats have co-sponsored legislation that would allow about 150,000 murderers, rapists, robbers and other felons to vote this year, and the state Democratic Party has endorsed the bill.

The bill's lead sponsor -- Delegate Salima Siler Marriott, Baltimore Democrat -- said yesterday that Mr. Ehrlich's position reinforces the racist underpinnings of the state law that denies the vote to felons, of whom about 85,000 are black.

Mrs. Marriott, who is black, said Mr. Ehrlich's sentiment "reflects the thinking" of Carter Glass, a delegate to the Virginia Constitutional Convention of 1901 who said felon disenfranchisement aims to "eliminate the darkie as a political factor."

"We all were raised in a racist society," said Mrs. Marriott, stressing that she was not calling Mr. Ehrlich a racist. "Let us be clear about what were the intentions of these laws."

Mr. Ehrlich said he would not "indulge her" by responding to her comments.

"There are white felons. Every issue isn't a racial issue around here," said the governor, who is seeking re-election.

Democratic lawmakers have attributed the Marriott bill's popularity to their party's aim to oust Mr. Ehrlich and secure black votes after Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, a Republican, in 2002 became the first black to win statewide office in Maryland.

According to Justice Maryland, a penal reform group that supports voting rights for felons, about 60 percent of Maryland felons are black and likely Democrats.

Ex-convicts could decide this year's election. Mr. Ehrlich won the 2002 gubernatorial race by about 66,000 votes, and the contest this year is expected to be even closer.

Neither of the Democratic gubernatorial candidates -- Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley and Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan -- has taken a position on immediately restoring felons' voting rights. Mr. O'Malley has said he favors a waiting period after prison before giving felons the vote.

Mr. Ehrlich said he is convinced that some Democrats are backing the bill for "purely partisan purposes."

"The vast majority of Marylanders would share my concern with the issue [and] would support my veto," he said.

The bill, which has more than half the 71 House votes needed for passage, has died in the General Assembly for three consecutive years. However, it appears to have momentum in both chambers this year.

"Once they have paid their debt to society, clearly they should be able to vote," Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr., Prince George's Democrat, said yesterday.

House Speaker Michael E. Busch, Anne Arundel Democrat, said the issue warrants study.

"It's obvious this [Democratic] leadership is tilting strongly left," Mr. Ehrlich said. "Maryland is a much more moderate state."

Sen. Andrew P. Harris, Baltimore County Republican and minority whip, said his caucus overwhelmingly shares the governor's view.

"Violent offenders give up the [voting] right when they commit a violent crime against another person," he said.

House Republican leaders also have said that most of the caucus would oppose the bill.

However, the Democratic majority is large enough in both chambers to pass the bill without Republican support.

Maryland is one of 11 states that disenfranchise some felons for life. The others are Alabama, Arizona, Delaware, Florida, Kentucky, Mississippi, Nevada, Tennessee, Virginia and Wyoming.

Virginia Gov. Mark Warner, a Democrat, restored the voting rights of 3,414 felons on a case-by-case basis -- more than any other governor of the 11 states with restrictions.

Douglass Still Battling The Old South (WP)

By Courtland Milloy

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

A kind of Civil War reenactment is underway in Talbot County on Maryland's Eastern Shore. A proposed statue of Frederick Douglass, the county's most famous native son, would be located near a Confederate memorial on the courthouse lawn. And to the dismay of some residents, the memorial to Douglass would be bigger.

Renowned sculptor Ed Dwight, at the request of a group of local activists known as Fred's Army, has come up with a preliminary design that takes up nearly a fifth of the courthouse lawn and would render the Confederate memorial little more than a pigeon perch by comparison.

Battle lines have been drawn.

"The policy adopted by the county is that any new statue would not exceed the proportions or dimensions of other statues," Philip C. Foster, a member of the Talbot County Council, told me. "And anyone who didn't die in a war would not be acknowledged as greater than those who did."

The Confederate memorial, 13 feet high and erected about 1913 in honor of "the Talbot Boys," is the only statue on the courthouse lawn. The cherubic-looking soldier holds a Confederate flag. The initials C.S.A., for Confederate States of America, are engraved on the pedestal.

Veterans groups and others have argued that the courthouse lawn is "hallowed ground" and should be reserved for war veterans. And they insist that race is not an issue, which, to a certain extent, is true. Fred's Army is racially mixed. And one or two black residents are said to have sided with those who oppose placing a statue of Douglass on the lawn.

But the notion that a memorial to an influential statesman and anti-slavery activist should be no greater than what is, in effect, a monument to slavery, is heavily freighted with race. And the objection that Douglass was not a war veteran discounts his role in the deadly struggle for racial equality.

"I don't concern myself with the Talbot Boys, except to say that if there can be a statue that represents what the Confederacy stood for, then we should be able to have a statue that represents what Douglass stood for," said Moonyene Jackson-Amis, a member of the City Council in Easton, the county seat, and a self-proclaimed "soldier" in Fred's Army.

The memorial would be a landscaped mini-plaza, about 35 feet long and 25 feet wide, with a border of bronze panels that depict various periods in Douglass's life. At the center would be a bronze statue of Douglass standing, on a pedestal, as high as the Confederate statue: 13 feet.

In 2004, the County Council voted 3 to 2 in favor of having a statue of Douglass at the courthouse. Foster cast the deciding vote. But his support is no longer assured.

Asked about Foster's concern that the proposed Douglass memorial might be too large, Jackson-Amis replied: "The only guideline we received was that the memorial could not be over 13 feet tall, no higher than the Confederate statue. We abided by that. Now they seem to be backpedaling."

There are numerous references to Douglass in Talbot County. If you drive along Route 303 in northeastern Talbot, you'll come to a marker noting the spot where he was born a slave on Feb. 14, 1818. A cabin used to be just off the road, but it's long gone. All that remains is a clump of trees.

During a recent Black History Month program in Easton, historian Bernard Demczuk told the audience that the absence of a monument to Douglass in Talbot was no accident.

"Black history was, essentially, 'disrecognized' in many rural areas," he said. "This phenomenon of the invisibility of black history is a Southern-styled, genteel form of white supremacy . . . as a legacy of slavery."

The Confederate memorial includes the names of Talbot residents who fought under the Stars and Bars even though Maryland remained in the Union. The first name on the list is Adm. Franklin Buchanan, a former commandant of the Washington Navy Yard, who defected to the Confederacy and fought for the South as a naval commander during the Battle of Mobile.

"He was a slave owner, a wealthy plantation owner, whose house is not far from here," Demczuk said. "Buchanan invited Jefferson Davis [the president of the Confederacy] to his plantation to recuperate after the Civil War. This guy was a major traitor, and to have his name at the top of a monument in Talbot County is an insult."

Not having a monument to Douglass even more so.

ANTITRUST:

U.S., EU Probe Airlines For Price-Fixing On Cargo (WSJ)

By Daniel Michaels And John R. Wilke

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

Several major air-cargo carriers were raided by U.S. and European antitrust enforcers as part of a trans-Atlantic investigation into possible price-fixing and collusion in air cargo, officials said.

Federal Bureau of Investigation agents raided British Airways facilities at New York's Kennedy Airport yesterday morning, confiscating computers and gathering documents, one official said; similar searches of airlines' facilities took place in Chicago, Miami, San Francisco and Long Beach, Calif. The European Commission conducted its own raids at the same time, saying it had carried out "unannounced inspections" of airline facilities and offices in Europe.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Justice Department said the antitrust division was coordinating with the European Union and "investigating the possibility of anticompetitive practices in the air-cargo industry."

Although neither authority specified which carriers are under investigation, British Airways, freight carrier Cargolux Airlines International of Luxembourg and units of Air France-KLM said they had been asked for information related to alleged anticompetitive activities, though they declined to comment further. German airline Lufthansa said it was cooperating with authorities.

In the U.S., AMR Corp. said its American Airlines cargo division received a subpoena from U.S. antitrust officials, though it said it wasn't told it was a target of the investigation and hadn't received a search warrant. UAL Corp., parent of United Airlines, said officials visited its cargo office in Frankfurt, though it didn't discuss further details. Atlas Air Worldwide Holdings Inc. said its Polar Air Cargo unit received a formal request for information from U.S. officials. The three said they would cooperate.

Japan Airlines said that its offices in Frankfurt and New York were searched and that it will cooperate.

None of the airlines have been accused of wrongdoing.

According to a statement by Scandinavian Airlines Systems, which said its offices were raided, European officials are investigating whether airlines have cooperated illegally on routes both within Europe and outside the EU since 2000. The statement didn't specify any airlines. SAS said the practices under investigation involved agreements regarding certain surcharges to offset external cost increases.

These include fuel surcharges, security measures after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the U.S. and the increased cost of war-risk insurance following the start of military action in Iraq in 2003, SAS said. The airline added, however, that it sees no reason to suspect any violations of antitrust laws.

EU regulators said the raids were just the beginning of an investigation and don't mean that the companies raided will be found guilty or fined.

It remains unclear by what mechanism the airlines may have illegally cooperated. Since the global airline crisis that followed the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, carriers have sought to pass increased costs along to customers. In the price-sensitive passenger-airline market, this has been difficult, although many carriers -- especially outside the U.S. -- have imposed passenger fuel surcharges.

Cargo shippers, which use both dedicated cargo airlines and cargo space in the bellies of passenger planes, have routinely paid fuel surcharges, even before Sept. 11, 2001. Cargo shippers have passed that cost, normally set as a fee per ton of cargo, along to their customers.

The European Commission can penalize companies as much as 10% of their annual global sales if they find evidence of price-fixing and faces no strict deadline to complete a cartel investigation. In the U.S., price-fixing is a criminal offense carrying stiff fines and possible jail sentences for executives.

European regulators have stepped up cooperation with the Justice Department in recent years, resulting in a rise in global-cartel cases. Under what are known as leniency rules, a cartel participant who blows the whistle and agrees to provide evidence against the others can receive immunity. It isn't clear if one of the airlines involved in the investigation acted as a whistle-blower.

In 2002, the EU changed its policy to mirror U.S. law. A lack of trans-Atlantic coordination had discouraged international cartel participants from self-reporting illegal activity for fear that a confession in one jurisdiction could lead to legal jeopardy in another, U.S. and EU antitrust officials have said.

Regulators Launch Probe Of Cargo Carriers (AP)

U.S., Europe Regulators Launch Probe of Cargo Carriers, Examine Possible Price Fixing in Industry

LONDON (AP) -- U.S. and European regulators have launched a probe of trans-Atlantic cargo carriers, examining possible price fixing in the air cargo industry.

The European Commission carried out surprise inspections Tuesday at several major Europeans airlines, while the U.S. Justice Department issued subpoenas.

British Airways, Air France, KLM, Lufthansa and Luxembourg's Cargolux Airlines all confirmed they were cooperating with authorities investigating the pricing practices in the industry.

The largest U.S. airline, AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, also said it has received a subpoena from the Justice Department as part of an investigation into practices in the air-cargo industry.

American was not been told it was a target of the investigation "and unlike some other airlines," didn't receive a search warrant, spokesman Tim Wagner said. He said the Fort Worth, Texas-based airline would cooperate fully with investigators.

United Airlines, a unit of UAL Corp., said its United Cargo office in Frankfurt, Germany received an inquiry from European authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0015291

"We are giving the European authorities our full cooperation in this matter," spokesman Jeff Green said in an e-mail to The Associated Press. "United conducts its business in full compliance with European rules and regulations."

In Houston, a spokeswoman for Continental Airlines Inc. said that carrier had not received a subpoena.

Also Tuesday, Justice Department officials searched Japan Airlines' cargo offices at New York's JFK International Airport, airline spokesman Steve Pearlman said Wednesday in Tokyo. EU officials also searched JAL offices in Frankfurt.

In a brief statement to the London Stock Exchange, British Airways PLC said it had received a request for information from both the European Commission and the Department of Justice and was assisting in the probe.

Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona said that U.S. investigators are working with the EU and other authorities to investigate possible "anti-competitive behavior."

Patrick Jeanne, a spokesman for cargo airline Cargolux Airlines International SA, said the carrier had been visited Tuesday by EU inspectors.

KLM spokesman Hugo Baas confirmed KLM is included in the probe and that investigators were at the company today. He said KLM is extending "full cooperation, and we have all the faith in the outcome of the investigation."

Lufthansa AG and Air France issued similar statements pledging cooperation. KLM and Air France are part of Air France-KLM Group.

The EC said surprise inspections are a preliminary step in investigations into suspected cartels.

"The fact that the European Commission carries out such inspections does not mean that the companies are guilty of anti-competitive behavior nor does it prejudge the outcome of the investigation itself," it said in a statement.

It provided no further detail of what was being examined and put no time frame on the completion of its investigation.

BA said its policy is "to conduct its business in full compliance with all the applicable competition laws."

The airline said it had no immediate comment beyond its statement.

LAN Cargo, the cargo division of Chile's flag airline LAN Chile, said Tuesday that U.S. government officials appeared at its Miami office as part of the probe.

The company said in a statement that "it is giving maximum cooperation to the authorities in charge of the investigation."

UPDATE 4-Airlines Raided In EU, U.S. Cargo Probe (REU)

By David Lawsky and Jeremy Pelofsky

Reuters, February 14, 2006

BRUSSELS/WASHINGTON, Feb 14 (Reuters) - U.S. and European officials raided airlines on both sides of the Atlantic on Tuesday in an investigation of possible price-fixing of freight shipments by passenger and cargo airlines.

The European Union's executive arm and the U.S. Justice Department conducted searches of some leading passenger airlines' cargo operations in Europe and around the United States, and other airlines were asked for information related to the probe.

"The Commission has reason to believe that the companies concerned may have violated (a European Union) treaty, which prohibits practices such as price fixing," the European Commission said in a statement.

In Washington, the U.S. Justice Department said it was also participating in the probe. "We're coordinating with the EU and other foreign competition authorities," said spokeswoman Gina Talamona, declining to provide more details.

U.S. law enforcement officials said searches took place in New York; Chicago; Miami; Boca Raton, Florida; San Francisco; and Long Beach, California.

It is against the law in most countries for companies to collude to set prices or divide territory. It is standard practice for antitrust authorities in Europe, the United States and other countries to coordinate simultaneous raids on suspects in cartel cases.

The European Commission said it had conducted raids and while it declined to name the targets, Scandinavian airline SAS (SAS.ST: Quote, Profile, Research) revealed it had been raided.

"We don't feel there is any reason for concern, but this will have to be verified," spokesman Hans Ollongren said.

British Airways Plc (BAY.L: Quote, Profile, Research), Air France KLM (AIRF.PA: Quote, Profile, Research), and freight airline Cargolux said they were asked for information related to alleged cartel activity. German carrier Lufthansa (LHAG.DE: Quote, Profile, Research) also said it would cooperate with the probe.

Search warrants were executed at KLM and Air France cargo terminals at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport, according to FBI spokesman Ross Rice. "No arrests were made, no charges have been filed," he said.

"Everything is sealed so we can't talk about it," said another law enforcement official with knowledge of the matter when asked about the search warrants.

DOJ_NMG_0015292

The world's two biggest airlines, AMR Corp.'s (AMR.N: Quote, Profile, Research) American Airlines and UAL Corp.'s (UAUA.O: Quote, Profile, Research) United Airlines, both said they received inquiries as part of the probe.

No. 1 carrier American said it has been subpoenaed by Justice Department investigators but said it has not been told that it is a target of the investigation and has not received a search warrant, like some other carriers.

"American intends to cooperate fully with the DOJ's investigation," said Tim Wagner, an airline spokesman.

United said its cargo office in Frankfurt received an inquiry from European authorities.

Polar Air Cargo Inc., a unit of Atlas Air Worldwide Holdings Inc., said it received a request for information as well.

Cargo outfits FedEx(FDX.N: Quote, Profile, Research), UPS (UPS.N: Quote, Profile, Research) and Deutsche Post's (DPWGn.DE: Quote, Profile, Research) express courier DHL said they were not included in the probe.

Cargo receipts are a reliable stream of revenue for passenger airlines, which carry mail and other packages in the belly of planes.

Revenue for most passenger airlines has been growing with rebounding travel but high costs linked to soaring fuel prices have led to big losses.

In response to higher fuel costs, airlines have previously said they would hike fuel surcharges on freight shipments.

"Generally speaking in these types of circumstances what they're looking for is documents, laptop computers, electronic records, that would reveal evidence of some sort of collusion to which the authorities have been alerted," said James Loftis, an antitrust lawyer with the firm Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher LLP. American Confirms Federal Probe Over Pricing Practices (FWST)

By Trebor Banstetter

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, February 15, 2006

FORT WORTH — The U.S. Department of Justice has subpoenaed American Airlines in conjunction with an investigation into pricing practices in the air cargo industry, American officials said Tuesday.

The subpoena was served by the department's antitrust division, said a spokesman, Tim Wagner. It came amid a European Union probe into possible anti-competitive practices within the European air cargo industry.

"American has not been notified that it is a target of the investigation," he said. "Unlike some other airlines, (American) has not received a search warrant."

He added that the Fort Worth-based airline "intends to cooperate fully with the (department's) investigation."

On Tuesday, investigators with the European Union raided the offices of British Airways, Air France-KLM and Deutsche Lufthansa, according to a Bloomberg News report.

Officials with United Airlines confirmed that they also were cooperating with investigators on the issue.

American and most other airlines have implemented fuel surcharges on cargo operations during the past year to help offset the rising cost of jet fuel. American's cargo operations brought in about $622 million last year, down slightly from $625 million the previous year.

Shares of AMR Corp., American's parent company, rose 93 cents, or about 4 percent, to close at $24.96 in trading Tuesday.

Japan Air, Cathay Pacific In EU's Air Cargo Probes (Update1) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, February 15, 2006

Feb. 15 (Bloomberg) -- Japan Airlines Corp. and Cathay Pacific Airways Ltd. said they are among at least 10 global airlines under investigation by European and U.S. regulators into possible price fixing in the air cargo market.

European Union investigators yesterday raided the offices of Japan Airlines, British Airways Plc, Deutsche Lufthansa AG and Air France-KLM Group, according to the carriers. Hong Kong-based Cathay Pacific said its offices in Frankfurt, Los Angeles and San Francisco were included in the probes.

The push for ``the investigation is probably from the U.S." because ``the basic rule in America is Thou Shall Not Fix Prices," said Jim Eckes, managing director of Hong Kong-based Indoswiss Aviation, which advises global airlines. ``It looks like a very sizeable investigation" and ``the EU will be very determined to stamp out this sort of thing."

The global air freight industry, which expanded 12 percent in 2004 to 37.6 million tons of cargo, is under scrutiny for the way rates are set. Under EU law, the European Commission can impose a fine of as much as 10 percent of annual sales on companies found to be operating a cartel. It typically opts for about 2 percent to 3 percent of sales.

``The commission has reason to believe that the companies concerned may have violated'' EU cartel rules, according to a statement yesterday by the Brussels-based commission.

FedEx Corp., the second-largest U.S. package delivery company, said it has not been contacted by the commission, according to an e-mail today by spokeswoman Julia Khong.

Request for Information

AMR Corp.'s American Airlines unit received a subpoena while UAL Corp.'s United Airlines received an ``inquiry'' from EU officials through its United Cargo office in Frankfurt, according to the carrier's spokesman Jeff Green.

``We are cooperating with the investigation,'' Tokyo-based Japan Airline's spokeswoman Yuko Takahashi said by phone today, confirming the company's Frankfurt office was raided yesterday. The airline's shares fell as much as 1.2 percent to 323 yen and traded at 324 yen after four directors demanded for the resignation of Chief Executive Officer Toshiyuki Shinmachi to take the blame for the carrier's poor performance. Shinmachi rejected the demand.

``Cartel Activity''

U.S. Justice Department and European officials requested information on ``cartel activity'' involving British Airways and a number of other airlines and cargo operators, the London-based carrier said in Regulatory News Service statement.

``The antitrust division is investigating the possibility of anticompetitive practices in the air cargo industry,'' the U.S. Justice Department's spokeswoman Gina Talamona said yesterday.

The largest EY cartel fine was 462 million euros ($550 million) levied against Roche Holding AG in 2001 for fixing the price of vitamins.

Polar Air Cargo, a unit of Atlas Air Worldwide Holdings Inc., also received a request for information related to the probe from the U.S. government. It's fully cooperating, the company said in a regulatory filing.

LAN Cargo, a division of Chile's LAN Airlines SA, said in an e-mail that investigators arrived yesterday at its offices in Miami in connection with the investigation. LAN Cargo said its operations haven't been affected.

``Cathay Pacific is in cooperation with the European Commission and U.S. Department of Justice in respect of their investigation into air cargo operations,'' the Hong Kong airline said today. ``The airline is in strict compliance with the applicable legislation in all of its operating market.''

Cathay Pacific's shares rose 1.8 percent to HK$14.35 at 12:29 p.m. in Hong Kong.

Investigations in Korea

Separately, South Korea's two largest carriers said they were visited yesterday by the nation's Fair Trade Commission.

Korean Air Lines Co., the world's biggest carrier of international air freight in 2004, had its office at Gimpo raided, said the Seoul-based company's spokesman Lee Hyoung Woo.

Asiana Airlines, South Korea's second-biggest airline, also got a visit, said spokesman Kim Hyung Jin.

Neither airline said what the investigation was for. The South Korean Fair Trade Commission's spokesman Park Hyun Chul declined to say if its investigation was connected to the joint probes by the EU and the U.S. Justice Department.

Korean Air's shares rose 4.1 percent to 30,500 won while Asiana shares rose 2.7 percent to 7,560 won in Seoul.

EU Raids British Airways, Lufthansa In Cargo Probe (Update9) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Fletcher Matthew Newman

Bloomberg, February 15, 2006

Feb. 14 (Bloomberg) -- European Union investigators raided the offices of British Airways Plc, Deutsche Lufthansa AG, Air France-KLM Group and several competitors in a probe with the U.S. Justice Department of price fixing in the air cargo market.

Antitrust officials entered the offices of carriers in several EU states to investigate, the Brussels-based European Commission said in a statement today. ``The commission has reason to believe that the companies concerned may have violated'' EU cartel rules. American Airlines said it was subpoenaed, and United Airlines said it was contacted as part of the probe.

Under EU law, the commission can fine companies accused of operating a cartel as much as 10 percent of their annual sales. It typically opts for about 2 percent to 3 percent of sales.

``It's the first time that the commission has investigated the airline industry," Jacques Bourgeois, a partner in the Brussels office of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld and a former commission official, said in a telephone interview. ``The airline industry operates worldwide. From a trustbuster's point of view, it makes sense to cooperate with other antitrust authorities."

British Airways and Lufthansa said they're assisting with the probe. U.S. and European officials requested information on ``cartel activity" involving the London-based airline and a number of other airlines and cargo operators, British Airways said in Regulatory News Service statement.

``The antitrust division is investigating the possibility of anticompetitive practices in the air cargo industry," said Gina Talamona, a Justice Department spokeswoman.

Coordination

The agency is coordinating its efforts with the EU and other foreign competition authorities, she said. Talamona declined to comment on details of the probe.

Lufthansa said its cargo unit, the world's second-largest air-freight carrier, is cooperating with the investigation and that it would give no further information on the matter.

Air France is also part of the European Commission's investigation and will cooperate fully, said spokeswoman Brigitte Barrand. Air France is Europe's largest airline.

The largest EU cartel fine was 462 million euros ($550 million) levied against Roche Holding AG in 2001 for fixing the price of vitamins.

U.S. Carriers

The cargo division of AMR Corp.'s American Airlines also received a subpoena, company spokesman Tim Wagner said in an e- mail. ``American has not been notified that it is a target of the investigation, and unlike some other airlines, has not received a search warrant," he said.

UAL Corp., parent of United Airlines, received an ``inquiry" from EU officials through its United Cargo office in Frankfurt, spokesman Jeff Green said in an e-mail. ``United conducts its business in Europe in full compliance with European rules and regulations," and the airline is cooperating, he said.

Polar Air Cargo, a unit of Atlas Air Worldwide Holdings Inc., also received a request for information related to the probe from the U.S. government. It's fully cooperating, the company said in a regulatory filing.

Continental Airlines Inc. didn't receive a subpoena, spokeswoman Julie King said in an interview.

Delta Air Lines Inc. spokesman Anthony Black said he couldn't immediately comment on the investigation.

LAN Cargo, a division of Chile's LAN Airlines SA, said in an e-mail that investigators arrived today at its offices in Miami in connection with the investigation. LAN Cargo said its operations haven't been affected.

Cathay Pacific Airways Ltd. and Japan Airlines Corp. were also part of the investigation, the Associated Press reported.

Cargolux

Cargolux Airlines International SA, a Luxembourg-based freight carrier, is also being investigated by the European Commission, spokesman Patrick Jeanne said in a telephone interview.

``It's just started today, so we don't have any specifics to give you," Jeanne said.

Cargolux is Europe's largest all-cargo carrier with a fleet of 14 Boeing 747 freighters and 90 destinations in its network, according to the company's Web site. The privately held airline posted sales of $1.2 billion in 2004.

Lufthansa Cargo, based in Frankfurt, operates a fleet of 19 MD-11F freighters and uses space in the bellies of the Lufthansa passenger airline's planes as well. It carried 1.74 million tons of freight in 2005 to 512 destinations worldwide.

Air France-KLM in the year ended March 31 had cargo revenue of 2.49 billion euros. British Airways' cargo operations generated 482 million pounds ($835 million) in sales, or 6.2 percent of group revenue, over the same period.

Airlines Raided In Cargo Price Cartel Probe (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels, Kevin Done In London And Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington

Financial Times, February 15, 2006

European and US antitrust officials on Tuesday raided the offices of British Airways, Lufthansa, Air France-KLM, Cargolux and other air-cargo companies as part of a transatlantic cartel probe.

The European Commission said its officials had “carried out unannounced inspections at the premises of several air cargo carriers in several EU member states”.

The Brussels-based regulator said it had “reason to believe that the companies concerned may have violated” European rules prohibiting price-fixing and other cartel abuses.

It is understood that among the issues under investigation by the Commission is the way the industry imposes surcharges on air freight rates for items such as fuel, security and war risk.

The targeted groups could face financial penalties if they are found guilty of operating a price-fixing or market-sharing cartel.

Under EU legislation, the Commission can impose cartel fines of up to 10 per cent of a company's global annual turnover – though Brussels normally settles for a lower penalty.

The US Department of Justice said it was also investigating the industry. "I can confirm that the antitrust division is investigating the possibility of anticompetitive practices in the air cargo industry. We are co-ordinating with the EU and other foreign competition authorities," a spokeswoman said.

The Commission never reveals the names of the companies it has raided, but several groups said they were under investigation or had received "requests for information".

BA said it had received information requests both from the Commission and the US Department of Justice. It is understood that antitrust officials raided the British carrier's offices at Heathrow airport and in New York.

Lufthansa issued a statement saying cartel authorities were investigating the air cargo sector and that the group would "fully support" the inquiries. It did not say explicitly whether Lufthansa offices had been raided.

Other companies that confirmed they were part of the investigation are: Cargolux, the Luxembourg-based group; SAS, the Scandinavian carrier; and Air France-KLM.

FedEx and UPS, the leading air cargo operators by revenue, said they had not been contacted and Deutsche Post said its carrier, DHL, was not targeted, Reuters reported.

Lufthansa and Air France-KLM are the biggest cargo carriers among the network airlines, each achieving revenues in 2004 of about $2.9bn (€2.4bn). Air cargo at BA accounted for £482m (€702m), or 6 per cent of total group revenues in the 12 months to March 2005.

The regulator stressed on Tuesday that the "fact that the European Commission carries out such inspections does not mean that the companies are guilty of anticompetitive behaviour nor does it prejudge the outcome of the investigation itself".

BA Among Airlines Raided In Cartel Inquiry (TIMES)

By Angela Jameson

London Times, February 15, 2006

BRITISH AIRWAYS premises were raided yesterday by officials from the European Commission, over suspicions of price-fixing in its cargo business.

The British airline was one of at least ten airlines that were subject to surprise visits from the Commission, which suspects cartel activity among several air cargo carriers operating from European Union member states.

British Airways revealed that it was under investigation in a statement to the London Stock Exchange. The airline said that it had received a request for information from the Commission and the United States Justice Department "relating to alleged cartel activity involving BA and a number of other airlines and cargo operators. British Airways' policy is to conduct its business in full compliance with all the applicable competition laws. BA is assisting the EC and the US Department of Justice with their investigation," the statement said.

Air France, KLM, Lufthansa, SAS and Cargolux, a cargo specialist, also confirmed that they had been visited by European officials. The Commission uses such inspections as a first step in investigations into suspected cartels. However, it pointed out that a raid on any premises does not mean that the company is guilty of anti-competitive behaviour, nor does it prejudge the outcome of the investigation itself.

The cartel investigation could drag on for months as there is no deadline to complete price-fixing inquiries. The duration of the case depends on several factors, including its complexity, the extent of subjects' co-operation and whether they exercise their rights to a defence.

Cartel activity in the United States is a criminal offence and can result in long prison terms, while in the EU companies face fines that are capped at 10 per cent of annual turnover.

UPS Says Not Contacted Over Cartel Probe (REU)

Reuters, February 14, 2006

CHICAGO (Reuters) - United Parcel Service Inc. (UPS.N: Quote, Profile, Research) said on Tuesday that it has not been contacted by the European Commission in connection with a probe into possible anti-competitive activity.

"We have received no communications on this issue," said UPS spokesman Norman Black.

He added that UPS, the world's largest package delivery company, had also received no contact from the U.S. Justice Department, which is coordinating with the EU and other foreign competition authorities.

New York Focuses Antitrust Probe Of Record Labels (CNET)

By John Borland, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, February 15, 2006

New York State Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has sent record labels a new round of subpoenas in his investigation of online-music pricing, music industry sources said Tuesday.

The second inquiry, following an initial round of subpoenas issued in late December, is more tightly focused on the issue of the labels' digital download activities, sources said. Labels had previously expressed concern to Spitzer's office that the original subpoenas were too broad, sources said.

Warner Music Group said in a federal securities filing Tuesday that it received a second subpoena from the New York office Feb. 3. The company did not provide details other than to say Spitzer was investigating whether digital download pricing practices had violated state and federal antitrust laws.

"We intend to cooperate fully with the Attorney General's inquiry," the label said in its filing.

A representative for Spitzer's office declined to comment on the investigation.

Spitzer's inquiry has reopened some old tensions between the record labels, which control wholesale digital music prices, and the online companies that use that content in their own businesses.

In the early days of digital music, Web companies routinely complained that labels were acting unfairly, ultimately helping trigger a federal antitrust investigation into labels' online activities. That investigation closed without any evidence of illegal behavior being unearthed.

The New York investigation comes after several music executives, from companies, have said they want to move away from the universal 99 cent price tag for song downloads and toward a model more like offline record stores, where prices can vary up or down.

Digital-music companies, some of which have also received subpoenas in Spitzer's investigation, have previously said they expected at least one major record label to begin experimenting with variable wholesale pricing early this year. That could be put on hold as a result of Spitzer's actions, however.

A California class action lawsuit has also been filed against the record labels in San Diego on the issue of download pricing, shortly after Spitzer's investigation was initially reported, according to Warner's securities filing.

Microsoft Hopes New Data Code Will Satisfy EU (BLOOM)

By MATTHEW NEWMAN AND CARY O'REILLY, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, February 15, 2006

Today is deadline for regulators to receive plan

Microsoft Corp. will tell European Union regulators today of its plan to provide new source code data for the Windows operating system in an effort to avoid a $2.4 million daily fine.

Microsoft also said it will ask for a hearing when it replies to EU demands for complete and accurate data that will help rival software makers. The EU set today as the deadline for receiving Microsoft's plan.

"We are really, we think, fully complying with the decrees of the European Union," Microsoft Chief Executive Steve Ballmer said Tuesday at the 3GSM World Congress in Barcelona, Spain. "We are trying to work with the commission to ensure they agree we have taken the right steps."

Separately, the company told a U.S. court Tuesday that it will license its source code to speed compliance with a 2001 antitrust settlement with the U.S. government.

The European Commission, the EU's antitrust regulator, warned Microsoft in December that the company would be fined unless it provided information to help competitors develop network software that can communicate with Windows-based systems.

The company is "confident of the sufficiency, completeness and usability of the documentation provided so far," Horacio Gutierrez, Microsoft's associate general counsel, told reporters in Brussels, Belgium, Tuesday.

After Microsoft's response to European regulators today, the commission will set a date for a private hearing. The regulator will then draft a decision, which will be discussed at a meeting of EU member governments and other interested parties.

That process may last three to four months.

Microsoft also is appealing the commission's antitrust decision at the European Court of First Instance in Luxembourg.

A hearing will be held between April 24 and 28.

Bells Take TV Ambitions Straight To Congress (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz And Peter Grant

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The nation's telecommunications laws -- written 10 years ago, before phone calls and TV programs moved over the Internet -- were scheduled for an overhaul by Congress this year. But with the prospects of a major rewrite dim, the nation's biggest phone companies are pushing for a simpler measure: rules that allow them to bypass local governments for approval to offer television service.

At a Senate hearing today, Verizon Communications Inc. Chief Executive Ivan Seidenberg and AT&T Inc. CEO Ed Whitacre will make a pitch for congressional action on national video-franchising rules, which would allow phone companies to roll out video services to compete with cable providers more quickly.

The phone companies want to avoid what cable companies have had to do for years: negotiate with local governments for permission to offer TV service. Phone companies say that it will take years to get such permission, and that local politicians use the process to extract money for community improvements, such as landscaping in parks.

The Bells are eager to change the rules so they can better compete with cable companies, which offer Internet phone service and are eroding phone companies' consumer business. Another pressure: investor skepticism about the Bells' likelihood of success in profitably snagging market share from cable and satellite companies, despite spending billions of dollars to lay fiber-optic lines.

Telecom executives have found a receptive audience for changing the rules among key House and Senate lawmakers, and in certain states such as Indiana and Virginia, where lawmakers have been open to the idea on the condition that revenue to communities from franchising contracts isn't cut.

In addition, Kevin Martin, the Republican chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, has been a quiet ally. Under his direction, the FCC is exploring how it might help the Bells and ease video-franchising rules without congressional involvement. It's not clear that the FCC has the authority to do that under current law. Last week, Mr. Martin took his colleagues on a field trip to Keller, Texas, to visit Verizon's new TV facilities. On the same day, the FCC unveiled a report on the state of video competition, bolstering the Bells' argument and stating that cable companies continue to dominate, serving 69.4% of customers who pay for TV and don't rely on free over-the-air broadcasts.

"We're suggesting there may be a better opportunity to take pieces of a comprehensive package and move them along. One thing where there seems to be substantial support is in video franchising," says Tom Tauke, a former congressman from Iowa and Verizon's executive vice president of public affairs, policy and communications. In pushing for narrow legislation, the phone companies -- among the biggest donors to politicians -- are running up against another lobbying powerhouse: the cable industry. Talks between phone and cable lobbyists about a compromise for a bill that addresses only video franchising haven't been successful.

"Undoubtedly, every stakeholder in this process has their priorities, and no doubt all wish they could address them on a stand-alone basis," says Kyle McSlarrow, president of the National Cable & Telecommunications Association, the cable industry's lobbying group.

The phone companies were dealt a setback last week when Republican Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana and Sen. Daniel Inouye of Hawaii, the Commerce Committee's ranking Democrat, introduced a cable-friendly "statement of principles" that recognizes the right of local communities to be part of the cable-franchising process.

Meanwhile, influential lawmakers continue to press for sweeping telecom legislation that also includes revamping the Universal Service Fund, which subsidizes phone services in rural or low-income areas and is a sacred cow in Washington. Rep. Joe Barton, the Texas Republican who chairs the House Energy and Commerce Committee, could release a draft bill by mid-March. His counterpart in the Senate, Ted Stevens of Alaska, is still holding hearings and hasn't endorsed any of the various telecom proposals but told reporters yesterday he could envision passing a narrow video-franchising bill.

For now, the phone companies' best bet may be in state capitals instead of on Capitol Hill. Legislation to streamline the franchise-approval process for phone companies passed in Texas last year, is gaining traction in three statehouses and is in early stages in a handful of others.

Most advanced are bills in the Virginia legislature that have been passed by both houses and are the product of a compromise between the state's cable operators and Verizon, the state's largest telephone company. They would enable a phone company to offer video service within 75 days of beginning discussions with a municipality, as long as it makes given commitments, such as offering service to 65% of the area's households within seven years.

Even more attractive to phone companies is legislation in Indiana that was passed by the state Senate this month and the telecommunications committee in the Indiana House earlier this week. That measure, which is part of a broader telecomoverhaul package, would set up a process by which the state, rather than local governments, could issue franchises. Unlike Virginia, recipients wouldn't be required to offer a certain percentage of residents service over a fixed period of time.

Measures supported by phone companies have been introduced in Kansas, Missouri and South Carolina, where a bill recently was approved by a House panel. A draft measure based on the Texas law that passed last year was introduced last week.

Not all the state franchising legislation, though, is favored by telephone companies. In New Jersey, two bills that didn't succeed in the last legislative session have been reintroduced. But neither currently is supported by Verizon, the largest phone company in the state, one because of its strict build-out requirements and the second because of other provisions.

Jury Says Dow, Rockwell Should Pay $553.9M To Colo Landowners (AP)

By Jon Sarche

AP, February 15, 2006

DENVER - Ruling in 16-year-old case, a federal jury recommended Tuesday that Dow Chemical Co. and the former Rockwell International Corp. pay $553.9 million to thousands of property owners who claimed their land was contaminated by plutonium from the former Rocky Flats nuclear weapons plant.

The jury concluded the two companies damaged private property around the site through negligence that caused "class members to be exposed to plutonium and (placed) them at some increased risk of health problems." The lawsuit was filed in 1990 on behalf of 13,000 people.

The jury also said the damage from the radioactive material may never go away.

"It's been a long time, 16 years in court and finally we got an answer that we wanted that tells the truth about Rocky Flats," Richard Bartlett, one of the plaintiffs told Denver station KCNC-TV.

The verdict called for punitive damages of $110.8 million against Dow Chemical and $89.4 million against Rockwell. The jury also recommended the companies pay some $352 million in actual damages.

The final award is likely to be less because of limits in state and federal law, but could still reach $352 million after U.S. District Judge John Kane reviews the verdict, said Louise Roselle, an attorney for some of the plaintiffs.

The verdict was "a real testament to the courage of these citizens who stood up and said this is wrong," said Bruce DeBoskey, who spent 12 years on the case before leaving to become regional director of the Anti-Defamation League.

"These citizens deserved to be compensated for their losses," he said. "This isn't a windfall, this is making up for what these people lost."

Dow said in a statement it would appeal, saying the judge improperly instructed the jury. The company said property values in the area have increased and scientific studies have showed no harm to residents' health or property. Defense attorney David Bernick, who represented Dow and Rockwell, said both companies feel there are clear grounds for appeal.

Attorneys have said the government would cover any damages and legal bills for the companies because they were contractors operating the sprawling Cold War site near Denver on behalf of the Energy Department.

A department spokesman did not immediately return an after-hours message.

Jury deliberations in the class-action lawsuit took 18 days and followed a four-month trial. The suit claimed the plant contaminated neighboring land, driving down property values.

The now-defunct site made plutonium triggers for nuclear warheads for decades before it was closed in 1989. Much of the 6,240-acre site will be transformed into a wildlife refuge and last year, a contractor declared a 10-year, $7 billion cleanup project complete.

Rockwell, based in Milwaukee and now known as Rockwell Automation, and Midland, Mich.-based Dow Chemical operated the plant at separate times under contract with the government.

The lawsuit claimed they intentionally mishandled radioactive waste for decades and then tried to cover it up. Defense attorney Bernick said claims of a cover-up were wrongheaded and that contamination offsite was unintentional and minuscule.

After the verdict, Bernick said the judge made significant mistakes in instructing the jury.

"The instructions made it apparent the judge was applying an extreme view of the law," he said.

Among other things, Bernick said, the jury was allowed to award damages if it determined the companies were responsible for even one atom of plutonium on the plaintiffs' properties. He also said the judge wrongly allowed certain testimony, including claims that the Energy Department was a conspirator.

Dow operated the plant from the 1950s until 1975; Rockwell ran it from 1975 until the plant was shut down.

Bernick also said he was concerned by the dismissal of a second juror after deliberations began, suggesting the juror might have been in the minority and under significant pressure from other jurors. He said the jury voted 8-2 on a number of points in its verdict.

Another juror had been dismissed in early January. Attorneys would not comment on the reasons for the dismissals, and court documents did not explain.

At trial, attorneys for the landowners presented a study showing higher rates of lung cancer near the plant. Bernick dismissed the cancer claims as "junk science," saying the study didn't indicate how long the patients had lived near Rocky Flats.

In 1992, Rockwell pleaded guilty and agreed to pay an $18.5 million fine for water quality and other violations at Rocky Flats. It admitted it stored hazardous waste without a permit, and that it stored the wastes in containers that leaked, and that its actions caused hazardous waste to wind up in reservoirs that supplied drinking water to nearby cities.

The settlement culminated a lengthy investigation dubbed "Operation Desert Glow" in which FBI agents secretly monitored the discharge of pollutants into streams and the burning of hazardous waste at Rocky Flats.

Federal agents charged in an affidavit unsealed after a June 6, 1989, raid that Rockwell and Energy Department officials were aware of environmental violations and sought to conceal them.

"The government chose to fight their own citizens," Roselle said. "This case points to the way the government ran the weapons complex: with complete disregard for the rights of the neighbor."

Cost Of E85 Fuel Is Higher Than Gasoline (USAT)

By James R. Healey

USA Today, February 15, 2006

The heavily promoted alcohol fuel called E85 might cut America's oil use and help support U.S. agriculture, but it's not reducing motorists' fuel bills. It's boosting them significantly.

The price of E85 — a fuel that's 85% ethanol made from grain and 15% conventional gasoline — is higher than that of gasoline, even though E85 has only 72% as much energy. The U.S. Department of Energy says a vehicle has to use 1.4 times as much E85 as gasoline to go the same distance.

At some Nebraska stations, E85 was $2.19 a gallon Tuesday, while gasoline with 10% ethanol — a common substitute for unleaded regular in the Midwest — was $2.06. “This doesn't make sense,” says Wayne Davis, a division manager at fuel company Bosselman, based in Grand Island, Neb. “Our customers are saying, ‘I'm not going to buy E85, which is better for the environment and the economy, unless it's cheaper.' We're seeing E85 just sit.”

President Bush, in his State of the Union speech Jan. 31, promoted ethanol as a way to help reduce Middle East oil imports 75% by 2025.

Ford Motor and General Motors are working with fuel companies to boost the number of E85 stations in the Midwest. The two automakers say they will build about 600,000 vehicles this year with the special equipment needed to use E85. About 5 million already are on the road. All that emphasis could be negated by pricing.

He was selling E85 for $1.94 a gallon Tuesday, and conventional gasoline for $2.19. “If you get it 40 cents under, you start attracting new business. If you get to just 10 under, you start to lose some (E85) business,” he says.

Nationwide average price for gasoline has sunk to $2.286 per gallon, according to travel group AAA's daily report.

To be an even-up energy value, E85 would have to sell for 72% of that, $1.646.

But E85 wholesale prices have jumped to more than $2, so retailers can't afford to sell it for that.

The price of ethanol has been driven up because major oil refiners are suddenly buying in bulk. They're stocking up on ethanol as a replacement for MTBE, a petroleum-based additive suspected of causing cancer. MTBE and ethanol boost the octane of gasoline and can reduce pollution.

MTBE isn't officially banned, but oil companies are switching to avoid lawsuits.

“Gasoline with MTBE in it will become like gasoline with anthrax in it within the next 90 days,” predicts Tom Kloza, veteran analyst at the Oil Price Information Service.

U.S. Mounts A Vast Hunt For Church Arsonists (NYT)

By Jim Noles

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0015300

TUSCALOOSA, Ala., Feb. 14 — In the largest manhunt in Alabama since the bombing of a Birmingham abortion clinic in 1998, 200 law enforcement officers are working to solve the arson that has damaged or destroyed 10 rural churches this month.

"The initial forensic work is done," Special Agent Eric Kehn, a spokesman for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, said Tuesday. "Now we are just working the scene, and it is a big scene. We are out and about, in the community, pursuing leads. To date, we have over 400 of them, and we take them all seriously."

The investigative team, formally the Alabama Church Fires Task Force, has set up headquarters at the Tuscaloosa Regional Airport. It is led by Jim Cavanaugh, a 30-year veteran of the firearms bureau who heads its Nashville field division.

Mr. Cavanaugh's agents, teamed with the F.B.I., the Alabama Bureau of Investigation, the office of the state fire marshal and local sheriffs' departments, have fanned out across western and central Alabama, where all 10 fires were set. And, in hopes that the arsonists will contact them, the investigators have set up a phone line and an e-mail address.

The firearms bureau's initial response to the church fires came on Feb. 3, just hours after the first five, with the deployment of a Critical Incident Management Response Team, which established an organizational framework for the investigation.

Members of that team, Mr. Cavanaugh said, "are the behind-the-scenes guys."

"They don't get on TV," he said, "but they are absolutely critical to our efforts."

More visible resources came with the arrival of a pair of arson investigation trucks, teams of agents trained in "cause and origin" analysis and forensic chemists. Accelerant detection dogs — Labrador retrievers that had flunked out of guide-dog training because of excessive inquisitiveness — also scoured the burned churches.

After gathering evidence, the task force has shifted its focus to "tracking leads and linking intelligence," Mr. Cavanaugh said. It has also built a computerized database of potential evidence.

As the investigators continued pursuing the case Tuesday, a 21-year-old man was jailed on suspicion of setting an additional fire, which damaged a storage room Monday night at an abandoned church in White Plains, in northeastern Alabama. But the authorities called that episode a copycat of the 10 others. The Calhoun County sheriff, Larry Amerson, said it was "absolutely not" linked to the other fires.

Witness accounts and behavioral profiles have described the suspects in those fires as two white men in their 20's or 30's.

"These men," Mr. Cavanaugh said, "may be driving a dark S.U.V., possibly a Nissan Pathfinder."

But he added that with more than one man most likely involved, they could be driving multiple vehicles.

"We don't want to focus on an S.U.V. and fall victim to the white-van syndrome," he said, referring to what proved to be a misplaced focus on a white van during the investigation of a series of sniper attacks in the Washington area in October 2002.

The state fire marshal, Richard Montgomery, said the investigation had special meaning to task force members.

"It's personal," he said. "You don't hurt kids. You don't hurt old folks. And you don't burn churches."

Man Arrested In Alleged Copycat Fire (AP-Y2)

By Jay Reeves, Associated Press Writer

AP2, February 15, 2006

A man described as mentally disturbed was jailed Tuesday on suspicion of setting fire to an abandoned church in what authorities said was a copycat of the recent church arsons in rural Alabama.

Calhoun County Sheriff Larry Amerson said the arrest was "absolutely not" otherwise linked to the fires that have destroyed or damaged 10 rural Baptist churches since Feb. 3 in central and west Alabama.

The man lived beside the old White Plains Church of God, where flames heavily damaged a storage room Monday night, and has a brother who is a volunteer firefighter, Calhoun County Chief Deputy Matthew Wade said.

"He wanted to see his brother put out a fire," Wade said.

Amerson said investigators believe the suspect, whom he identified as Jason Phillips, 21, also started several brush fires after watching news coverage of the church arsons.

"In that sense, it is a copycat case," Amerson said.

Agents with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives said no arrests have been made in the other blazes, all of which have been ruled arson.

Phillips will be charged with setting fire to the old church and torching a truck that was burned earlier at a field near his home, authorities said. He said Phillips' firefighter brother was not charged.

Amerson said Phillips is believed to be either mentally retarded or mentally ill.

DEA Busts Up A Major Coke Deal (KDTN-TV)

By Laura Borchers

WDTN-TV, February 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0015301

Police took millions of dollars of drugs in a huge drug bust Tuesday.

More than 110 kilos of cocaine were grabbed by DEA agents on State Route 202, just north of Interstate 70 in Huber Heights after watching a deal go down.

"Last week the DEA received some information from credible sources that a large amount of cocaine was coming into the Dayton area," explained Russ Neville of the Drug Enforcement Administration. "We watched them make an exchange. Driving off of I-70, then getting off at 202, traveling north."

Three people were arrested and are currently in jail.

Neville estimated the value of the drugs at $12 million dollars.

$12M In Cocaine Seized Hundreds Of Pounds Of Coke Grabbed In Huber Heights (DDN)

By Steve Bennish

The Dayton (OH) Daily News, February 15, 2006

HUBER HEIGHTS | U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents Tuesday seized 242½ pounds of cocaine that has a street value the DEA estimated at $12 million.

A drug deal was observed in the parking lot of a business on Executive Boulevard and agents pounced as the car that received the drugs and the vehicle escorting it drove off, said Russell Neville, resident agent in charge of the DEA's Dayton office.

Agents arrested two men and a woman, Neville said.

The three, traveling from the Columbus area, are in the Montgomery County Jail, Neville said.

The drugs, in two heavy-duty cardboard boxes, tested positive for cocaine.

The bust is the second largest involving cocaine in the region's history.

On Feb. 7, 1993, an Ohio Highway Patrol trooper seized about 491 pounds of cocaine from a motor home along Interstate 70, five miles west of Englewood.

This latest investigation began after a tip that a major drug exchange would occur.

Agents tracked the vehicles from Columbus to Dayton, Neville said.

Agents watched the boxes being passed between one vehicle and the car from Columbus.

The vehicle carrying the two men who delivered the drugs got away as agents focused on the drug-carrying vehicle, he said.

Officers are searching for the delivery vehicle.

Because I-70 and I-75 intersect here, the area long has been a popular transfer point for traffickers moving cocaine to Columbus, Indianapolis, Lexington, Cincinnati and West Virginia, Neville said.

The FBI, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Huber Heights police, the patrol and drug task forces in Montgomery, Greene and Warren counties helped in the bust.

Authorities Indict Five Men In Hells Angels Case (AP)

By NICHOLAS K. GERANIOS, Associated Press

AP, February 15, 2006

A federal grand jury on Tuesday indicted five members or associates of the Hells Angels Motorcycle Club in various crimes. Two of the men were charged specifically in the 2001 slaying of a man in Arlington, Wash.

Spokane chapter president Richard Allen Fabel, 48, also known as Smilin' Rick, was charged with racketeering and conspiracy to racketeer. He is accused of directing other gang members to engage in murder, attempted murder, intimidation, extortion, robbery and trafficking in stolen motor vehicles and motor vehicle parts.

The men, who were arrested Tuesday, will be tried in Seattle, where the indictment was unsealed.

The others indicted were Ricky Jenks, 28, of Spokane; Rodney Lee Rollness, 45, of Snohomish; Joshua Binder, 30, of North Bend; and Paul Foster, 49, of Arlington.

Fabel and Jenks appeared Tuesday in Spokane before U.S. Magistrate Cynthia Imbrogno, who ruled the two should remain in jail until a bail hearing on Thursday. Fabel had asked for a bail hearing immediately.

"It's Valentine's Day. Have a heart, for once," Fabel joked to Assistant U.S. Attorney Jared Kimbell, who said the government was not prepared for an immediate bail hearing.

Rollness and Binder appeared in federal court in Seattle, and had bail hearings set for Friday. Foster was scheduled to make his first court appearance on Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0015302

Jenks is a member of the Hells Angels who is charged with conspiracy to racketeer and the racketeering offenses of robbery and extortion, plus sale of a stolen Harley Davidson motorcycle. If convicted, he and Fabel both face maximum penalties of life in prison and $250,000 fines.

Fabel's attorney, Bevan Maxey, said his client was being targeted because of his leadership of the Spokane-based Washington Nomads chapter of the motorcycle gang. Law enforcement officers broke down the door of the Spokane clubhouse during a Tuesday morning raid.

"Because of his position, quite often he gets blamed for things that other people get involved in," Maxey said.

Rollness and Binder are former members of the state chapter who left the Hells Angels in 2003, the indictment said.

They are charged with two counts of violent crime in aid of racketeering in the slaying of Michael Eugene Walsh, 47, in Arlington, on July 21, 2001. That charge carries the possibility of the death sentence.

Rollness and Binder are also charged with interfering with commerce by threats or violence in the January 2004 attempted robbery of a Monroe resident. Rollness is also charged with two counts of witness tampering, accused of intimidating the alleged victim of that offense.

Foster is a former associate of the Hells Angels who is charged with being an accessory after the fact. He is accused of assisting Rollness and Binder in covering up the Walsh slaying, the indictment said. Walsh was last seen at a party at Foster's home in July 2001.

The arrests follow an extensive investigation by the Monroe Police Department, Washington State Patrol, Snohomish County sheriff's office, the FBI and other agencies.

The Monroe Police Department in early 2004 began investigating the alleged involvement of Hells Angels in selling stolen motorcycles and parts, according to a news release from the U.S. Justice Department.

That investigation eventually led to an investigation into the Walsh slaying.

Fabel and Jenks are also under a separate indictment in federal court in Nevada for their alleged involvement in a fight and shootout between the Hells Angels and Mongols motorcycle gangs at a casino in Laughlin, Nev., on April 27, 2002. Three people died.

Both Fabel and Jenks were released on bond in that case and their trials are pending.

The Washington Nomads is the only chapter of the Hells Angels in Washington, and Fabel has been president since 1996. The indictment called the group "a highly organized criminal enterprise."

Drug Charges Shock Peers (HCHRON)

By HARVEY RICE

The Houston Chronicle, February 15, 2006

Ex-colleagues say sky marshal was a good officer

Burlie L. Sholar III was a good policeman and a good U.S. officer in the eyes of his peers before he and another federal sky marshal were arrested on drug charges last week.

"I'm just surprised that he would be involved in this alleged activity," said former Homeland Security Department agent Danny Stanley, now assistant chief of the Fort Pickett Police Department in Virginia.

Sholar, 32, and Shawn Ray Nguyen, 38, both of Houston, are accused of conspiring to use their positions as air marshals to smuggle 15 kilograms, or 33 pounds, of cocaine on an airliner flying from Houston to Las Vegas.

Stanley said Sholar was a good friend whom he first met in Washington, D.C., when Stanley worked for the Metropolitan Police Department and Sholar worked for the U.S. Capitol Police.

He said he and Sholar were friends for about two years before Sholar left the Capitol Police to join the Los Angeles Police Department.

Sgt. Kimberly Schneider of the Capitol Police did not respond to a request for information about Sholar's employment.

Officer Sara Faden of the LAPD said Sholar joined the department in 1996 and resigned for personal reasons in 2001.

"To my knowledge he had a respectable record," Faden said.

David Adams, spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, said Sholar was hired as an air marshal in 2001.

Stanley renewed his acquaintance with Sholar after taking a job as an agent with Homeland Security in 2002, he said.

"I knew him quite well and the allegations surprised me," Stanley said. "It certainly surprised myself and other co-workers."

He said he had received numerous phone calls from agents who worked with Sholar, all expressing disbelief.

Nguyen was an agent with the Houston office of the Drug Enforcement Administration from 1997 to 2002 and left voluntarily to become an air marshal, DEA spokesman Ray D'Alessio said.

D'Alessio said Nguyen was in good standing when he left the agency.

DOJ_NMG_0015303

Adams said Sholar and Nguyen both were subjected to thorough background checks that gave them a top-secret security clearance.

The background checks conducted by the Office of Personnel Management typically include a review of previous employment, criminal and credit background checks, and interviews of acquaintances by field agents, Adams said.

The field agent reports are reviewed by other officials. Once approved, agents must be reinvestigated every five years, he said.

Federal court records show that Nguyen filed for bankruptcy two weeks after becoming an air marshal in 2002.

He had a total debt of $203,000, including a $108,500 mortgage and more than $50,000 in credit card debt, records show.

Nguyen listed a former wife and three children in his filing.

There is no indication that his bankruptcy was a factor in his decision to begin associating with a person he knew had a criminal history and ties to a drug trafficker, as alleged in the criminal complaint.

Nguyen began giving the person, referred to only as a cooperating witness, thousands of dollars in cash to invest in drug transactions, according to the complaint against him and Sholar.

The informant recorded incriminating conversations with Nguyen and helped investigators from the FBI and Homeland Security's Office of the Inspector General set up a phony drug transaction that led to their arrest, the complaint says.

FEATURE-Bolivia's Coca: From Cottage Industry To Mass Export? (/REU)

By Bernd Debusmann, Special Correspondent

Reuters, February 15, 2006

LA PAZ, Bolivia, Feb 14 Reuters - It is not often that the menu of a presidential inaugural dinner provides insight into a country's development plans. But it did at the inauguration of Bolivia's Evo Morales last month -- the fare included coca cake, coca cookies, coca wine and coca sweets.

Served to some 300 local and foreign dignitaries in the airy grand hall of the presidential palace, the coca-based menu served notice that the new Bolivian government will try to win international legitimacy for the coca leaf and make it an export commodity.

That could well stir controversy because, aside from being used as a flavoring and in traditional remedies, leaves from the coca plant are also the raw material for cocaine. The U.S. government has for years funded efforts to eradicate coca crops in Latin American countries.

While the leftists elected to power in Bolivia have been sharply critical of U.S. capitalism, they share some of the U.S. business community's views on the relative rank of export markets.

"We need, and we can, develop markets for our coca," said congresswoman Leonilda Zurita, a coca grower and close associate of Morales. "China is particularly important. The Chinese like herbs and they'll like our coca tea."

Closer to home, Morales -- the first former coca grower to run a country and Bolivia's first indigenous president -- wants to work out an export agreement with Argentina, where chewing the coca leaf is legal but its importation is not.

Coca leaf was declared an illegal narcotic in the 1961 U.N. Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, along with cocaine, heroin, opium and morphine and a host of chemical drugs. The convention came into force in 1964.

Most medical opinion holds that coca leaf, as opposed to the cocaine extracted from it, is neither addictive nor harmful. The leaf's use as a mild stimulant and hunger suppressant dates back thousands of years.

Taking coca leaf off the U.N. list was one of the main planks of Morales's election campaign. His moves as president are being followed closely, not only by his core constituency in Bolivia but also in Colombia and Peru, where there are fledgling coca-based legal industries.

In Colombia, a group of Nasa Indians have started marketing a rival for Coca Cola called Coca Sek. A Peruvian company makes a coca-based energy drink called Vortex, and there is a line of packaged coca cookies. Coca-based products in Bolivia include shampoo, face cream, coca tea bags and pills to cure altitude sickness. When used as a flavoring, coca gives foods an herbal tang.

COTTAGE INDUSTRY OF LEGAL COCA PRODUCTS

The scale of coca production is tiny, no more than cottage industries for local markets. But growers and officials say their assertions that the leaf is beneficial and nutritious deserve more respect than they have received in the past.

Foreign Minister David Choquehuanca said recently that coca should be part of the breakfast in Bolivian schools because it contained more calcium than milk, a remark which made worldwide headlines but drew more chuckles than nods.

But three Harvard researchers -- James Duke, David Aulik and Timothy Plowman -- came to similar conclusions in an extensive 1975 study which said 100 grams of coca leaf matched or exceeded the U.S. recommended daily dose of calcium, iron, phosphorous, vitamin A and riboflavin.

"The debate over coca has not been very rational," said a diplomat from the European Community, which has agreed to contribute 420,000 euros ($500,000) to a study to establish the size of the legal market for coca in Bolivia.

Complaints about the lack of rational argument on coca leaf are echoed up and down the Chapare, the tropical region where Morales launched his political career by leading coca growers in protests against U.S.-financed efforts to eradicate the coca plant.

"We need to make the world understand that coca and cocaine are different things," said Anacleto Rodriguez, a leader of the coca growers' union in Morales' home village of Villa 14 de Septiembre. "We need to open minds. Alcohol and tobacco, very harmful substances, are traded freely. Why not coca?"

In all three coca-growing countries, the Coca-Cola Co regularly features in conversations about coca and is usually cited as evidence for Western hypocrisy.

U.N. CONVENTION MADE EXCEPTION FOR COCA COLA

The 1961 U.N. convention contains a clause -- article 27 -- Latin Americans believe was specifically introduced for the benefit of the Coca-Cola Co <KO.N>.

It says: "The parties may permit the use of coca leaves for the preparation of a flavoring agent, which shall not contain any alkaloids, and to the extent necessary for such use, may permit the production, import, export, trade in and possession of such leaves."

Coca-Cola, maker of the world's best-selling soft drink, routinely declines comment on coca, saying the drink's ingredients are secret. But Coca-Cola spokespeople have said the company does not buy coca leaves, which is technically correct.

The only legal importer of coca leaf into the United States is the Stepan Co. of Maywood, New Jersey, a company so media-shy it has no public relations department or spokesperson. Telephone inquiries yield pregnant pauses and the suggestion that databases and public records can provide the details Stepan declines to divulge.

According to public records and published reports, Stepan imports coca leaves -- around 380,000 pounds (172,000 kg) a year -- under an agreement with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) which has to be renewed every year. The latest application to import coca leaves was filed on March 29, 2005, and needs to be renewed next month.

Stepan is the only company in the U.S. registered to import coca and produce cocaine.

Stepan turns part of the leaves into cocaine, largely for use as a local anesthetic in dentistry and ear, nose and throat surgery. The other part is turned into a flavoring extract for Coca-Cola, in a process which removes the active ingredient for cocaine.

CHANGE OF CONVENTION UNLIKELY

The next opportunity to amend the 1961 convention would be a meeting of the U.N. Economic and Social Council in Vienna in 2008. Diplomats view as extremely remote the possibility of a global consensus on changing the blacklist of substances.

U.S. officials also tend to scoff at suggestions that there is a sizable potential market for coca-based products, notwithstanding a billion-dollar global industry for dietary supplements. There are some coca-based formulations meant to help dieters, but none are distributed widely yet.

Despite such skepticism, Morales has vowed to fight for what he calls the "de-criminalization" of coca. His former comrades in the coca growers' federation talk of a rosy commercial future for legal coca products.

One possibility they mention would be an internationally marketed natural version of the potency-enhacing drug Viagra and similar medications.

At the coca museum in La Paz, the world's only, a poster of a statuette from the Capuli culture, which flourished in Colombia and Ecuador from 850 to 1500 A.D., explains why there are such hopes.

The statuette is of a sitting man, his right cheek bulging with what appears to be a wad of coca leaves. His penis is of such monumental size that it rises above his head. "Learn to chew coca!!" reads the poster's legend.

Bolivian Coca Farmers Re - Elect Morales (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, February 15, 2006

LA PAZ, Bolivia (AP) -- President Evo Morales accepted re-election as leader of Bolivia's largest coca farmers union Tuesday, despite saying earlier he would step down from the post.

Morales, who was inaugurated as Bolivia's first Indian president three weeks ago, traveled to the central city of Cochabamba to thank the union members and defend his decision to remain their leader in the face of "enemies (who) have made negative comments."

DOJ_NMG_0015305

"A president of Bolivia can also be a union leader, and that's our difference from the traditional parties," Morales told a gathering of "cocaleros," or coca farmers, from the Chapare region.

Morales rose to political power after joining the union in the 1980s, later leading the sometimes-violent struggle against Washington-backed coca eradication policies.

On Monday, the cocaleros picked him to fill the union's top job for the 10th year running.

Opposition politicians have criticized Morales' continued involvement.

"The president is making a mistake that could damage the image of the country," said Senator Tito Hoz de Villa. "He's no longer a union leader, but president of all Bolivians."

Morales announced his decision to step down in a speech Saturday before the opening session of the union gathering. He also asked the coca growers to respect a 2004 agreement that limited cultivation of the leaf.

Morales has guaranteed the farmers will be allowed to grow just under half an acre of coca per family in Chapare, as established by a deal struck under the government of former president Carlos Mesa.

Coca is the basic ingredient of cocaine, but it also has traditional religious and medical uses in Bolivia.

Rising Tide Of Border Crime And Violence (CSM)

By Kris Axtman

The Christian Science Monitor, February 15, 2006

HOUSTON - First came an armed standoff between Texas lawmen and drug smugglers disguised as Mexican soldiers. Next, federal officials seized a stockpile of heavy-duty weaponry - assault rifles, hand grenades, and improvised explosive devices - along the Rio Grande. Then a Mexican police reporter was critically wounded after intruders fired more than 60 rounds into the newspaper's offices.

These three incidents in as many weeks dramatize the rising violence along the US-Mexico border. Drug traffickers are becoming more brazen and expanding their operations to include smuggling people. Even as President Bush proposes to beef up border security, these attacks are renewing the debate over how best to keep criminals - perhaps even terrorists - from crossing into the United States.

"As long as our law-enforcement resources at the border are primarily occupied with millions of laborers, it will be impossible to intercept the thousands of criminals who are also exploiting our borders," T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, told a US House subcommittee last week.

Ever since Mexican President Vicente Fox declared war on drug cartels last year, border violence has escalated.

"There has been an over 100 percent increase in the last fiscal year in border violence aimed at our Border Patrol agents, and that ranges from gunshots fired across the border to rocks being thrown, sometimes flaming rocks," said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff last week.

In this fiscal year, which began Oct. 1, the Border Patrol has recorded 192 assaults against its officers. Drug criminals more desperate

Part of the rise in violence stems from increased US law enforcement at the border, which is creating a more desperate drug smuggler, many experts say.

But it also is rising because these drug smugglers are becoming heavily involved in the lucrative people-smuggling business and are using the same violent tactics to evade law enforcement, Mr. Bonner says.

Some observers also worry that these criminal smugglers could team up with terrorists wanting to infiltrate the US.

"There is not only great concern that the drug trade is becoming more aggressive, but that terrorist organizations are seeking to exploit our porous border," said Texas Gov. Rick Perry last week while announcing a new state initiative, dubbed Operation Rio Grande. It involves redirecting equipment and manpower from state agencies to the border.

And while Mr. Bush's proposed budget is a step in the right direction with respect to border security, more is needed, said Governor Perry. He traveled to Washington late last week to add his voice to the chorus of Texas sheriffs already lobbying Congress for help.

Bush's budget calls for a 6 percent increase for the Department of Homeland Security, which would include 1,500 more Border Patrol agents, 6,700 new beds in detention facilities, and a significant increase in the number of cameras, sensors, and surveillance equipment along the border.

But some immigration experts say the boost in Border Patrol agents is a waste of resources without a more comprehensive approach.

"We've overspent on migration control at the border, so continued spending in this area is of declining value. We are getting less bang for our buck," says Marc Rosenblum, a visiting scholar at the Migration Policy Institute in Washington. "We need to look for more effective ways to control immigration and not simply to concentrate more resources at the border."

DOJ_NMG_0015306

But where to put those resources - and whether to crack down on all illegal immigrants or focus on the most dangerous ones - remains the subject of intense debate. Critics see Bush budget paradox

Those calling for a general crackdown see a contradiction in the White House's budget plan.

"For five years President Bush has been talking about the war on terrorism. But it's all offense and no defense," says Mark Krikorian, executive director for the Center for Immigration Studies in Washington. "And immigration control is the most important defensive tool in this kind of conflict."

He says the budget makes clear that Bush continues to ignore workplace enforcement, one of the main ways to check people's immigration status from inside the country.

Indeed, his budget proposes to spend $100 million more on a program to let immigrants come in as temporary workers than on forcing employers to verify the immigration status of their workers, Mr. Krikorian says. "You can't let in the Mexican dishwasher and keep out the Saudi suicide bomber. Immigration enforcement needs to be comprehensive."

But others say the terrorist threat is overblown.

"There is a real tendency to conflate immigration and terrorism," says Mr. Rosenblum of the Migration Policy Institute. "But almost all immigrants come here without any dark agenda."

In his view, a temporary-worker program would ease the pressure on the Border Patrol so that law enforcement could spend more time spotting terrorist types.

"Instead of spending billions of dollars busting nannies and gardeners, we ought to be analyzing the ways terrorists actually move," he says.

Misguided Border Patrolling (USAT)

By Ruben Navarrette

USA Today, February 15, 2006

Because I'm not just the grandson of a Mexican immigrant but also the son of a retired cop, my views on illegal immigration are complicated. I'm convinced that immigrants — whatever their status — are America's most valuable import. Yet I wasn't raised to take lightly things such as border security or the breaking of laws.

The trouble is that some proposed solutions — from putting troops on the border to denying citizenship to the children of illegal immigrants — bring to mind the old saying about the cure being worse than the disease. That includes this one: Allowing local police to enforce federal immigration law.

This dangerous and self-defeating concept is popular with those who think that law enforcement officers are interchangeable, and that one badge is as good as another. As proponents of this approach see it, police chase down criminals (including illegal immigrants) and it makes no difference whether their jurisdiction is local, state or federal.

Some advocates even want to require local police to enforce immigration law — something opposed by many police associations, including the International Association of Chiefs of Police. The Clear Law Enforcement for Criminal Alien Removal (CLEAR) Act, introduced in 2003 by Rep. Charles Norwood, R-Ga., and reintroduced in 2005, would enlist state and local law enforcement agencies in the enforcement of federal immigration laws. It passed in the House of Representatives as part of a larger immigration bill but has yet to be decided in the Senate.

The wrong answer

A mandate from Washington would be the worst possible thing. This is a decision best left to local and state authorities. We can only hope they make the right one.

In Costa Mesa, Calif., city officials recently made the wrong decision.

At the urging of Mayor Allan Mansoor, the City Council in December voted to authorize local police officers to be trained to enforce immigration law. That makes Costa Mesa, which is an hour's drive south of Los Angeles, the first city in the USA to take this road.

It probably won't be the last. State police agencies in Florida and Alabama and the county sheriff's department in Orange County, where Costa Mesa is located, have sought a "memorandum of understanding" from the U.S. Immigration Customs Enforcement agency to train their officers to enforce immigration law. An official at ICE told USA TODAY that there are at least 10 more pending inquiries from local authorities in New England, the South and the Midwest — all of them aiming to take immigration law into their own hands.

In Costa Mesa, officials seem to want a crackdown limited to what Mansoor calls "criminal offenders," or suspects of wrongdoing beyond entering the country illegally.

That includes gang activity. In fact, it's significant that of the first 40 officers for whom the city wants to seek training, most are detectives, gang specialists and jail personnel. Mansoor says that there won't be any sweeps or raids on employers, and that police will not be targeting illegal immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0015307

Those are some silver linings. Another would be if Costa Mesa's experiment excluded beat cops. Once street officers become surrogate immigration agents, all is lost. Whatever amount of trust the police department has built with immigrant communities will deteriorate. The possibility of racial profiling will increase. An initiative intended to combat crime could easily backfire and fuel it instead if immigrants are too scared to report crimes committed against them.

The root of the problem

Besides, let's not forget how Costa Mesa found itself in this predicament. Mansoor says that it's because the federal government has failed to do its duty.

Nonsense. If illegal immigrants are congregating in Costa Mesa — and thousands of U.S. cities like it — there's only one reason. It's because people in those places have decided they cannot live without the cheap and readily available labor supplied by illegal immigrants. Those are the real culprits — the teachers and engineers and soccer moms who love that they can afford upper-class perks (nannies, gardeners and housekeepers) on middle-class wages.

Those are the folks Mansoor and the city should crack down on if they want to solve this problem. At least one other city in California has tried issuing fines to employers who pluck day laborers off streets.

Personally, the cop's son in me would like to see a three-strikes law: The first time you hire an illegal immigrant, you get a warning. The second time, you get a $10,000 fine. The third, you get a week in jail. Currently, the law says you're not in trouble unless you "knowingly" hire an illegal immigrant. But after your third offense, shouldn't you be in the know?

Americans want to get tough on illegal immigrants. Fine. But you can't do that without first getting tough on those who hire them.

I'm probably naïve. Politicians know what they can get away with and what they can't. Immigrants who don't vote and can't speak English are not a threat. But employers of cheap labor who are singled out for prosecution can retaliate by spending money to defeat politicians and elect their opponents. That part isn't complicated. Never has been.

IMMIGRATION:

License Scam Ends In Plea (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), February 15, 2006

Man admits helping illegal immigrants

A man pleaded guilty Tuesday to shuttling - for $700 a pop - as many as 98 illegal immigrants in six months to Tennessee to get driver's licenses.

Claudio Galvan, himself an illegal immigrant already deported at least once, admitted at a hearing before U.S. District Court Judge Tom Varlan that he was the leader of a conspiracy to procure Tennessee driver's licenses for other illegal immigrants.

In a plea bargain negotiated by federal prosecutors Will Mackie and Jeff Theodore and Assistant Federal Defender Kim Tollison, Galvan agreed to confess arranging trips for "over 29 but less than 99 illegal aliens to Tennessee" from June to December last year.

The actual figure could be higher, because the number of illegal immigrants involved in the conspiracy determines, in part, Galvan's punishment and was part of the plea bargaining process.

According to court records, Galvan charged other illegal immigrants $700 to take them from Georgia to a driver's license testing center in Maryville and also helped them obtain fake documents needed to show proof of Tennessee residency.

It was the second such shuttle service using East Tennessee testing centers shut down by the FBI in less than a year. The Tennessee Bureau of Investigation recently uncovered a third operation involving testing centers in Middle Tennessee.

Federal prosecutors contend Tennessee is a draw for license-seeking illegal immigrants because of its driver's certificate program, one of only two in the nation that allow people to get a license without proving U.S. citizenship. The other is in Utah.

Under the program, a potential licensee need only show some sort of proof of residency in Tennessee for the past 30 days. Galvan helped provide illegal immigrants with faked proof.

The driver's certificates are not supposed to be used for identification. However, court records show, illegal immigrants are able to use the certificates as identification in a variety of ways that further cloak their lack of legal residency in the United States.

Also pleading guilty in Galvan's case was Armando Rodriguez-Riveros, who admitted transporting Galvan's illegal customers from Georgia to East Tennessee. Both men face less than two years in prison and deportation.

DOJ_NMG_0015308

Federal Magistrate Judge Clifford Shirley on Tuesday sentenced five of Galvan's customers, nabbed by the FBI as part of the agency's probe of the shuttling service, to time served, paving the way for their deportation.

DOJ:Bank HVB To Enter Deferred Prosecution Pact With Government (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones, February 15, 2006

NEW YORK -(Dow Jones)- German bank Bayerische Hypo & Vereinsbank AG, known as HVB, will pay $29.6 million to the federal government as part of a deferred prosecution agreement in the Justice Department's probe into fraudulent tax shelters, prosecutors said Tuesday.

At a hearing in federal court in Manhattan, prosecutors from the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan said the bank's payment includes nearly $16.2 million in disgorgement and forfeiture, as well as more than $6.9 million in restitution. Payment must be made by Feb. 17.

The agreement runs for 18 months. If the bank doesn't violate it during that time, it will likely avoid prosecution.

The bank also has agreed to restrictions on certain types of business and will implement an ethics and compliance program in its U.S. business.

As part of the agreement, the government filed a criminal information against the bank, charging it with one count of conspiracy.

U.S. District Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein accepted the agreement at Tuesday's hearing.

In a statement, Chris Wrenn, HVB's chief operations officer in the U.S., said, "HVB has cooperated fully with the government's investigation and will continue to do so. We have already begun to implement the actions mandated by the [deferred prosecution agreement.] We are pleased to have reached this settlement and can now focus more fully on our core businesses."

The company said it had already begun steps to exit the tax-shelter business, improve its management controls and enhance oversight in its tax department prior to the government's investigation.

Prosecutors have alleged that HVB, from 1996 to 2003, engaged in a scheme to help high-net-worth individuals in the U.S. avoid paying income taxes, including acting as a purported lender for transactions that did little more than create a tax loss for those individuals.

The government said those individuals were able to avoid paying $500 million in income taxes as a result of the creation of about $1.8 billion in phony tax losses.

Last year, Domenick DeGiorgio, a former HVB executive, pleaded guilty to fraud, conspiracy and tax-evasion charges, including an allegedly fraudulent tax shelter marketed by KPMG LLP known as "Bond Linked Issue Premium Structure," or Blips.

DeGiorgio is expected to be a witness for the government in its criminal tax- evasion case against a group of former KPMG LLP partners and others, which is scheduled to go to trial later this year.

Prosecutors have alleged that those former KPMG tax partners and other individuals participated in a scheme to sell fraudulent tax shelters that allowed wealthy individuals to avoid paying at least $2.5 billion in taxes.

Blips were one of the transactions in which HVB admitted to participating as part of the deferred prosecution agreement on Tuesday.

Tax Inquiry Said To Include German Bank (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

Federal prosecutors in Manhattan are investigating Deutsche Bank's role in questionable tax shelters that helped wealthy investors evade billions of dollars in taxes, according to people briefed on the case.

The development is the latest in a widening inquiry of accounting firms, lawyers and now banks. Yesterday, Germany's second-largest bank, HVB Group, agreed to pay nearly $30 million in a plea bargain with federal prosecutors over four types of tax shelters, averting an indictment.

A spokeswoman for Deutsche Bank, Germany's largest bank, declined to comment yesterday.

The criminal investigation of the banks is being conducted by the United States attorney's office in Manhattan and follows its investigation into the accounting firm KPMG's role in the creation and sale of bogus tax shelters. In August, KPMG avoided indictment by agreeing to pay $456 million. Seventeen former KPMG employees and two others have been indicted on charges of plotting to defraud the Internal Revenue Service through the creation and sale of four tax shelters. All 19 are fighting the charges.

The settlement with HVB includes a strongly worded admission of "criminal wrongdoing" by the bank. In the agreement, HVB acknowledged that it conspired to defraud the United States government, committed tax evasion, caused false and fraudulent tax to be filed, and assisted in the preparation of false returns. HVB, the statement said, worked with KPMG and certain unnamed law firms and investment firms to participate in fraudulent tax shelter transactions.

"KPMG and HVB have admitted that they and their co-conspirators used false and misleading documentation to cheat the government out of billions of dollars in taxes owed by America's wealthiest citizens," the United States attorney, Michael J. Garcia, said in a statement. He called the tax shelters in question "nothing more than fictions designed to enable privileged taxpayers to avoid paying their fair share."

HVB, under its agreement with prosecutors, will pay nearly $30 million in fines and penalties stemming from its work on four questionable tax shelters sold to investors over 1996 through 2003 that cost the Treasury $500 million in unpaid taxes.

The deal, which lasts 18 months, allows HVB to avoid a criminal trial if it abides by the terms of the agreement, which include cooperating with the widening investigation.

In a statement, HVB said yesterday that it "has cooperated fully with the government's investigation, and will continue to do so."

Government investigators at the Justice Department and the I.R.S. who are investigating questionable tax shelters have said that a network of banks, law firms, accounting firms and investment firms worked together from the mid-1990's through 2003 to create and sell abusive shelters and carry out financial transactions underpinning them.

The agreement with HVB covers four tax shelters known as blips, cards, 357c and common trust funds. All four shelters involve generating phony losses that were then used by investors to evade income tax by offsetting legitimate gains on other income.

Blips required complex financial transactions, which HVB carried out. Prosecutors said yesterday that those transactions were essentially "non-bona fide loans" to investors that generated phony tax losses permitting "illegal tax benefits." Over 1999 and 2000, HVB carried out transactions for 29 blips that generated at least $5.1 billion in phony tax losses, according to a statement of admitted facts accompanying the deferred prosecution agreement.

For that same blips shelter, however, Deutsche Bank played a much bigger role. The bank made 56 blips "loans" over 1999 and 2000, earning fees of $44 million, according to testimony by a former Deutsche Bank employee during hearings by the Senate's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations in 2003.

That same Senate report said that after a 1999 meeting between unnamed HVB employees and an employee of an investment firm, "HVB was put in touch with Deutsche Bank" regarding loans underpinning the shelter.

No court has ever ruled blips or the three other tax shelters in question illegal. Still, the I.R.S. has never considered the shelters valid.

The criminal investigation in Manhattan adds to Deutsche Bank's legal problems. In late December, a German federal court ruled that the bank's chief executive, Josef Ackermann, would be tried again in a criminal case. Mr. Ackermann, who was a director at a telecommunications company, Mannesmann, during a takeover battle with Vodafone of Britain, had been acquitted in 2004 of charges that he broke the law by awarding rich bonuses to top Mannesmann executives.

And Deutsche Bank is a defendant in numerous civil lawsuits filed by former clients who bought blips and other tax shelters. David Deary, a lawyer in Dallas who represents about 350 investors involved in more than half a dozen complaints, said yesterday that "Deutsche Bank was a major player in the tax shelter market and was involved in all aspects of the tax shelter market, including designing, heavily promoting and implementing a wide variety of tax shelters."

HVB Group, which was born in 1835 as Bavaria's state bank, has more than 2,000 branches in more than 40 countries. In June, it agreed to be acquired by UniCredito of Italy for $18.7 billion.

Last August, a former HVB employee in New York, Domenick DeGiorgio, pleaded guilty to tax fraud over his work with tax shelters, including blips.

HVB's admission of wrongdoing was made by its head of United States operations, Gabrielle Falger, and was accepted by Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein of the Federal District Court in Manhattan. HVB also agreed not to develop or sell certain tax-related transactions or strategies

No separate enforcement action has been taken by the Federal Reserve, which regulates foreign banking entities in the United States, according to Deborah Lagomarsino, an agency spokeswoman.

Uncollected Taxes Reach $290 Billion (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

New government estimates of revenue losses from uncollected taxes are likely to increase pressure on the Internal Revenue Service for tougher enforcement measures.

The IRS yesterday issued revised estimates of the nation's "tax gap," the difference between what taxpayers should be paying and what they actually do pay. The study suggests that individuals represent by far the biggest part of the problem, especially self-employed workers and others whose earnings aren't reported to the government and where taxes aren't withheld.

Getting precise numbers is exceptionally difficult, since nobody knows for sure how much income isn't reported in the U.S. Also, millions of people who should be filing tax returns aren't doing so. But the IRS study, the most detailed of its kind in many years, came up with two ways of looking at the issue.

First, the IRS estimated the "gross" tax gap at $345 billion a year. Its earlier estimate put the gap in a range of $312 billion to $353 billion, based on an analysis of data for tax-year 2001. That represents the difference between what taxpayers should have paid and what they did pay "on a timely basis." Then, after including $55 billion generated from IRS-enforcement efforts and other late payments, the net tax gap stood at $290 billion. That is also at the high end of the previous estimated range of $257 billion to $298 billion.

Lawmakers quickly expressed dismay. Sen. Max Baucus, a Montana Democrat and a member of the Senate Finance Committee, said the administration's budget plans "won't take any real bite out of this unacceptable tax gap." He also said, "It's time for a comprehensive plan to go after scofflaws and tax cheats big and small, who are contributing to the deficit by not contributing their fair share."

IRS officials say they already have taken major steps. They have increased the number of audits of people making $100,000 or more, and they have intensified their crackdown on what they consider to be abusive tax shelters, or transactions with no real purpose other than dodging taxes. They have stepped up scrutiny of family limited partnerships, a popular technique for cutting estate and gift taxes. And they have increased efforts to pursue "nonfilers," people who should be filing tax returns but aren't.

The administration recently proposed legislation that officials say will help narrow the tax gap. For example, the president proposed requiring debit- and credit-card issuers to report to the IRS the gross reimbursements paid to certain businesses. They also want to clarify when employee-leasing companies can be held liable for their clients' federal employment taxes.

"The vast majority of Americans pay their taxes accurately and are shortchanged by those who don't pay their fair share," IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson said yesterday in a statement. "The magnitude of the tax gap highlights the critical role of enforcement in keeping our system of tax administration healthy."

IRS spokesman Bruce Friedland said yesterday that the agency estimates there were 13.6 million nonfilers for 2001.

Tax Cheating Has Gone Up, Two Federal Studies Find (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

Historically, when income tax rates fall, so does tax cheating. But that is not what happened after President Bush started cutting taxes five years ago.

A new report by the Commerce Department found that Americans failed to report more than a trillion dollars in income on their 2003 tax returns. That was a 37 percent increase in unreported income from 2000.

In a separate report, the Internal Revenue Service looked at both unreported income and improper deductions and concluded that Americans shortchanged the government by $345 billion in 2001 — an amount almost equal to the projected federal budget deficit for 2007.

The report, released yesterday by the I.R.S. commissioner, Mark W. Everson, was the agency's first estimate in 15 years of the gap between what Americans owed in taxes and what they paid. The I.R.S. report concluded that proprietors of small businesses, investors and farmers cheated the most. Workers who had 99 percent of their wages reported to the government and taxes withheld from their paychecks were the least likely to cheat.

Mr. Everson acknowledged that the estimate is probably low because the I.R.S. looked only at individuals and small unincorporated businesses. It has not revised its estimates of tax cheating by corporations, large estates and by firms that do not hire their workers directly but instead contract with an employee leasing firm.

The ability of the I.R.S. to enforce the tax laws has steadily eroded in the last 17 years as its ranks of auditors have been trimmed by about a third, the tax code has become more complex and new laws have been enacted to protect taxpayer rights.

In his proposed budget for 2007, Mr. Bush laid out a five-point plan to reduce the underpayment of taxes by $350 million a year, an amount equal to a tenth of a penny per dollar of the unpaid taxes.

A more serious effort to reduce the tax gap appears unlikely, two senators said yesterday.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee — which has held hearings on the issues of unpaid taxes, abusive tax shelters and criminal tax evasion — said it would take more than what Mr. Bush had proposed to make a meaningful dent.

"It's easy for politicians to stand on the soap box and criticize the tax gap," Senator Grassley said, "but I find it's pretty lonely when I need people to join me and get their hands dirty and try to solve these problems."

Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, the committee's ranking minority member, dismissed the Bush proposal as weak.

"The administration's budget plans won't take any real bite out of this unacceptable tax gap — it just nibbles at this crisis while the deficit grows," Senator Baucus said.

"It's time for a comprehensive plan to go after scofflaws and tax cheats big and small, who are contributing to the deficit by not contributing their fair share," he said.

The Senate Budget Committee will hold a hearing today on reducing the gap between taxes owed and taxes paid.

The I.R.S. estimate was based on a detailed study of 46,000 individual income tax returns.

Mr. Everson said that about 10 million people did not file returns, costing the government about $27 billion in revenue. Another 10 million had incomes so modest that they were not required to file. About 130 million returns were filed. Cheating on business income was "a problem 50 times larger" than cheating by wage earners, Mr. Everson said.

The biggest single revenue loss came from proprietors of unincorporated businesses, who typically file a Schedule C with their tax return, who shorted the government an estimated $68 billion in 2001. Cheating by partnerships, most of whose members are wealthy professionals or investors, was put at $22 billion, while cheating by landlords and those collecting royalties was estimated at $13 billion.

In percentage terms, farmers cheated the most, the I.R.S. said, failing to pay the government $6 billion, or 72 percent of the taxes they should have.

IRS Was Underpaid $345 Billion In '01 (WP)

By Albert B. Crenshaw

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

Through cheating and mistakes, U.S. taxpayers shortchanged the government $345 billion in 2001, and though $55 million of that was eventually paid late or tracked down by the Internal Revenue Service, the rest was never collected, the IRS said yesterday.

The figures indicate that the nation's "tax gap," the difference between the amount Americans should pay on income from legal activities and the amount they do pay, is at the high end of the range that the IRS had estimated.

Most of the estimate is based on recent data -- including an analysis of 46,000 randomly chosen personal returns from 2001 -- but some relies on older information, so the true gap "could very well be higher," Internal Revenue Commissioner Mark W. Everson said yesterday.

He said the figures are "a snapshot of 2001" and that the gap could be different today because of changes in tax policy and growth of the economy. However, he said the agency considers the 2001 figures a good guide to where to look for unpaid taxes and will allocate its enforcement efforts accordingly.

Individual taxpayers account for a majority of the gap -- $197 billion in 2001 -- and most of that is the result of unreported or underreported income rather than overstated deductions or improperly claimed credits.

The biggest component of the tax gap attributable to individuals is underreported income from business activities for which there is no third-party reporting comparable to the W-2 reports of wages that employers send to the IRS. Such underreported income -- including rents, royalties, partnerships and the income of self-employed people -- totaled $109 billion.

Exaggerated deductions accounted for $14 billion of the 2001 gap.

IRS officials said the findings are in line with previous research, including the last round of audits in the Taxpayer Compliance Measurement Program, in 1988. Those audits were criticized as intrusive and were barred by Congress in the late 1990s.

Overall, Everson said, about "85 percent of the money is coming in correctly." Of the missing amounts, "we do not have specific conclusions about how much is willful" cheating and how much is "lack of understanding of the code," he said.

Complexity of the tax law contributes to noncompliance, Everson said, both by confusing taxpayers and by providing "opportunities for skirting the line."

The lowest level of compliance for any group was by farmers, who misreported 72 percent of their income (or losses), though they accounted for only $6 billion of the gap.

DOJ_NMG_0015312

Underreported capital gains -- profits from sales of stocks, bonds or other assets -- accounted for $11 billion.

Wage income, which is reported to the IRS by employers, has a 99 percent compliance rate.

Everson noted that the Bush administration's budget proposes that federal, state and local governments report to the IRS payments they make to purchase goods and services.

The administration has also asked Congress to require debit and credit card issuers to report aggregate payments to merchants each year.

"What we are proposing is there be . . . some limited additional reporting to get after this large piece of the tax gap," Everson said.

The last time there was a change in reporting, in 1986 when taxpayers were required to provide Social Security numbers for dependents, 5 million dependents vanished, Everson recalled.

"We believe there will be an impact from reporting," he said.

IRS Backs Novel Way To Avoid Gift Taxes (WSJ)

By Tom Herman And Rachel Emma Silverman

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

Bolstered by a recent IRS ruling, a small but increasing number of wealthy individuals are cutting their tax bills by prepaying family members' tuition bills for multiple years.

Tax advisers say this technique could be a smart move for people with large estates who want to pay for a student's tuition and fear they might not live long enough to pay the bills as they come due each year. This way, they can help their families deal with soaring education costs and skirt hefty federal estate and gift taxes. But the technique is also proving popular with younger, healthy individuals.

Private schools and colleges are seeing more relatives adopting the strategy, and some are now actively encouraging families to prepay tuition bills, which at some elite private schools can run nearly $30,000 a year -- and even more at some colleges.

"I've had about half a dozen clients do it," says Susan C. Frunzi, a partner at the law firm Schulte Roth & Zabel LLP in New York. She says the longest prepayment period was about four or five years. It isn't just being used by grandparents, either: Ms. Frunzi says some clients have done it for nieces and nephews -- or the children of friends who are less well off. Her firm has even prepared a sample prepayment agreement for one of the schools it represents.

The tactic deftly addresses two powerful developments: the soaring cost of education and the huge impending transfer of intergenerational wealth. The parents of boomers are poised to transfer an unprecedented amount of money when they die, and to many, finding tax-efficient ways to share that wealth while they are still alive is an important priority.

"It's becoming a very popular way of avoiding estate taxes," says Bruce Amsbary, business manger of the Rivers School in Weston, Mass., which has seen a rise in multiyear prepayments over the past few years.

The strategy is also beginning to attract more attention among tax professionals. The American Institute of Certified Public Accountants recently said that for people primarily interested in transferring wealth, prepayments provide a method of paying for multiple years of tuition "while keeping the taxpayer's annual exclusion amounts available for other gifts."

One of the main attractions of the direct-prepayment strategy is its simplicity. There is no need to hire a lawyer to draft complex trusts or other sophisticated wealth-transfer techniques. For those skittish about the technique, there are some tax-efficient alternatives, such as funding a 529 college-savings plan; setting up a Health and Education Exclusion Trust, which can pay for multiple generations of heirs; or simply directly paying annual tuition costs each year. (See the chart for some alternative ways to pay for someone's education.)

A recently released private-letter ruling by the Internal Revenue Service is fueling more interest in the subject among tax lawyers and other financial advisers. In the ruling, the IRS told a taxpayer that prepayments of multiple years of tuition for the taxpayer's grandchildren wouldn't be considered a gift for tax purposes. The taxpayer in question proposed prepaying tuition bills for each of six grandchildren through 12th grade.

Under current law, you can hand out as much as $12,000 a year per person to anyone you want without even having to report it to the IRS. Yet it doesn't count against that annual limit if you pay for someone else's tuition or medical expenses, no matter how large your payments may be -- as long as those payments are made directly to the educational institution or medical-services provider.

Thus, you can move large amounts of money out of your estate tax-free, without even having to report your gifts to the IRS -- and without eating into any of your estate tax or lifetime gift-tax exclusion amounts. (The lifetime gift-tax exclusion amount is $1 million. The basic federal estate-tax exclusion amount is $2 million this year, although one spouse typically can leave everything to the other spouse free of estate tax. However, there may be state tax factors to consider.)

Many grandparents long have taken advantage of this provision by making direct payments to schools for a single year of tuition. The IRS's latest ruling gives additional assurance that prepayments for multiple years also would be acceptable.

The prepayments the IRS ruled on didn't entitle the grandparent to any tuition discounts. All tuition payments would be nonrefundable -- a crucial point, according to tax experts -- and, once paid, would become the school's "sole property," even if the students stopped going to that school. They wouldn't entitle them to "any additional rights or privileges over any other student" -- and also wouldn't guarantee enrollment.

There are some risks to the multiyear approach. The child may refuse to attend the school, may transfer out, may get expelled -- or drop out. A possible solution, according to one accountant, would be to arrange ahead of time with the first school to have the tuition money transferred directly to a second school in case the child transfers. Thus, if you are considering prepaying, be sure to ask the school for details of its policy. But the IRS hasn't specifically addressed this issue, and some lawyers think that such an agreement may not pass IRS muster.

Some schools, including colleges such as Harvard and Middlebury and prep schools such as Phillips Academy in Andover, Mass., offer special prepaid plans designed to lock in tuition rates upfront, but many are refundable. Before you sign up, check with a tax expert and have him or her examine the fine print to make sure it wouldn't lead to unintended tax consequences.

A number of schools report receiving prepayments. For example, within the past two or three years, the Brentwood School in Los Angeles has received prepayments by about four or five grandparents, says Mary Sidell of Brentwood, which has 992 students from kindergarten through grade 12. One prepaid for several children for 10-12 years in advance, she says.

In 2002, the Saint James School, in Montgomery, Ala., drafted an official prepayment agreement as an alternative, and tax-efficient, way for students' family members or friends to pay school costs. "Did you know? Grandparents and others who would like to legally avoid the federal gift tax on large amounts of money can do so by prepaying tuition for their grandchildren or any child for that matter," said a school newsletter sent to students' families.

Only one person, so far, has taken advantage of the school's prepayment agreement, a grandfather. He was in poor health when he decided to fund two of his grandchildren's education for a couple of years. "The money didn't end up in his estate at all," says William Furr, Saint James's controller and business manager. "It was a really good move on his part."

Even with the risks, this could still be a smart move for some people -- but is best suited for those who are concerned they might not live long enough to pay each year's tuition as it comes up, could afford to part with the money permanently, are comfortable the child will complete education at that school and are willing for the school to keep the money in any event.

The ruling confirms the gist of an IRS technical advice memorandum issued in 1999 based on slightly different facts. That memo and the new IRS private-letter ruling apply only to the specific taxpayers involved and aren't supposed to be cited as precedent. But tax advisers say the new ruling is helpful anyway because it offers the IRS's latest thinking on the subject -- and provides additional comfort to anyone who might fear the IRS now might have a different opinion than in 1999. * * *

SPECULATION HEATS UP about possible estate-tax changes.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee recently said he will renew efforts to win approval for legislation to repeal permanently the federal estate tax, which he and other Republican leaders refer to as the "death tax." Investment analysts see permanent repeal as highly unlikely this year. "This has little chance of passage," says Andy Laperriere of ISI Group, a research and brokerage firm.

But there still may be a compromise that would include raising the basic estate-tax exclusion, now $2 million, to somewhere between $3.5 million and $5 million -- and cutting the top tax rate, now 46%. * * *

BRIEFS: Ohio's tax amnesty offer, which began Jan. 1, is scheduled to run through today. ... Federal estate and gift-tax revenue rose to about $8.02 billion in the four months ended Jan. 31 from $7.93 billion in the year-earlier period.

Extension Of Bush Tax Rates Wins Support Of Republican Senators (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Republicans took a step toward extending lower tax rates on investments when a majority of senators for the first time in this session of Congress signaled that they support the idea.

Senators yesterday voted 53-47 in support of a two-year extension of President Bush's 15% rates on capital gains and dividends. By the same margin, senators said the final tax bill should both lower tax rates on capital gains and dividends and exempt millions of middle-income Americans from the alternative minimum tax.

While yesterday's votes were on a procedural motion and won't have any effect over the final tax bill, they put a majority of senators on the record as supporting an extension of lower tax rates on capital gains and dividends. "It...has been our belief that a majority of senators support extending the lower tax rates on capital gains and dividends. The Senate's vote reaffirms our belief," said Richard Hunt, a securities-industry lobbyist.

Of the Senate's 55 Republicans, three voted against the rate extensions: Sens. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, Olympia Snowe of Maine and John Warner of Virginia. Democrat Ben Nelson of Nebraska voted with Republicans.

Democrats have argued that Republicans should focus on preventing U.S. citizens from having to pay higher taxes under the alternative minimum tax before dealing with the rates on investments. "Let's make sure that relief from the onerous and family-unfriendly AMT happens now," said Sen. Max Baucus of Montana, the ranking Democrat on the Finance Committee. "And let's defer on extending expensive tax breaks for investors until a later day."

The 15% rates on capital gains and dividends were enacted as part of President Bush's 2003 tax cut bill and don't expire until the end of 2008. Mr. Bush and most Republicans say the lower tax rates on investments have helped fuel economic growth for the past few years. Even though the lower rates don't expire for a few years, Republicans say that failing to act now will add uncertainty to financial markets.

"Extending these provisions now is necessary to provide certainty for investors and businesses and is essential to the continued growth of the economy and the creation of new jobs," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee wrote yesterday in a letter to the lawmakers who will negotiate a final bill.

The House made the capital gains and dividends extensions the centerpiece of a $70 billion, five-year tax bill approved at the end of 2005. But Sen. Snowe, a moderate Republican, blocked a similar extension in the Senate version of the bill. Instead, the Senate bill would prevent middle-class taxpayers from paying the AMT, at a cost of $30 billion. The House bill doesn't include AMT relief because Republicans in that chamber approved a separate tax bill that protects the middle class from the AMT.

The Senate and House bills also extend for one year billions of dollars of tax incentives for individuals to save for retirement and for businesses to invest in research and development.

Republican leaders in the House and Senate want to approve a final tax bill that both extends the lower capital gains and dividends rates by two years and guards against the AMT. The issue is how to move such a package through Congress. Republicans could include the capital gains and dividends language in the broader $70 billion tax bill and approve the AMT as a standalone bill. Or they could include both provisions in one bill -- along with a renewal of the expiring tax incentives -- by cutting the capital gains and dividends extension to one year.

Republicans in the House and Senate are scheduled to begin negotiations on their competing bills this week before leaving Washington for the President's Day recess. They hope to have a final bill ready by early March.

The Heart Of The Economy (WSJ)

By John W. Snow

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

By nearly every conventional statistical measure, the American economy is performing very well today -- continued economic growth; a strong employment market; household wealth is at historic highs; inflation has been kept in check; interest rates are still low by historic standards.

But this was not the case three years ago. The economy was still struggling with the head winds from the economic downturn that began in 2000, the impact of the terrorist attacks, and the excesses of the late '90s -- seen most glaringly in the bursting of the equity-market high-tech bubble.

While officially the recession had ended in late 2001, the pace of the recovery was too slow. Growth was anemic, business confidence low and -- of critical importance -- capital investment was way down. As a result job growth was nonexistent.

President Bush recognized that something needed to be done to overcome those headwinds and, in particular, to create a more favorable climate for capital investment that would result in job creation. To do so he sent Congress far-reaching proposals to encourage capital formation by lowering taxes on investment returns. Congress responded with the Jobs and Growth Act, which was signed into law in May 2003.

Since then we have seen a remarkable turn-around in the economy. After nine consecutive declining quarters of real annual business investment, we have had 10 straight quarters of rising business investment. This business expansion led to a substantial increase in employment. In the intervening period, some 4.7 million new jobs have been created and the unemployment rate -- 6.3% in 2003 -- today stands at 4.7%, lower than the average of the 1970s, '80s and '90s.

While many factors contributed to the improved performance of the economy, the tax reductions on capital have been at the heart of the progress we have seen.

The president's proposals didn't simply provide a short-term stimulus. They did provide a stimulus, but they also did far more: By lowering the cost of capital, the president's proposals improved the inherent efficiency of the economy. We know that you always get less of something you tax. By lowering the taxes on capital, the proposals encouraged increased long-term investment. Increased long-term investment in turn improves the long-term outlook of the economy. It makes the economy more productive. With additional capital, labor output rises. And with rising labor output the demand for labor increases.

DOJ_NMG_0015315

Sound monetary policy from the Fed complemented the tax cuts, of course. The combined effect was essentially an unleashing of the economic power that rises so naturally in a free-market economy. That power comes, at its roots, from risk-takers and investment capital.

With 4.7 million new jobs created and fully half of all households benefiting from the lower tax on dividends alone, there can be no doubt that lower taxes on investment benefited the majority of the American people quite directly.

It concerns me that some in Congress are today looking to increase taxes on capital gains and dividends. Worse yet, there have been suggestions that the administration should choose between protecting the middle class from the Alternative Minimum Tax and extending the low rates on capital gains and dividends.

In both cases, the middle class is at serious risk; choosing one or other is not an option. An AMT fix must be approved by the Congress for 2006 and eventually find a permanent remedy through fundamental tax reform, and the lower rates on investment must hold. Increasing those taxes would damage economic growth, hurt job creation, and raise taxes on half of all American households. * * *

Keep in mind that the typical investor today, according to the Securities Industry Association, is a middle-class person saving for retirement with a household income of about $65,000.

If Congress fails to extend the 15% rate on capital gains and dividends, what harm will it bring to our economy? To me, the answer is very straightforward: Raising tax rates on capital gains and dividends would strike at the heart of the economy with damaging long-term effects on economic growth. A slowdown in investment would be inevitable, and a slowdown in job growth almost certain to follow.

The role of government is to put in place the foundations for American innovators and workers to do the real work that propels the economy forward. A pillar of that foundation is the low tax rates on capital gains and dividends that ultimately translate into higher living standards for all Americans. Congress owes it not just to the 91 million Americans who own equities, but to all Americans who benefit from a strong and growing economy to keep this pillar of growth in place and extend the 15% rate on capital gains and dividends.

Mr. Snow is the U.S. Treasury secretary.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Handling Of Accident Creates Tension Between White House Staffs (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 — When the White House press secretary, Scott McClellan, came to the press room just before 10 a.m. Tuesday and suggested he was wearing an orange tie to avoid a stray shot from Vice President Dick Cheney, it seemed to signal an effort to defuse the accidental-shooting story with a laugh.

But by midday, it was clear that the staffs of the president and the vice president had failed to communicate. Just after arriving at work around 7:45 a.m., Mr. Cheney learned that the man he had shot, Harry M. Whittington, was about to undergo a medical procedure on his heart because his injuries were more serious than earlier believed, Mr. Cheney's spokeswoman said.

No one in Mr. Cheney's office passed the word to Mr. McClellan, senior officials at the White House said, adding that the press secretary would never have joked about the shooting accident if he had known about the turn of events involving Mr. Whittington.

It was the latest example of the degree to which Mr. Cheney's habit of living in his own world in the Bush White House — surrounded by his own staff, relying on his own instincts, saying as little as possible — had backfired since the accident in Texas on Saturday. Mr. Cheney's staff members have kept their comments to chronological details and to repeating the vice president's written statements.

The tension between President Bush's staff and Mr. Cheney's has been palpable, with White House officials whispering to reporters about how they tried to handle the news of the shooting differently. Mr. McClellan, while being careful not to cross Mr. Cheney or his aides directly, has made a point of reminding reporters of how he dealt with Mr. Bush's bicycle accident last summer, when the president collided with a Scottish policeman at the G-8 summit.

"I immediately briefed the press on how the accident had happened, and the condition of the police officer," who was taken to the hospital with minor injuries, Mr. McClellan said.

His message was clear: There was a procedure for conveying this kind of news, and it was not followed in this case.

DOJ_NMG_0015316

The past three days have underscored, in public, what has always been clear in the Bush White House: Mr. Cheney plays by rules of his own making. It is the freedom that only a political figure who knows he is in his last job — he often says he will never run again — can get away with.

"What he did was not an irrational thing," said Mary Matalin, Mr. Cheney's former communications adviser, who spoke to him Sunday morning. "This was a very close friend this happened to. Everyone was shaken up about it. When I spoke to him, it was all about Harry, worrying about him," not whether he should get a statement out, or let his South Texas host tell a local newspaper.

To others, though, it is a telling example of the cocoon Mr. Cheney has created within the White House.

Even at the most secure meetings in the White House situation room, Mr. Cheney tends to ask questions but leave the participants guessing about his own views — largely, his colleagues say they suspect, for fear of leaks. His movements, once hidden for security reasons, are now often cloaked out of habit. Several senior members of the administration said they were not told of the shooting accident until late Sunday.

Several White House officials said no one among the White House staff, including the chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., felt empowered to dictate how news of the accident would be handled.

Presumably Mr. Bush could have declared how the news would be disseminated, something he does often on policy matters. Until this week, the periodic disconnect between Mr. Cheney's office and the rest of the White House has been the source of grumbling, but rarely open tension. The most notable exception came in August 2002, when Mr. Cheney, delivering a speech about Iraq, spoke so disparagingly about the utility of past United Nations weapons inspections that he left the impression that the administration would never again use inspections in an effort to assess the threat of Saddam Hussein.

In fact, Mr. Bush had decided to try to send inspectors back in, at least for a while, and it was left to Condoleezza Rice, then the national security adviser, to call Mr. Cheney and get him to strike that wording from a speech he was giving a few days later.

In the past five years, Mr. Cheney has grown accustomed to having a power center of his own, with his own miniature version of a national security council staff. It conducts policy debates that often happen parallel those among Mr. Bush's staff.

But the team Mr. Cheney relies on has changed in recent months. The departure of I. Lewis Libby Jr., who was indicted late last year on charges stemming from the investigation into the leak of a C.I.A. officer's name, left Mr. Cheney without one of his chief confidantes. His most recent communications chief, Steve Schmidt, also departed, to run the re-election campaign of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California.

It was unclear if their presence would have made a difference last weekend, when the accident was not disclosed publicly for more than 18 hours. Some former White House officials put the blame for that squarely on Mr. Cheney.

Marlin Fitzwater, who was press secretary to the first President Bush (when Mr. Cheney served as defense secretary), said he was "appalled" at how the vice president handled the news of a serious accident.

"The responsibility for handling this, of course, was Cheney's," Mr. Fitzwater was quoted as saying in the online edition of Editor and Publisher. "What he should have done was call his press secretary and tell her what happened, and she then would have gotten a hold of the doctor and asked him what happened."

A full account could have been put out "in about two hours on Saturday," he said.

Ari Fleischer, Mr. McClellan's predecessor, said Tuesday that he suspected the reason Mr. Cheney failed to say anything publicly was because he viewed the hunting trip and the accident as part of his private life, not his public one.

"If this had been a question of fundamental policy," Mr. Fleischer said, "the president's staff and the veep's staff would have gotten together."

Cheney's Response A Concern In GOP (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Peter Baker

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

Vice President Cheney's slow and unapologetic public response to the accidental shooting of a 78-year-old Texas lawyer is turning the quail-hunting mishap into a political liability for the Bush administration and is prompting senior White House officials to press Cheney to publicly address the issue as early as today, several prominent Republicans said yesterday.

The Republicans said Cheney should have immediately disclosed the shooting Saturday night to avoid even the suggestion of a coverup and should have offered a public apology for his role in accidentally shooting Harry Whittington, a GOP lawyer from Austin. Whittington was hospitalized Saturday night in Corpus Christi, Tex., and was moved back into the intensive-care unit after suffering an abnormal heart rhythm yesterday morning.

"I cannot believe he does not look back and say this should have been handled differently," said Vin Weber, a former Republican congressman from Minnesota who is close to the White House. Weber said Cheney "made it a much bigger issue than it needed to be."

Marlin Fitzwater, a former Republican White House spokesman, told Editor & Publisher magazine that Cheney "ignored his responsibility to the American people."

The episode is turning into a defining moment for Cheney, a vice president who has operated with enormous clout to shape White House policy while avoiding public scrutiny over the past five years.

President Bush has allowed Cheney to become perhaps the most powerful vice president in history and has provided him with unparalleled autonomy. Early in Bush's first term, Cheney developed the administration's energy policy, largely behind closed doors, and then heavily influenced Iraq policy after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

No evidence has emerged to suggest that the shooting was anything more than a hunting accident, but the spectacle of the vice president wounding a prominent Republican at an exclusive Texas ranch has become the punch line for politicians and comedians alike, and has penetrated the popular culture through late-night television. Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said he referred to Cheney as the "shooter in chief" in a meeting with members of Congress yesterday morning. It has also raised anew criticism of Cheney's operating style.

Cheney has avoided public comment on the shooting other than to release two short statements. One stated that he would be issued a warning for not paying a $7 hunting fee in Texas; the other, released by his office yesterday, detailed when he learned of Whittington's worsening condition and said his "thoughts and prayers are with Mr. Whittington and his family."

Whittington suffered an irregular heartbeat yesterday after a shotgun pellet in his chest traveled to his heart, according to hospital officials in Corpus Christi.

Some current and former White House officials said Cheney's refusal to address the issue or accept any blame has the potential to become a political problem for Bush because it reinforces the image of a secretive and above-the-law White House. Top White House aides are pressuring Cheney to discuss the incident as early as today, according to people familiar with the matter.

Cheney, a former House member, White House chief of staff and corporate executive, is dismissive of the national media and unfazed by criticism and unflattering publicity. Bush picked Cheney as vice president in large part because of his lack of political ambitions and his ability to keep confidences.

"If I read Dick Cheney right, he's got to be just devastated" by the shooting incident, said Robert H. Michel, a former House Republican leader from Illinois and a longtime friend. But Michel said he is mystified that the vice president has not come out in public to express his feelings.

"I guess he's so measured with what he does say personally, but boy, I'd think on something of this nature, you'd let your feelings [be] known," Michel said.

In general, Michel said, Cheney has "enclosed" his personal feelings so tightly to avoid showing them in public. "I guess that discipline upon himself is probably the thing that holds him back." Cheney, he added, is virtually immune to public criticism and image problems: "I don't think he really cares."

Former senator Alan K. Simpson, a fellow Wyoming Republican who hunts with Cheney, said the vice president decided when he was defense secretary during the Persian Gulf War that journalists ask "stupid questions" and distort things, and so he probably sees no need to publicly explain himself.

"Whatever he does, Dick will do it his own way, because whatever he does, it will be the subject of ridicule," Simpson said.

That disregard for public approval, though, can become a problem for the White House, according to veteran presidential aides from both parties. "When the vice president is immune to politics and tone-deaf to politics, as Vice President Cheney has shown himself to be at various stages along the way, then his perspective on this kind of situation isn't as sharp," said Ronald A. Klain, chief of staff to Vice President Al Gore.

Despite a string of political embarrassments linked to Cheney, including not finding weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, the indictment of the vice president's chief of staff in the CIA leak case and now the shooting, he remains a powerful force inside the White House.

A testament to his power is the deference Bush showed Cheney in the handling of last weekend's shooting episode. White House aides said Bush has not pressured Cheney to disclose more details about the shooting or to apologize.

One person close to both men said that Bush is the only person in the White House who could persuade Cheney to change strategy and that even high-level White House aides are reluctant to take on the vice president's office. That left White House press secretary Scott McClellan to be battered by reporters on national television.

"This is one of the challenges of having a high-profile, very powerful vice president inside the White House," said Klain, who added: "The disadvantage is when something negative happens involving the vice president, it is much harder for the White House staff to step in and exert control."

Typically, the relationships between vice presidents and White House staffs are fraught with politics and personal ambitions because nearly every modern vice president has used the position as a launching pad for his own campaign for the top job. With Cheney, Republicans have often boasted that no such dynamic would get in the way because he does not covet the presidency. Cheney has said he will never run for president.

Nonetheless, the relationship has become increasingly complicated. With no political future of his own at stake, Cheney seems indifferent to public perceptions of him. He prefers not to talk with reporters, favoring red-meat speeches before friendly audiences such as last week's Conservative Political Action Committee gathering or call-in chats to conservative radio hosts such as Rush Limbaugh, Laura Ingraham and Sean Hannity.

His approval rating dropped to an all-time low of 36 percent in November, according to a CNN-USA Today-Gallup poll, before rebounding to 41 percent last month. Although White House officials disagree, some outside Republicans wonder whether he has lost influence because his aggressive promotion of the Iraq war led to the CIA leak case and the indictment of his chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who resigned after being charged.

Mary Matalin, a Cheney adviser who has helped him deal with the shooting fallout, rejected suggestions that the White House's handling of the incident might result in political damage. "We have a history replete with evidence to the contrary," she said. "Every time we've had predictions of monumental liability, it never occurred."

Cheney Victim Suffers Setback (BSUN)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis

The Baltimore Sun, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Harry M. Whittington, the 78-year-old hunter accidentally shot by Vice President Dick Cheney, was back in intensive care Tuesday after suffering a mild heart attack, as questions continued to swirl around the White House's handling of the incident.

Doctors treating Whittington said a shotgun pellet lodged in his chest had triggered what they described as a "silent heart attack." He was reported in stable condition at the Corpus Christi hospital where he has been treated since the shooting on Saturday.

Cheney, who as of Tuesday night had yet to comment publicly on the accident, was quoted in a statement from his office as saying that he had spoken with Whittington after learning of his condition and that "his thoughts and prayers" are with the Austin attorney.

Doctors who briefed reporters at an afternoon news conference outside Christus Spohn Hospital Corpus Christi- Memorial said Whittington did not experience chest pains or other classic symptoms of a heart attack. They said the pellet, which they had decided to leave in place rather than remove, had caused inflammation of the heart muscle that caused a temporary blockage of blood flow.

Dr. David Blanchard, chief of emergency medicine at the hospital, said doctors were "very, very optimistic" that Whittington would make a full recovery.

Still, the heart attack revealed that Cheney's misfire, first regarded as more embarrassing than life-threatening, had potentially put his victim's health in greater danger, after doctors and White House officials had initially described Whittington as cheerfully on the mend from minor injuries.

It also derailed a concerted White House effort to move past the hunting episode, which has tarnished Cheney's image and highlighted his penchant for secrecy, while thrusting Bush's top aides, including press secretary Scott McClellan, into a tug of war with the news media.

Cheney's office -- under blistering fire for failing to make a public announcement about the shooting -- reversed course and issued a detailed statement about his concern for Whittington.

It recounted a phone call Cheney made to Whittington after learning of his condition, in which the vice president wished him well "and asked if there was anything he needed." Cheney "said that he stood ready to assist," the statement said.

"Mr. Whittington's spirits were good, but obviously his situation deserves the careful monitoring that his doctors are providing," the release said

Doctors said Whittington was expected to remain in the hospital for a week for treatment and observation.

Doctors in Washington, whom Blanchard described as White House physicians, have been consulting with cardiologists at Christus Spohn. Blanchard said they had agreed that it would be in the elderly patient's best interests to treat him with "medical therapy," rather than surgery, "with all the attendant risks of anesthesia [and] the possibility of all other things that could happen."

Cheney learned of the change in Whittington's condition Tuesday morning and watched part of the televised hospital news conference, the statement from his office said. After the briefing, he placed a call to Whittington.

Even as the White House struggled for a second straight day to defend its handling of the shooting, McClellan continued to withhold details. He was informed of Whittington's heart troubles before his televised briefing and before the Corpus Christi news conference in which they were disclosed but did not mention the developments during the 27-minute exchange, which was dominated by questions about the hunting accident.

"You're welcome to continue to focus on these issues," McClellan told reporters. "I'm moving on."

McClellan later said he did not reveal the change in Whittington's condition because "it's not appropriate for me" to do so. "I'm not his doctor; that's for his doctor to talk about." He also said there were "privacy issues" preventing him from commenting.

As the focus turned to Whittington's health, new details continued to emerge about what took place on the 50,000-acre southeast Texas ranch where the accident occurred.

Katherine Armstrong, a lobbyist whose family owns the ranch, indicated in interviews that she and members of her family, not Cheney, had decided it was necessary to inform the public about the incident.

After making that decision over breakfast Sunday morning, she and her mother, Anne Armstrong, a former top Republican official, "ran it by" Cheney, Katherine Armstrong told The Dallas Morning News. She added that Cheney "said something along the lines of, 'You all do whatever you are comfortable with.'"

Katherine Armstrong has lobbied the Bush administration on agriculture issues and lobbied the White House last year on South Korean policy on behalf of South Korean clients, according to federal records. Other guests present for the hunting party included Pamela Willeford, the U.S. ambassador to Switzerland, and her husband George Willeford III, major donors to Bush.

The sheriff's office in Kenedy County, where the Armstrong Ranch is located, issued a news release about Saturday's incident saying that "there was no alcohol, or misconduct involved" and that "this department is fully satisfied that this was no more than a hunting accident."

Carlos Valdez, the district attorney who prosecutes criminal cases in Kenedy County, said he had yet to speak with sheriff's officials but is satisfied with what he knows of their investigation.

"I haven't seen anything that indicates a need for further investigation as of this point," Valdez said.

Valdez said his office is concerned about Whittington's well- being, and that if the man were to die, he would "ask the sheriff for a copy of his report and a copy of his investigation for us to review to see if any further action is necessary. That's the only thing different that we would do."

In Corpus Christi, doctors said they had performed a cardiac catheterization on Whittington, a procedure used to discover whether arteries around the heart are blocked and there has been damage to heart function.

Johns Hopkins University cardiologist Rick Lang said the patient probably has a good prognosis. This kind of problem usually resolves on its own within one or two weeks, he said.

Heart attacks that produce no outward symptoms are "fairly common," Lang said, accounting for up to 25 percent of all heart attacks, according to a recent study. These injuries are usually discovered after the heart attack, when an EKG reveals that the heart's pattern of electrical activity has changed.

Doctors were unsure precisely where the birdshot near Whittington's heart had lodged, Blanchard said.

Dr. Mandeep Mehra, chief of cardiology at the University of Maryland School of Medicine, said the pellet might have ended up in the pericardium, the heart's protective covering. If so, it could have inflamed the covering, and inflammation can spread to the heart's chambers.

"This can lead to rhythm disturbances," known as atrial fibrillations, he said. He said they usually subside within 48 hours.

Lang and Mehra agreed with Whittington's medical team that removing the pellet is probably not the best course.

"Trying to take it out is more usually hazardous than leaving it alone," Mehra said.

"We've seen this often," he added. "The treatment is often relatively conservative. The prognosis is generally pretty good."

Cheney's Missteps Turned Accident Into P.r. Disaster, Experts Say (KRT)

By Steven Thomma

Knight Ridder, February 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - Vice President Dick Cheney turned a tragic hunting accident into a public relations disaster by maintaining his business-as-usual approach to his life: that it's nobody's business.

His refusal to announce his involvement in the shooting irritated an already suspicious press corps and even prompted some Republicans to complain. And his failure to make a more public show of his regret over his friend's injury might have enhanced his image among many as an aloof and remote man, according to experts in political public relations and corporate crisis management.

DOJ_NMG_0015320

To weather the political storm now, some experts said Cheney should show more candor, perhaps by taking questions at a press conference. Yet at least one expert said that wouldn't help. Others advised patience, saying that the story and the uproar would fade if and when the victim, Texas attorney Harry Whittington, recovers.

"The temptation is to say there is a textbook way to handle this sort of thing. There isn't," said Peter Mirijanian, a corporate public relations consultant who specializes in crisis management and has worked for several Democrats in the past.

Most experts agreed, however, that Cheney should have announced the shooting Saturday evening when it occurred and that he should have issued a public statement of his concern for his friend's well-being.

"I am appalled by the whole handling of this," Marlin Fitzwater, who served the elder President Bush as White House press secretary, told Editor and Publisher magazine Tuesday.

He recalled that when the elder Bush once collapsed at the Camp David presidential retreat, "the statement was on the wires before the helicopter had left to take him to the hospital. I can't believe they didn't have a similar plan here. It is all Cheney; he is the key that has to start this."

Cheney is secretive to the point of defiance about his public and private life. He refused to say, for example, which energy industry representatives he met with when drafting the administration's proposed energy policy. He often doesn't release his schedule. His trip to Texas for the hunting trip wasn't announced.

"Their bunker mentality hurts them at a time like this," said Dan Gerstein, a Democratic public relations consultant. "Cheney should go out publicly and take responsibility. He should say, `There was no wrongdoing, but I made a mistake and I will do everything I can to help Whittington.' I haven't seen any expression directly from the vice president."

Cheney hasn't appeared publicly since the shooting. His office issued a statement Tuesday that didn't quote Cheney directly but said, "The vice president said that his thoughts and prayers are with Mr. Whittington and his family."

Mirijanian said he didn't expect Cheney to hold a press conference. " I don't think he'd be a great asset," he said. "It wouldn't help the situation."

He said Cheney had already decided that it's not necessary to "feed the media beast every day." If that makes the news media angry, so be it.

"The fact that the White House press corps is very hungry for information isn't necessarily a negative to the supporters of the president and vice president," Mirijanian said. "This White House is very good at triangulating the press. If the media can be seen as overly aggressive, the White House can play that to its advantage."

This White House has shown it can wait out a political storm. Mirijanian recalled the pressure last year for President Bush to meet with anti-war protester Cindy Sheehan outside his Texas ranch.

"They took a beating," he said. "And after a while, it subsided."

A veteran Republican public relations consultant, who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of alienating the White House, said Cheney erred first by not announcing the shooting, then by allowing it to be announced to a local Texas newspaper rather than to the national press.

"That fed a lot of mistrust that was already there. It raised the story to a level it might not otherwise have reached," the consultant said.

Then the White House erred by trying to ease the tension with humor early Tuesday. That was a mistake even before it was announced that Whittington had suffered a minor heart attack, the Republican said.

Now that the damage has been done, the consultant said, it's best for Cheney and the White House to ride it out.

"They're almost over it now. I don't know that they need to say much more about it now."

Analysis: Cheney Forced Onto Center Stage (AP-Y2)

By Tom Raum

AP2, February 14, 2006

At the start of the Bush presidency, Dick Cheney was viewed as the grown-up, the seasoned hand to guide an inexperienced president. Now, he's the center of controversy.

His accidental shooting of a hunting companion and the administration's fumbles in getting out the word underscore the secrecy and near independence under which the vice president operates — and it all sent the White House scrambling on Tuesday to find the right tone when the victim's condition took a turn for the worse.

After first defensively fielding questions on why disclosure of the Saturday shooting was delayed until the next day, Press Secretary Scott McClellan joked about the situation with reporters at his morning briefing. Later, he turned somber after doctors in Corpus Christi, Texas, said the Austin lawyer shot by Cheney — Henry Whittington, 78 — had suffered a minor heart attack after birdshot from Cheney's blast migrated to his heart.

"If you want to continue to spend time on that, that's fine," McClellan told reporters pressing him on the shooting incident. "We're moving on to the priorities of the American people. That's where our focus is."

The shooting presents a new problem for the White House as it seeks to repair damaged credibility in a midterm election year in which continued GOP control of Congress hangs in the balance.

Cheney, 65, whose "favorable" rating was just 24 percent in a recent CBS-New York Times poll, has found himself in other storms swirling around the Bush presidency.

His strong insistence that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction helped build the case for the U.S. invasion of Iraq. He also has played the role of point man in the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping program in the war on terror.

And, more recently, his indicted former chief of staff — I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby — testified to a grand jury about being authorized to disclose classified information to the press in the CIA leak case "by his superiors," according to court documents. Democrats have demanded to know whether Cheney was one of those superiors.

"These things become symptoms of a broader disquiet with Cheney," said Paul C. Light, professor of public service at New York University.

Among moderate and liberal Americans, "there is such an anger toward Cheney," Light said. "There are people who believed he pulled the trigger figuratively on a lot of things. Vice presidents can get away with hitting people with golf balls, but they can't get away with shooting people with shotguns."

Questions linger over why so much time passed before Saturday's shooting was made public and before Cheney and members of his party were interviewed by local law enforcement.

Cheney himself has uttered no words publicly about the mishap, avoiding reporters during a visit to Capitol Hill on Tuesday for meetings with lawmakers. His office issued a terse, unsigned statement describing Whittington's condition and saying that Cheney had phoned him from the White House.

Whittington's "spirits were good, but obviously his situation deserves the careful monitoring that his doctors are providing," the statement said.

Unlike the president, who is accompanied by a news media pool whenever he travels in public, Cheney repeatedly makes unannounced trips around town and around the country — as he did with his weekend hunting excursion in south Texas, and again on his trip to the Capitol on Tuesday.

Cheney remains popular with the GOP conservative base. Ed Goeas, a Republican pollster and strategist, said that all vice presidents have to overcome the fact that "you never get the benefit of the doubt for the good things you do, and never any lack of blame for the bad things."

He said he expects the controversy to pass, especially if Whittington makes a full recovery.

If the shooting victim's condition worsens, that could increase the seriousness of the incident, and bring more scrutiny to bear on what exactly happened on the private Texas ranch.

"But if somehow the president considers Cheney gets to be a liability, I think that getting rid of him or encouraging him to step down would cause problems for the Republicans with their base," said Ross Baker, a Rutgers University political scientist.

"And Cheney is like a member of the Bush family. The president would no sooner push Cheney overboard than he would Jeb," Baker said, referring to Bush brother Jeb Bush, the governor of Florida.

Pellet Near Heart Could Do More Damage (USAT)

By Steve Sternberg

USA Today, February 15, 2006

The greatest risk facing Harry Whittington, 78, the lawyer shot by Vice President Cheney in a hunting accident, is that a shotgun pellet lodged near his heart could travel elsewhere and cause more damage, doctors said Tuesday.

The pellet apparently migrated to Whittington's heart, causing heart rhythm disturbances and the muscle damage that signals a “silent” heart attack, David Blanchard, emergency room director at Christus Spohn Hospital Corpus Christi-Memorial in Corpus Christi, Texas, told reporters Tuesday in a briefing.

“We knew that he had some birdshot very close to the heart from the get-go,” he said. “There's always the risk they can move.”

Doctors said it would be riskier to remove the pellet, causing more damage, than to leave it in place in the hope that the body will safely wall it off with scar tissue.

Blanchard said Cheney's shotgun blast peppered Whittington's face, neck and chest with anywhere from a few to 200 pellets, each one less than a tenth of an inch in diameter. Because pellets are small, their location is hard to pinpoint.

DOJ_NMG_0015322

"We feel at this point very strongly that all of the other birdshot that is within him are not problematic," he said. "It's this one that we're worried about."

Heart surgeon Mehmet Oz of Columbia University's New York Presbyterian Hospital, agreed: "The fact that it moved is concerning," because it could move again, this time to the brain or elsewhere.

Shotgun wounds are different from wounds caused by handguns or rifles. Unless the shotgun is fired at close range, the lower-velocity pellets pack less destructive power than bullets. "They go in a wide area, usually in a spray pattern, and they don't cause serious problems," said Dan Sleeman, a trauma surgeon at Jackson Memorial Medical Center in Miami. "We don't really chase pellets."

Infection is a risk in any kind of gunshot wound, because projectiles carry dirt into a wound. Blanchard said Whittington is being treated with antibiotics.

In this case, Oz said, birdshot most likely pierced the pericardium, the protective sac that surrounds the heart, and may have lodged in the heart-muscle wall.

An injury to the pericardium could inflame the heart, leading to an erratic heartbeat, Oz said. If birdshot entered the heart's wall, he said, the damage would release enzymes that signal a heart attack.

Doctors sent Whittingon for cardiac catheterization to detect blocked or leaky arteries. Doctors threaded a thin tube from Whittington's groin up into the arteries near his heart. They injected a dye, so they could monitor his blood flow patterns. The tests disclosed that his arteries are healthy, Blanchard said.

"Of course, the individual in question has been under stress," says Mandeep Mehra, director of cardiology at the University of Maryland. "And of course, stress alone can cause a heart attack."

Fellow Hunter Shot By Cheney Suffers Setback (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller And Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 — The 78-year-old lawyer shot by Vice President Dick Cheney in a hunting accident over the weekend suffered a minor heart attack early Tuesday caused by birdshot lodged in his heart, hospital officials in Texas said.

The lawyer, Harry M. Whittington, was moved back into the intensive care unit at Christus Spohn Hospital in Corpus Christi, Tex., to be monitored for up to a week in case the birdshot shifted or additional pellets in his body moved into other organs, the officials said at a televised news conference. Dr. David Blanchard, the emergency room chief, estimated that Mr. Whittington had more than 5 but "probably less than 150 to 200" pellets lodged in his body.

Dr. Blanchard said that the hospital's cardiologists were optimistic that the metallic pellet in Mr. Whittington's heart would not travel farther and that he would be able to function normally. They said they did not consider the other pellets in his body problematic, and they currently have no plans to remove them.

Mr. Cheney's office, in its first official announcement about the incident, released a statement shortly after 2:30 p.m. Eastern time saying that the vice president's "thoughts and prayers are with Mr. Whittington and his family" and that Mr. Cheney had spoken by telephone to Mr. Whittington an hour earlier.

"The vice president wished Mr. Whittington well and asked if there was anything he needed," the statement said. "The vice president said that he stood ready to assist."

The statement added that Mr. Whittington's spirits were "good," but "obviously his situation deserves the careful monitoring that his doctors are providing."

The downturn in Mr. Whittington's health significantly changed the tone of the White House reaction to the hunting accident. In Texas, Carlos Valdez, the district attorney in Kleberg County, said a fatality would immediately spur a new report from the local sheriff and, most likely, a grand jury investigation.

At the White House, Scott McClellan, the president's spokesman, began his day unaware of Mr. Whittington's heart attack. After being battered by reporters on Monday for the delay in the White House's providing information about the accident, Mr. McClellan opened his first briefing on Tuesday making light of the incident, as the late-night comics had done.

Mr. McClellan joked that the Texas Longhorns, the N.C.A.A. football champions who were at the White House to meet with the president, would be in their team color, orange, and "the orange that they're wearing is not because they're concerned that the vice president will be there."

Continuing the play on orange, the color hunters wear as a safety precaution to avoid being shot, Mr. McClellan held up his own orange and gray tie. "That's why I'm wearing it," he said, to laughter.

But by the time of Mr. McClellan's noon briefing, when the press secretary was aware of Mr. Whittington's downturn but did not disclose it to reporters, his tone was serious, even as he was at times impatient with the persistent questions about the shooting. "If you want to continue to spend time on that, that's fine," Mr. McClellan said. "We're moving on to the priorities of the American people."

Mr. Cheney's aides said he first learned of the change in Mr. Whittington's condition when he arrived at his West Wing office about 7:40 a.m. Tuesday, shortly after doctors in Corpus Christi said that they had picked up an irregular heartbeat from Mr. Whittington on their morning rounds.

Doctors said that the pellet, which they had known since the accident was near Mr. Whittington's heart, had evidently moved into the heart muscle, causing "some quivering" called atrial fibrillation. Mr. Whittington, who was shot by Mr. Cheney on Saturday and moved out of intensive care on Monday, was immediately put back into intensive care.

Mr. Cheney was told, his statement said, that Mr. Whittington would need a cardiac catheterization to determine the condition of his heart. The procedure was performed about 10 a.m. Eastern time. The vice president then continued his schedule for the day, but changed his plans when his chief of staff informed him during a Capitol Hill national security briefing that Mr. Whittington's doctors were about to hold a televised news conference.

Senator Trent Lott, who had teased the vice president about the accident during the briefing, said Mr. Cheney immediately returned to the White House to watch the news conference. "He didn't look like he was having a whole lot of fun," said Mr. Lott, Republican of Mississippi.

Local officials have not considered any charges in the shooting because no one in the hunting party, including the victim, has accused Mr. Cheney of wrongdoing.

"Everybody that I've heard so far has said it was an accident," said Mr. Valdez, who holds an elected position and is a Democrat. "The victim probably told the sheriff's department it was an accident."

Mr. Valdez added, "Now, if the worst happens and the man happens to die, we would take an additional step."

Under the law, even an accidental hunting fatality can result in criminal charges. Mr. Cheney could be charged with negligence, defined as failing to understand the dangers involved and disregarding them, or recklessness, defined as understanding the dangers and disregarding them.

After some initial confusion about what steps the local police had taken to investigate the shooting on Saturday, Secret Service officials said on Tuesday that they had offered to make the vice president available for an interview as quickly as possible but that the local sheriff had agreed to wait until Sunday.

Eric Zahren, a Secret Service spokesman, said the shooting occurred at 5:50 p.m. Central time, slightly later than the White House had said at first. After helping Mr. Whittington into an ambulance, the agents in Mr. Cheney's security detail returned to their command post on the hunting ranch by 6:30 p.m. The Secret Service supervisor in McAllen, Tex., had called the sheriff in Kenedy County to tell him about the shooting by 7 p.m., Mr. Zahren said.

The Secret Service supervisor arranged with the sheriff for Mr. Cheney to be interviewed at the ranch at 10 a.m. Sunday, Mr. Zahren said. But the vice president's office changed the time to 8 a.m.

While there were reports, some from the sheriff himself, that a deputy had been dispatched to the ranch on Saturday night and been turned away, Mr. Zahren said that some local police officers had heard about the shooting on a scanner when an ambulance was sent to pick up Mr. Whittington. They showed up at the ranch unsolicited. Private guards, not Secret Service agents, Mr. Zahren said, turned the police away because they did not know anything had occurred.

The White House first learned of the shooting, Mr. McClellan said Tuesday, when someone from the vice president's party called the Situation Room shortly after the accident occurred. But whoever called — Mr. McClellan would not identify the person — said only that there had been a hunting accident involving the vice president, not that Mr. Cheney had himself shot Mr. Whittington.

The Situation Room staff then passed that information to Andrew H. Card Jr., the White House chief of staff, who contacted President Bush. Mr. Card also called Karl Rove, the deputy chief of staff, who called one of the ranch's owners, Katharine Armstrong. Ms. Armstrong told Mr. Rove that the vice president had shot Mr. Whittington, and Mr. Rove then called Mr. Bush about 8 p.m. Eastern time with that news.

Victim Suffers Heart Ailment; Shotgun Pellet Cited As Cause (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno And David Brown

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

CORPUS CHRISTI, Tex., Feb. 14 -- The Austin lawyer accidentally shot by Vice President Cheney during a weekend quail hunt developed an abnormal heart rhythm Tuesday after a piece of birdshot in his chest moved, sending him back to intensive care.

The rhythm, which was not considered life-threatening, required a cardiac catheterization and will keep Harry Whittington, 78, in the hospital for a week, but hospital officials said he was alert and stable and will recover.

"He will have the full life that the Lord intended him to have," said David Blanchard, medical director of emergency room services at Christus Spohn Memorial Hospital.

The worsening of Whittington's condition came as law enforcement authorities offered new details about the shooting, which occurred late Saturday afternoon at the private 50,000-acre Armstrong Ranch but was not made public until Sunday.

In an interview, Kenedy County Sheriff Ramon Salinas III said Charles Kirk, one of his captains, informed him of an "accidental shooting" about 5:30 p.m. Central time Saturday. Kirk told him that he had been summoned to the ranch to escort an ambulance to a hospital in nearby Kingsville.

About 10 minutes later, Salinas said, a Secret Service agent traveling with Cheney called him on his cell phone to say there had been a hunting accident involving the vice president; he did not name the victim.

When Kirk arrived at the ranch, the ambulance had already left. He called the sheriff to tell him that it had departed and that a federal Border Patrol agent, guarding the gate because Cheney was there, knew nothing about the accident.

Salinas said he called a worker he knew lived on the ranch and asked him for information. The ranch hand, a former county sheriff, called back and described the incident as a hunting accident. Salinas said he decided to send an investigator in the morning because he knew the victim was being hospitalized and he felt assured that it was an accident. Within minutes, the Secret Service agent who had called him called back and asked him to send an investigator at 8 a.m. Central time Sunday.

Chief Deputy Gilbert San Miguel Jr. was dispatched the next morning and spoke to Cheney and other members of the hunting party. Cheney "just explained to me what happened," he said, adding that the vice president characterized the incident as a "hunting accident."

San Miguel would not disclose any other details from the interview.

"After what [Cheney] told us, we concluded it was an accident," Salinas said. "All [San Miguel] had left to do was talk to the victim." San Miguel and another sheriff's deputy spoke to Whittington in the hospital Monday morning.

"He did inform me this was an accident," said San Miguel, who also declined to provide details from that interview.

"Once the victim told him it was an accident, what else do you do?" Salinas said. He said that written reports of the incident will be completed in several days and that they will then be made public.

Salinas and San Miguel said they went to the site of the shooting. They said Whittington had been standing in the bed of a dried pond, several feet downhill from where Cheney and another hunter, Pamela Pitzer Willeford, the U.S. ambassador to Switzerland and Liechtenstein, were standing as they were shooting quail. "He was standing in a low-lying area, and they were out in front on higher ground," Salinas said. The vehicle carrying two other members of the hunting party "was directly behind the vice president and everybody else, from what we were told."

With the wind gusting and the sun setting behind where Whittington was walking, it could have been hard to see and hear him, Salinas said.

The lawyer's heart condition Tuesday led Blanchard and hospital Administrator Peter Banko to say Whittington had suffered a "mild heart attack." However, their description of events does not fit that of a heart attack as that term is generally used.

Blanchard said a single shotgun pellet that was lodged in Whittington's chest had moved and had come into contact with the surface of his heart. Inflammation of the heart muscle disturbed the electrical circuitry between the upper and lower heart chambers, triggering atrial fibrillation.

That condition affects 2.3 million Americans and is most common in the elderly. It causes an irregular heartbeat that is often faster than normal and frequently produces a feeling of breathlessness, though Blanchard said Whittington reportedly had no symptoms.

Physicians prescribe drugs to slow the heart rate and blood thinners to prevent clots from forming in the atria or upper chambers of the heart. Often, a normal rhythm returns spontaneously. If it does not, physicians can try various maneuvers, including electrical shock.

Although the condition is rare, there are many cases of people surviving after objects penetrate their hearts or move there from elsewhere in the body.

A case reported in the British journal Heart in 1992 described a 68-year-old man who had a fainting spell because of an abnormal heart rhythm. An X-ray showed a rifle slug in the chamber of his right ventricle. The man had fought on the Russian front in World War II and had been wounded five times, the last in the left side of his neck below the jaw. The bullet, according to the journal, had not been removed and, 48 years later, it had traveled to his heart.

In 1997, Swedish physicians described a 45-year-old woman who woke up with fatigue and atrial fibrillation. An X-ray revealed an inch-long metal pin in her right ventricle. It had been used to wire together a bone in her left hand 31 months earlier. Chest surgeons removed it.

DOJ_NMG_0015325

Three years ago, a team of Indian physicians reported the case of a 30-year-old man with multiple shotgun-pellet injuries. While he was being prepared for eye surgery, an electrocardiogram revealed a heart attack that had caused him no symptoms. A single pellet was found blocking the downstream end of his right coronary artery.

Cheney Victim Suffers Heart Attack (REU-Y2)

By Jeff Franks

Reuters, February 14, 2006

The Texas lawyer accidentally shot by U.S. Vice President Dick Cheney during a weekend quail hunt suffered a minor heart attack on Tuesday when some of the birdshot still in his body lodged near his heart, a hospital spokesman said.

Harry Whittington, 78, was moved into intensive care and ordered to stay in the Corpus Christi, Texas, hospital for at least another seven days to monitor his condition, said Christus Spohn Memorial Hospital spokesman Peter Banko.

The news suddenly gave a serious edge to the incident that the White House had begun making light of on Tuesday after tense exchanges with the press the day before over failure to disclose the shooting for almost a full day.

Dr. David Blanchard, the hospital's emergency room chief, said at a news conference doctors noted an irregular heartbeat during a morning examination of Whittington and it was determined he was having a minor heart attack.

He was moved into the hospital's intensive care unit and underwent cardiac catheterization for his quivering heart.

"We picked up an irregular heartbeat. At no time did he have any chest pain, the classic signs of a heart attack or anything like that," Blanchard said.

Whittington, a Republican stalwart in Texas, was peppered by an estimated 200 pellets on Saturday when the shotgun-wielding Cheney whirled to shoot a covey of quail on a southern Texas ranch and hit Whittington instead.

Cheney spoke to him by telephone from Washington on Tuesday after watching a televised hospital news conference on Whittington's health setback.

"The vice president wished Mr. Whittington well and asked if there was anything he needed," Cheney's office said in a statement. Cheney has not spoken publicly about the incident.

Doctors and officials had assured the press that Whittington suffered only minor wounds, but Blanchard said on Tuesday, "We knew he had some birdshot very near to the heart from the get-go."

At least one of those pellets had gotten close enough to the heart to cause "irritability," which led to Tuesday's heart attack, he said.

Blanchard said doctors would have to keep a close eye on the birdshot in case it continues to move.

Trauma surgeon Soumitra Eachempati at New York Presbyterian Hospital/Weil Cornell Medical Center said the moving pellet could require an operation.

"Since the pellet just moved into the heart area, it might be necessary to do open heart surgery," he said.

CONTROVERSY OVER DISCLOSURE

The story blew up into a major controversy because news of the shooting only came out on Sunday, nearly 24 hours after it occurred, when ranch owner Katharine Armstrong, also a Republican stalwart and lobbyist, called the Corpus Christi Caller-Times to report it.

Neither the White House nor Cheney's staff disclosed the accident, saying the primary concern had been making sure Whittington received proper care.

After the shooting, he was immediately treated by emergency personnel with Cheney and eventually flown by helicopter to the Corpus Christi hospital. The vice president did not accompany him.

Before news of Whittington's setback, White House spokesman Scott McClellan opened a Tuesday briefing with a one-liner about the Cheney mishap when he previewed a White House appearance later in the day by the orange-jerseyed University of Texas football team.

Hunters often wear orange vests so they will be visible to other hunters.

"The orange that they're wearing is not because they're concerned that the vice president may be there -- although that's why I'm wearing it," joked McClellan, who was wearing an orange necktie.

He did not repeat the joke at a later televised briefing, nor did he disclose information he knew of Whittington's new health problems.

The sheriff's department in Kenedy County, where the 50,000 acre Armstrong ranch is located, said on Monday it had found no misconduct in the incident.

Hunter Shot By Cheney Has Heart Attack (AP-Y2)

The 78-year-old lawyer wounded by Vice President Dick Cheney in a hunting accident suffered a mild heart attack Tuesday after a shotgun pellet in his chest traveled to his heart, hospital officials said.

Harry Whittington was immediately moved back to the intensive care unit and will be watched for a week to make sure more of the metal pellets do not reach other vital organs. He was reported in stable condition.

Whittington suffered a "silent heart attack" — obstructed blood flow, but without the classic heart-attack symptoms of pain and pressure, according to doctors at Christus Spohn Hospital Corpus Christi-Memorial.

The doctors said they decided to treat the situation conservatively and leave the pellet alone rather than operate to remove it. They said they are highly optimistic Whittington will recover and live a healthy life with the pellet in him.

Asked whether the pellet could move farther into his heart and become fatal, hospital officials said that was a hypothetical question they could not answer.

Hospital officials said they were not concerned about the six to 200 other pieces of birdshot that might still be lodged in Whittington's body. Cheney was using 7 1/2 shot from a 28-gauge shotgun. Shotgun pellets are typically made of steel or lead; the pellets in 7 1/2 shot are just under a tenth of an inch in diameter.

Cheney watched the news conference where doctors described Whittington's complications. Then the vice president called him, wished him well and asked if there was anything that he needed.

"The vice president said that he stood ready to assist. Mr. Whittington's spirits were good, but obviously his situation deserves the careful monitoring that his doctors are providing," the vice president's office said in a statement.

Cheney, an experienced hunter, has not spoken publicly about the accident, which took place Saturday night while the vice president was aiming for a quail. Critics of the Bush administration called for more answers from the Cheney himself.

Whittington has said through hospital officials that he does not want to comment on the shooting. A young man at Whittington's Austin home who identified himself as his grandson said Tuesday he did not have time to talk to a reporter and closed the door.

The furor over the accident and the White House delay in making it public are "part of the secretive nature of this administration," said Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada. "I think it's time the American people heard from the vice president."

Before hospital officials announced details of Whittington's condition, the hunting accident had produced a raft of Cheney jokes on late-night television.

"I think Cheney is starting to lose it," Jay Leno said. "After he shot the guy he screamed, `Anyone else want to call domestic wiretapping illegal?!'"

On Tuesday morning, the White House spokesman briefly joined in the merriment, joking that the orange school colors of the visiting University of Texas championship football team should not be mistaken for hunters' safety gear.

"The orange that they're wearing is not because they're concerned that the vice president may be there," press secretary Scott McClellan said. "That's why I'm wearing it."

Hospital officials said they knew that Whittington had some birdshot near his heart and that there was a chance it could move closer since scar tissue had not had time to harden and hold the pellet in place.

After Whittington developed an irregular heartbeat, doctors performed a cardiac catheterization, in which a thin, flexible tube is inserted into the heart, to diagnose his condition, said Peter Banko, the administrator at the hospital.

The shot was either touching or embedded in the heart muscle near the top chambers, called the atria, officials said. Two things resulted:

_It caused inflammation that pushed on the heart in a way to temporarily block blood flow, what the doctors called a "silent heart attack." This is not a traditional heart attack where an artery is blocked. They said Whittington's arteries, in fact, were healthy.

_It irritated the atria, caused an irregular heartbeat known as atrial fibrillation, which is not immediately life-threatening. But it must be treated because it can spur blood clots to form. Most cases can be corrected with medication.

White House physicians helped advise on the course of treatment, hospital officials said.

Texas officials said the shooting was an accident and no charges were brought against the vice president.

A Texas Parks and Wildlife Department report issued Monday said Whittington was retrieving a downed bird and stepped out of the hunting line he was sharing with Cheney. "Another covey was flushed and Cheney swung on a bird and fired, striking Whittington in the face, neck and chest at approximately 30 yards," the report said.

Hunter Shot By Cheney Suffers Heart Attack, Remains At Risk (KRT)

Knight Ridder, February 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - Vice President Dick Cheney's hunting incident took on a more serious edge Tuesday when the shooting victim suffered a heart attack caused by Cheney's errant birdshot.

Doctors said Austin, Texas, lawyer Harry Whittington, 78, remained at risk from a pellet embedded in his heart muscle. The birdshot triggered a mild heart attack and forced Whittington to undergo a cardiac catheterization. The procedure is typically used to look for arterial blockages or other problems.

"Some of the birdshot appears to have moved and lodged into part of his heart in what we would say is a minor heart attack," said Peter Banko, the administrator of Christus Spohn Hospital Corpus Christi-Memorial, at a news conference. David Blanchard, the hospital's chief of emergency care, said Whittington suffered "a silent heart attack" that lacked many of the typical symptoms.

Cheney is unlikely to face any criminal charges because law enforcement officials have found no evidence of wrongdoing, experts on Texas hunting laws said.

"It's a straight-forward accident. The facts are not going to change," said Tom Harvey, a spokesman for the Texas Parks and Wildlife Department. "There's not going to be criminal wrongdoing."

According to witnesses, Cheney accidentally shot Whittington in the face, neck and chest on Saturday after the Austin lawyer strayed from the vice president's group during a quail hunt at a South Texas ranch. By their testimony, Cheney failed to honor the first rule of hunting, as posted by the National Rifle Association and other pro-hunting groups: Be sure of your target and that you can fire safely into the area beyond it before you pull the trigger.

Cheney, who has his own history of heart trouble, called Whittington Tuesday at his hospital room in Corpus Christi, Texas, to offer his best wishes, according to a statement issued by the vice president's office.

"Mr. Whittington's spirits were good," the statement added, "but obviously his situation deserves the careful monitoring his doctors are providing."

Whittington's health setback was the latest twist in an incident that has drawn reactions ranging from laughter to anger. The chuckling that peaked on late-night talk shows Monday was echoed by the White House Tuesday morning before word of Whittington's condition snuffed out the laughter.

Before he was aware that Whittington's condition had worsened, White House spokesman Scott McClellan took note that the national champion University of Texas football team would be visiting President Bush later Tuesday, and he attempted some shooting-related humor.

Observing that the team colors are burnt orange and white, he said, "The orange that they're wearing is not because they're concerned that the vice president may be there."

Later, McClellan sparred for a second straight day with journalists frustrated that the public had been kept in the dark about the shooting for almost a day.

The incident happened shortly before 5 p.m. Saturday EST, but the first public acknowledgment came about 18 hours later - and only then because Katharine Armstrong, Cheney's host in Texas, thought she should call the local paper, the Corpus Christi Caller-Times. The story broke nationally about 3:45 p.m. EST on Sunday after the local paper posted it on its Web site.

After initially expressing sympathy with media complaints about the slow notification, McClellan on Tuesday belittled questions about the shooting.

"If you want to continue to spend time on that, that's fine," he told reporters who pressed him to explain the delay. "We're moving on to the priorities of the American people."

Before Whittington's setback Tuesday, late-night TV comedians had a field day with the shooting incident Monday night.

"I think Dick Cheney is starting to lose it," Jay Leno said on NBC. "After he shot the guy, he screamed, `Anyone else want to call domestic wiretapping illegal?'"

Man Shot By Cheney Suffers Heart Irregularity (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi And James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 2006

CORPUS CHRISTI, Texas — The man shot by Vice President Dick Cheney experienced a heart irregularity after birdshot moved into his heart muscle and will remain hospitalized for another week, doctors reported today.

A pellet from Cheney's gun migrated near the heart, and caused "irritability to the heart muscle," said Dr. David Blanchard, who is treating the man.

DOJ_NMG_0015328

Blanchard said the result is that the heart "is beating irregularly. It's basically like a short circuit."

The doctor referred to the victim, 78-year-old lawyer Harry Whittington, as having "a silent, or minor heart attack."

Blanchard said the patient has a strong heart and is doing well.

A hospital spokesman said the chances that "one problematic birdshot" would migrate as it has toward Whittington's heart are "one in 99.99."

Cheney was attending an intelligence briefing on Capitol Hill today when he received news of Whittington's heart attack. He returned quickly to the White House, canceling plans to lunch with Republican senators.

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), who attended the intelligence briefing, said he joked with Cheney about the hunting accident before the vice president learned the victim had taken a turn for the worse.

Cheney laughed "a little" at the joke, Lott said, declining to repeat his witticism. "He didn't look like he was having a whole lot of fun with it. Obviously, he feels badly" about the incident.

Lott said he has been quail hunting with Cheney and the vice president is "a good shot." The senator said watching the vice president shoot a 28-gauge shotgun convinced him to buy a similar one.

"I went hunting with him and he never shot me," Lott joked, before adding on a more serious note: "He's a great shot. He's a very good sportsman. He dresses the part. He wears the proper clothes. He's very careful about getting in the proper line. I feel very comfortable hunting with him. I'm a lot more dangerous than he is."

Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), who was once on the receiving end of a vice presidential obscenity on the floor of the Senate, quipped: "In retrospect, it looks like I got off easy."

The accident occurred on a ranch Saturday when the vice president wheeled to shoot at a covey of quail and accidentally sprayed Whittington with shotgun pellets, authorities said.

"This was a hunting accident," said Gilbert San Miguel, chief deputy of the Kenedy County Sheriff's Office. "There was no alcohol or misconduct."

But the incident has reverberated worldwide: "Cheney Bags a Lawyer" was the headline in the Herald of Glasgow, Scotland.

And it has forced a White House already under fire for secrecy to explain why it made no mention of the shooting until the ranch owner disclosed it to a local newspaper, 18 hours after the incident.

White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan said Monday that the "first priority was making sure that Harry Whittington was getting the medical care that he needed. And I think that's where everybody's attention should have been focused, and was focused, when the hunting accident took place."

Still, McClellan deflected the blame away from the vice president, noting that Whittington left the hunt line to retrieve a downed quail and was approaching Cheney from behind.

"The protocol was not followed by Mr. Whittington when it came to notifying the others that he was there," McClellan said. "And so, you know, unfortunately these type of hunting accidents happen from time to time."

But hunting experts said that although Whittington should have made his location clear, the vice president should have been keeping track of his companions.

"You're hunting together. You need to know where everyone is," said Lawrence G. Keane, general counsel of the National Shooting Sports Foundation.

Jeff Hart, an Austin lawyer who hunts quail in Texas, said: "If you pull the trigger, you're responsible for it, no matter what In hunting, the shooter is responsible for knowing where the shot is going. That's the bottom line."

Cheney — known for having testy relations with the media — on Monday came under criticism from Democrats and Republicans who said the White House should have disclosed the incident immediately.

"It's news, and it reflects an attitude in this White House of holding back information, of being too clever by half and being secretive," columnist Robert Novak said on Fox News.

"On the face of it, this looks like something the administration felt the public had no right to know," Joe Lockhart, who was President Clinton's press secretary, said in an interview. "I don't think there's going to be a bunch of people sitting around saying: 'I wonder why they waited to tell us.' But what they will be saying is: 'I wonder what else they're not telling us.'"

Whittington, a prominent Austin lawyer, and the vice president arrived for a weekend hunting trip Friday night at the 50,000-acre Armstrong Ranch, a well-known retreat for wealthy Texas Republicans 95 miles southwest of Corpus Christi.

The party of 11 hunters set out in two trucks Saturday morning, driving around the mesquite-dotted property and shooting quail until about 12:30 p.m., said Anne Armstrong, co-owner of the ranch. Then they broke for a lunch of antelope, jicama salad and camp bread, washed down with Dr. Pepper.

DOJ_NMG_0015329

After lunch, the group split up. Cheney, Whittington and Pamela Pitzer Willeford, U.S. ambassador to Switzerland, went with two of Armstrong's daughters and pursued quail for several more hours. It was at dusk that Whittington shot a bird and went to retrieve it, taking him behind the vice president.

The medical team that travels with Cheney immediately began ministering to Whittington, who was bleeding profusely from wounds to his face, neck and chest, witnesses said. They packed Whittington into Cheney's ambulance and drove him to a hospital.

The injuries did not appear to be life-threatening, Armstrong said, because the ambulance paused on the road for several minutes to allow Whittington's wife to join them.

After being stabilized at a hospital in Kingsville, Whittington was evacuated by helicopter to a larger facility in Corpus Christi — where he was placed in the intensive care unit. The Secret Service reported the shooting to the Kenedy County Sheriff's Office; no one from that agency interviewed Cheney until Sunday morning.

The Secret Service said it had turned away one sheriff's deputy at the ranch the night of the accident because arrangements had been made for Cheney to be interviewed the following morning, Associated Press said.

Armstrong said Cheney had spoken with her Saturday evening about disclosing the incident to the public. "We knew word would get out," she said. He urged her to tell friends and family first, before word leaked out to the media.

Late Sunday morning, her daughter, Katharine Armstrong, called a reporter from the Corpus Christi Caller-Times, which then reported the shooting on its website.

Peter Banko, administrator of Christos Spohn Memorial Hospital in Corpus Christi, where Whittington was recuperating, said the injured hunter was cracking jokes — and was baffled by all the publicity. "He's a true Southern gentleman," Banko said of Whittington at a Monday news conference. "He's really amazed, I think, at all the hoopla over this."

Whittington is a fixture in Texas politics, having worked in Republican campaigns dating to John G. Tower's senatorial run in the 1960s. He's known nowadays for a decades-long battle to prevent the city of Austin from building a parking garage over a downtown block that his family owns. The dispute is still being litigated.

The shooting has aroused sympathy for Cheney in South Texas, where many locals hunt and accept that there is always the risk of an accident. "If it happens every once in a while, we're not alarmed by it," Carlos Valdez, the local district attorney, said of nonfatal accidental shootings.

There were 30 hunting accidents last year in Texas, which issued 1.1 million hunting licenses.

"You can't name a sport where accidents don't happen," said Leroy Sisco, chief executive of the Texas Trophy Hunters Assn., who said he had been inadvertently sprayed by birdshot several times. "Everybody who hunts understands. It's just an accident and, thank God, it's not a serious accident."

White House Finds Humor In Hunting Mishap (AP-Y2)

By Nedra Pickler, Associated Press Writer

AP2, February 14, 2006

The White House has decided that the best way to deal with Vice President Dick Cheney's shooting accident is to joke about it.

President Bush's spokesman quipped Tuesday that the burnt orange school colors of the University of Texas championship football team that was visiting the White House shouldn't be confused for hunter's safety wear.

"The orange that they're wearing is not because they're concerned that the vice president may be there," joked White House press secretary Scott McClellan, following the lead of late-night television comedians. "That's why I'm wearing it."

The president's brother, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, took a similar jab after slapping an orange sticker on his chest from the Florida Farm Bureau that read, "No Farmers, No Food."

"I'm a little concerned that Dick Cheney is going to walk in," the governor cracked during an appearance in Tampa Monday.

Cheney, an experienced hunter, has not been joking or saying anything publicly at all about the accident Saturday, when he accidentally sprayed a hunting partner with shotgun pellets when aiming for a quail.

The Texas Parks and Wildlife Department issued a report Monday that found the main factor contributing to the accident was a "hunter's judgment factor." No other secondary factors were found to have played a role.

The department gave Cheney and the victim, prominent Republican attorney Harry Whittington, warning citations for breaking Texas hunting law by failing to buy a $7 stamp allowing them to shoot upland game birds. A department spokesman said warnings are being issued in most cases because the stamp requirement only went into effect five months ago and many hunters weren't aware of it.

Cheney's office said Monday night in a statement that Cheney had a $125 nonresident hunting license and has sent a $7 check to cover the cost of the stamp. "The staff asked for all permits needed, but was not informed of the $7 upland game bird stamp requirement," the statement said.

The state's report said Whittington was retrieving a downed bird and stepped out of the hunting line he was sharing with Cheney. "Another covey was flushed and Cheney swung on a bird and fired, striking Whittington in the face, neck and chest at approximately 30 yards," the report said.

Whittington, who had been in stable condition after being moved from intensive care, suffered "a minor heart attack" Tuesday morning, hospital officials said. He was immediately moved back to the intensive care unit for further treatment, said Peter Banko, the administrator at Christus Spohn Hospital Corpus Christi-Memorial in Texas.

Banko said there was an irregularity in the heartbeat caused by a pellet, and doctors performed a cardiac catheterization. Whittington expressed a desire to leave the hospital, but Banko said he would probably stay for another week to make sure more shot doesn't move to other organs or to other part of his body.

Katharine Armstrong, owner of the ranch where the shooting occurred, said it happened toward the end of the hunt, when it was still sunny but as darkness was encroaching and they were preparing to go inside. She said Whittington made a mistake by not announcing that he had walked up to rejoin the hunting line, and Cheney didn't see him as he tried to down a bird.

Armstrong said she saw Cheney's security detail running toward the scene. "The first thing that crossed my mind was he had a heart problem," she told The Associated Press.

She said Cheney stayed "close but cool" while the agents and medical personnel treated Whittington, then took him by ambulance to the hospital. Later, the hunting group sat down for dinner while Whittington was being treated, receiving updates from a family member at the hospital. Armstrong described Cheney's demeanor during dinner as "very worried" about Whittington.

Pamela Willeford, the U.S. ambassador to Switzerland, another member of the hunting party, told The Dallas Morning News for a story in Tuesday's editions that she and Cheney didn't realize Whittington had picked up a bird and caught up with them.

Willeford said she has hunted with Cheney before and would again.

"He's a great shot. He's very safety conscious. This is something that unfortunately was a bad accident and when you're with a group like that, he's safe or safer than all the rest of us," she said.

But the accident raised questions about Cheney's adherence to hunting safety practices and the White House's failure to disclose the accident in a timely way.

Several hunting safety experts interviewed agreed it would have been a good idea for Whittington to announce himself. But every expert stressed that the shooter is responsible for avoiding other people.

Bush was told about Cheney's involvement in the accident shortly before 8 p.m. Saturday — about an hour after it occurred — but the White House did not disclose the accident until Sunday afternoon, and then only in response to press questions.

Facing a press corps upset that news had been withheld, press secretary Scott McClellan said, "I think you can always look back at these issues and look at how to do a better job."

Orange Morning Gives Way To A Darker Afternoon (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

White House press secretary Scott McClellan was in fine fettle yesterday morning when he strode smiling into the briefing room and made a joke about Vice President Cheney's hunting accident.

President Bush, he announced, would be on the South Lawn to honor the national champion University of Texas Longhorns, whose football jerseys are burnt orange and white. "The orange they're wearing is not because they are concerned that the vice president will be there," the spokesman deadpanned.

The reporters, who had tormented a stone-faced McClellan about the episode on Monday, guffawed at his newfound levity. "Although," McClellan continued, pointing to his orange tie and eyeing the loaded-for-bear reporters, "that's why I'm wearing it."

But the stand-up routine ended abruptly when McClellan returned two hours later for the afternoon briefing. The joking spokesman had been replaced by flack in full scandal mode, informing the questioners that he would indulge the silliness no more and was, instead, pressing on with the people's business.

"If you all want to continue focus on this, you all can spend your time on it," he said icily. "We're going to keep focusing on the pressing priorities of the American people. . . . You're welcome to continue to focus on these issues. I'm moving on." Nine times the press secretary announced to the cameras that he was going ahead with the people's "priorities," regardless of what the feckless journalists were asking about.

Why the quick switch in tone? Unbeknownst to the reporters -- but well beknownst to McClellan -- the White House had been informed before the second briefing that the shooting victim, Harry Whittington, had suffered a heart attack and had undergone a cardiac procedure because a pellet from the vice presidential shotgun was in his heart. Suddenly, the White House had more than an embarrassment on its hands.

Even without knowledge of Whittington's setback, the journalists wouldn't play along. "This is our briefing; we get to ask the questions," David Sanger of the New York Times fired back. NBC's David Gregory lectured: "Don't tell us that you're giving us complete answers when you're not actually answering the questions."

McClellan dared the reporters to question him about the accident, informing them that "the American people want us to spend our time" on other matters. But even McClellan couldn't get the misfire out of his head. Asked about oil company royalties, he noted that "we limited and imposed triggers at the beginning of the administration to cut off relief." Triggers?

As the briefing proceeded, the spokesman became snippier. "It is what it is," he said of the shooting, "and I think it's time to move on for the American people." By the time ABC's Anne Compton rose with the last question, McClellan was suppressing a grin. "It's time to focus on the priorities of the American people," he said one final time. Then, departing for the Texas football event, he flashed the school's "Hook 'em, 'Horns" sign.

But as Bush and McClellan went to greet the Longhorns, Whittington's doctor was heading to the microphones in Corpus Christi, Tex., to deliver the bad news. It was open season on Cheney.

Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) joined in, remarking after lunch with his caucus that the matter "is part of the secretive nature of this administration" and that "they keep things pretty close to the chest." Aides said the thoracic pun was not intentional.

The vice presidential misfire revived all the old Cheney gossip. In the morning, NBC's Kelly O'Donnell wondered if she should interpret the lack of a phone call between Bush and Cheney on the day of the accident as a sign of a "strain in the relationship."

"No," McClellan said with a forced laugh, "you shouldn't."

Proposed Ken Herman of Cox News: "Why don't they go hunting together?"

Other questioners wondered if the episode was evidence that Cheney could not be reined in by Bush or that Cheney had other dark secrets. The New York Post's Deborah Orin asked what had happened to "personal responsibility," and why Cheney couldn't just say "I made a mistake."

"He has commented through his spokeswoman," McClellan offered.

"But why haven't we heard from him?" demanded CBS's Bill Plante.

"I don't think he had any public events scheduled," McClellan replied.

"He could schedule one," Plante persisted. "It would be easy. If he wanted to come over here, you'd probably let him. We would turn up."

McClellan was done taking advice. "Okay, then you can start running the vice president's office, Bill." Plante declined the offer, and Cheney stayed out of sight.

After news of Whittington's heart attack, Cheney's office issued a statement -- in the third person -- saying: "The vice president said that his thoughts and prayers are with Mr. Whittington and his family."

Fallout From Cheney Incident Besets White House (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon And Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Vice President Dick Cheney's hunting incident became a bigger distraction for the White House when doctors said that the man he accidentally shot in Texas suffered a heart attack caused by a shotgun pellet.

The development isn't likely to put the vice president in any legal peril, and the local district attorney said late yesterday that he has seen nothing so far to indicate charges are warranted. But whether the incident causes lasting political damage may yet depend on how Mr. Cheney responds, and whether it appears to the public that the vice president is being treated differently from other hunters involved in accidental shootings.

Harry Whittington, the 78-year-old Austin lawyer hit by a blast from Mr. Cheney's shotgun Saturday, was in stable condition after being moved back into the intensive-care unit of a Corpus Christi hospital. Mr. Cheney watched doctors in Texas brief reporters on the case at about 1 p.m., and then called Mr. Whittington to wish him well, according to a statement from his office.

While the prospect of criminal charges against the vice president remained remote, the incident injected new drama into a story that has drawn attention around the nation.

Democrats stepped up their rhetoric, particularly over the White House's delay in making the incident public and the vice president's continued public silence. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid criticized the administration's secretive nature and said, "It's time the American people heard from the vice president."

Republicans privately expressed concern that the incident is distracting from President Bush's agenda just after he announced a number of initiatives in his State of the Union address.

In Texas, Carlos Valdez, the district attorney whose office would prosecute any suspected crimes, said that he has seen no indication of criminal wrongdoing. It would require recklessness or criminal negligence to file charges, and "I haven't heard anything like that in this, anything close to recklessness or criminal negligence," he said.

Prosecutors have latitude in such cases, legal experts said. In Mr. Valdez's office, "if all the witnesses agree that it was an accident...we let it go at that," absent evidence of recklessness or criminal negligence, the district attorney said. Mr. Valdez added that if Mr. Whittington were to die, it could trigger a grand jury investigation.

A state incident report said that "hunter's judgment" played a role in the shooting. The report says Mr. Cheney, who was carrying a 28-gauge shotgun, "swung on a bird and fired," but ended up "striking Whittington in the face, neck and chest." Most safety guidelines, including those published by the state of Texas, recommend that a hunter be aware of what is in front of and beyond the target before pulling the trigger. But witnesses also have pointed to Mr. Whittington's failure to announce his presence to the hunters.

If prosecutors decided to pursue a case, they likely would proceed under a law designed to deter elder abuse that penalizes negligent infliction of injury on an elderly person, said George Dix, a University of Texas law professor. But even that statute's relatively easy standard likely would be too high a bar, Mr. Dix said. "From my own experience in researching, it's just very hard to create liability for a hunting accident," he said.

Randy Wilson, an Abilene, Texas, lawyer who is president of the state's criminal defense lawyers association, said he believes prosecutors might be able to find a basis for charges -- for instance, a reckless-endangerment charge.

"Probably nothing will come of it," Mr. Wilson said. But if he were the prosecutor and had filed charges in similar cases in the past, he said he would do the same with the vice president.

In 2005, there were more than one million hunting licenses issued in Texas, and about 30 reported accidents involving a firearm or bow that resulted in injury or death. Of those accidents, two were fatal, the Texas Parks and Wildlife Department said

According to the Secret Service, the shooting occurred at approximately 5:50 p.m. local time on Saturday on the Armstrong ranch, and medical personnel and Secret Service agents on hand immediately treated Mr. Whittington. At about 6:20 p.m., Mr. Whittington was loaded into an ambulance and transferred to a local hospital. Between 6:50 and 7:00 p.m., the resident agent in charge of the Secret Service's office in McAllen, Texas -- who was on hand to help coordinate Mr. Cheney's visit -- "notified the local sheriff," Secret Service spokesman Tom Mazur said.

Worries are mounting among Republicans about Vice President Dick Cheney's hunting accident after his hunting partner has a heart attack caused by birdshot from the mishap.

Though news of Harry Whittington's heart attack quiets the flood of jokes about Cheney's misfire, it vexes party strategists who fear the accident will be a continuing distraction from the party's 2006 agenda. "It is drowning out all other news [and] has taken all the political energy out of the White House," says one longtime Bush ally. Another veteran operative worries that Americans will begin asking about whether average citizens involved in such mishaps might face legal trouble. "Let's just hope that Whittington is in as good of shape as they keep saying," adds a consultant to Republican House and Senate candidates.

Democrats said the incident has already come to symbolize administration stumbles, and is interfering with President Bush's attempt to recover from an unhappy 2005. "The accident couldn't have come at a worse time for the administration," said Democratic pollster Geoff Garin, asserting that belated public disclosure has added to "the broader impression that the whole administration plays by its own special rules."

Senior Bush advisers dismissed suggestions of political fallout. Cheney's accident matters politically, one said, "Only if he keeps hiding. I think [if] he just apologizes and tells the press to stop making a mountain out of a molehill … the thing is done." -- John Harwood

Squeeze Play: Treasury Secretary John Snow may be frustrated by President Bush's decision to abandon tax overhaul for this year, but he'll find himself in the middle of a spirited tax-policy debate in defending the administration's budget -- beginning Tuesday when he testifies before Senate Budget Committee.

Sec. Snow

Free-market conservatives, part of the political base Bush must rally to protect Republican majorities in midterm elections this fall, cherish the administration's plans for expanding Health Savings Accounts as a key element of the president's "ownership society" objective. Sen. Orrin Hatch (R., Utah), who chairs the health subcommittee of the Senate Finance panel, calls HSAs a step toward bringing America's archaic employer-based health system "into the new economy."

Democratic liberals, however, consider expanded HSAs a backdoor tax-break for the affluent. A study by ex-Kerry campaign adviser Jason Furman for the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities concludes that HSAs could be used as "a lucrative tax shelter for high-income families," yielding more than a 401(k) plan even if those families ultimately don't use the money for health care at all.

Political insiders in both parties consider HSAs the least likely of the president's major domestic initiatives to pass when budget provisions run the congressional gauntlet, beginning with today's Budget Committee sessions. --John Harwood * * *

Tougher Stance on China Trade: In a wide-ranging Bush administration appraisal of policy toward China, U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman is promising much tougher enforcement of trade laws, but is not asking Congress for expanded authority to sanction Beijing.

In a report released Tuesday, Portman voices concern about China's failure to curb the piracy of U.S. intellectual property and enforce international labor standards. Warning of a "corrosive effect on political support" in the U.S. for trade with China, Portman flags concern with Beijing's "unreported and extensive" industry subsidies, and a network of trade barriers that he says keep out U.S. exports and helped fuel a record U.S. trade deficit. That deficit reached $725.75 billion in 2005. For China alone, the deficit stood at $201.62 billion, up more than 20% from 2004, far and away the largest U.S. gap with any single country. --Greg Hitt And Murray Hiebert

Orange You Funny: Even the political class is taking shots at Vice President Dick Cheney after he accidentally sprayed a member of his hunting party with birdshot Saturday.

At a State Fair appearance Monday, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush took a bright orange sticker -- hunter orange -- advertising the Florida Farm Bureau's "No Farmers, No Food" campaign, and placed it on his chest. "I'm a little concerned that Dick Cheney is going to walk in," he told his audience.

On Tuesday, as the White House prepared for the arrival of the University of Texas Longhorns, the NCAA football champions, press secretary Scott McClellan joked about the team's orange and white colors: "The orange that they're wearing is not because they're concerned that the vice president may be there. That's why I'm wearing it."

One health-care lobbyist chuckled: "It's not enough for the administration to cut Medicare; now they're taking out seniors one by one."

At a Monday night performance at the Birchmere club in suburban Virginia with friends Lyle Lovett, Guy Clark and Joe Ely, John Hiatt improvised lyrics to the tune of "I'm going down this old dusty road": "I'm sending ol' Dick Cheney to Iraq. Let 'im shoot at something that shoots back."

And cyber-humorist Andy Borowitz reports4: "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced today that his department would immediately implement a "Cheney Alert" system to warn Americans if an attack by Vice President Dick Cheney is imminent."

For the Record Book: Rep. John Dingell passed one of his mentors Tuesday to become the second-longest serving member in the history of the House. The Michigan Democrat has now served 50 years, two months and 14 days, one day more than the late Rep. Carl Vinson who retired from the House on Jan. 3, 1965.

"Carl Vinson was a giant," Dingell said of the Georgia Democrat. "When I was beginning my career, Vinson could scare young Members with just a look. No one challenged him or questioned him on anything. He was a teacher by example and I had the pleasure of knowing him and learning from him." Dingell was 29 years old when he was first elected to finish the term of his late father. Dingell said he spent this Valentine's Day with his wife, Deborah, and visited the Veterans' Medical Center in Detroit. "There is no finer way to honor Carl Vinson than to pay tribute to the great American soldiers he spent his life working for," he said.

The Texas Parks and Wildlife Department's incident report on Vice President Dick Cheney's accidental shooting of a hunting partner Saturday pins the blame largely on Cheney.

In evaluating "contributing factors," the game warden checked off the box: "Victim covered by shooter who was swinging on game." In its summary, the report says that 78-year-old Harry Whittington "downed a bird and went to retrieve it. While he was out of the hunting line another covey was flushed and Cheney swung on a bird and fired striking Whittington in the face, neck and chest at approximately 30 yards."

Lydia Saldaña, spokeswoman for the Texas Parks and Wildlife Department6, said Cheney would also receive a warning citation because he did not have the proper "upland game bird stamp" required to hunt quail, but that he would not be fined.

The game warden's report7 contradicts earlier claims from the White House and Katharine Armstrong, the owner of the Texas ranch where the shooting occurred. Earlier Monday, the White House cited8 Armstrong's view that Whittington was at fault. "She pointed out that the protocol was not followed by Mr. Whittington when it came to notifying the others that he was there," said White House spokesman Scott McClellan.

Some hunting groups chastised the vice president. "It's incumbent upon the shooter to assess the situation and make sure it's a safe shot," Mark Birkhauser, president-elect of the International Hunter Education Association, told the Associated Press.

The Corpus Christi Caller-Times, the paper that first broke the story, identified the third hunter in the party as Pamela Willeford, the U.S. Ambassador to Switzerland and Liechtenstein and a former chairman of the Texas Higher Education Coordinating Board. Cheney's office would not confirm the report that Willeford was the third hunter. --Christopher Conkey * * *

Foreign media were having a field day with the story of Cheney's hunting accident.

One Australian paper suggested Cheney was trying to draw attention from an investigation into his possible role in leaking national-security information to reporters. His indicted ex-aide, I. Lewis Libby, reportedly told a grand jury that he was authorized by his "superiors" to release parts of the classified National Intelligence Estimate. "With both Republican and Democrat members of Congress calling for an investigation into Libby's claim, Mr. Cheney was under some political pressure," said the Sydney Morning Herald. "Perhaps he was thinking about how he should respond when he aimed his shotgun at the quail and instead sprayed Mr. Whittington with shotgun pellets." The online news blog for the Guardian in London headlines its account of the mishap9, "Duck Cheney."

The accident wasn't the first at a vice presidential hunt. Two Secret Service agents were involved in separate motor-vehicle accidents in South Dakota in 2001, while Cheney was on a pheasant-hunting trip. One of the agents was slightly injured when his rented Ford Excursion SUV overturned off a gravel road.

Pushing Mine Safety: Families of miners killed in three accidents said the nation's mine safety agency has kept them in the dark about its investigations.

The group aired its grievances before Democratic members of the House Education and Workforce Committee, who convened the forum Monday. Distraught relatives of miners killed in West Virginia last month and in Alabama five years ago called for more transparency and faster responses from investigators and top officials at the federal Mine Safety and Health Administration.

Frieda Sorah, whose husband died at the Jim Walters Resources mine in Alabama in 2001, chided MSHA for failing to adopt safety regulations recommended by the United Mine Workers of America in time to prevent the January disaster at the Sago in West Virginia. "MSHA [officials] cannot be trusted to investigate themselves," Sorah said. Wanda Blevins said that when her husband's body was retrieved from the Jim Walters mine 43 days after the accident, word reached her through a "grapevine" of contacts -- not organized channels. Blevins and her son, David, also a miner, said they have tried to obtain more information throughout the accident investigation. But, she said, "To this day, I still don't know what happened." -- Joi Preciphs * * * Pressing FDA: Sen. Orrin Hatch (R., Utah) and Rep. Henry Waxman (D., Calif.) write to the Food and Drug Administration pressing the agency to act on generic biotech drugs.

The two lawmakers, who teamed up on the 1984 law that created the pathway for generic versions of traditional drugs, think the FDA can move ahead with copycat versions of a few products under the current law. The FDA has said in the past that it might be able to approve copies of certain biotech drugs, including human growth hormone and insulin, without new action from Congress. The letter says there is "no excuse -- scientific, legal or otherwise -- for FDA to continue to delay the release" of guidelines on what data generics makers need to apply for approval of copies of human growth hormone and insulin. Sandoz, a generics unit of Novartis AG, has sued the FDA over the agency's delay of a decision on its version of human growth hormone.

Taking on the AFL-CIO: As organized labor fights an uphill battle to keep pension and health care benefits for auto workers and other unionized employees, it has something new to worry about: The Center for Union Facts, a nonprofit group launched Monday by Washington, D.C. lobbyist Rick Berman.

The group, which took out full-page ads in major newspapers and organized a protest in front of AFL-CIO headquarters Monday, is taking aim at the union movement, devoting a Web site10 to provide information on union leader salaries and political donations with information culled from various government entities. Berman, a former labor law attorney for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce who now represents a host of companies primarily in the food and beverage industry through Berman & Co., says the group already has a $2.5 million war chest from various corporations, foundations and "one trade association."

Lane Windham, an AFL-CIO spokeswoman, called the center "a front group for giant corporations that want to make sure that workers don't have a voice." She said staffers at the big labor federation11 planned to bring cookies and milk to the protesters. "We feel that it's a pretty juvenile action, and we want to offer them some sustenance when they're out there," she said. --Kris Maher * * *

Snow

Out of the Loop: Treasury Secretary John Snow pleaded ignorance when word leaked out that senior officials in the Group of Seven held a secret side meeting in London last Thursday to avoid inviting Group of Eight host Russia during this weekend's finance ministers' gathering in Moscow.

The hush-hush London talks are a reminder that Russia may be hosting this year's rich-nation G8 summit in St. Petersburg this July, but it's still just a caddie at the more exclusive G7 country club.

"I don't know where they met or if they met or who met," Snow told reporters when cornered about the London meeting. Perhaps. But, if so, the secretary might have wondered why his top international aide, Undersecretary for International Affairs Tim Adams, wasn't on his plane to Moscow and was AWOL for the first day of the three-day visit. --Michael M. Time Flies: On Tuesday -- Valentine's Day -- Rep. John Dingell (D., Mich.) becomes the second-longest serving member in the history of the House, having served 50 years, two months and 14 days after being elected to finish the term of his late father. He passes the late Rep. Carl Vinson (D., Ga.), who retired from the House on Jan. 3, 1965, after 50 years, 2 months and 13 days.

Dingell spokesman Adam Benson says it has been a virtual "Dingell-palooza" of milestones since last year, when he passed Speaker Sam Rayburn as fourth-longest-serving member and later celebrated 50 years in the House. It will be another three years, though, before Dingell can claim the top spot. Rep. Jamie Whitten (D., Miss.) served for 53 years, 2 months and 14 days in the House. Dingell won't surpass that record until Valentine's Day, 2009.

"It's nice to be No. 2," Benson said. "But he said to me the other day, 'I really want to be known more for quality than quantity.'" --Laura Meckler * * *

Keep Talking: At a closed-door meeting with lawmakers Friday at a Republican retreat in eastern Maryland, President Bush warned that "I expect this conversation we're about to have to stay in the room." He quickly added that "I know that's impossible in Washington." It was, even more so than usual. The first few minutes of his comments were being piped inadvertently through an open microphone to reporters who had just been escorted out of the event.

In his supposedly off-the-record comments, Mr. Bush said nothing new, basically repeating themes that he often sounds in his public appearances. He talked about how Sept. 11, 2001, changed how he thinks about defending America from attack. And he offered a defense of his National Security Agency eavesdropping program, emphasizing how he sought the views of lawyers at the White House and the Justice Department before putting it in place. There was at least one flash of candor before the sound feed was cut. Advising lawmakers to hire advisers who are smarter than they are, he added, "in my case it wasn't all that hard to find." --John McKinnon * * *

Michigan Democratic Rep. John Dingell accused the Bush administration of undermining and berating American auto makers while they are working hard to fix their troubles.

In a letter sent today to President Bush12, Mr. Dingell says the administration has failed to respond constructively to the problems of General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. The most recent offense, he said, was a quote in The Wall Street Journal this week13 from a senior administration official who downplayed concerns about Japanese manipulation of currency to their auto makers' advantage. The official said, in part, "The American car industry needs to focus on producing cars that Americans want to buy. It's hard to make the case that the currency issues play even a minimal role."

In his letter, Mr. Dingell responded: "In my 50 years of public service, I've never seen an administration of either party that has actively and publicly put down American products, companies and workers the way this administration has done with our auto manufacturers. How can they hope to sell more cars when the number one spokesman for their competitors is the White House?"

A longtime champion of the domestic auto makers, Mr. Dingell said it was "a testament to their competence and determination that these companies are succeeding at all given the unfair advantages enjoyed by their foreign competitors and the constant nay-saying by an administration that should be their biggest booster." --Laura Meckler * * *

Washington and Moscow remain at loggerheads over Russia's efforts to gain membership in the World Trade Organization.

Russia has been trying to get into the trade organization for more than a decade, but the U.S. won't give its approval unless Moscow allows foreign banks, insurers and other financial institutions to open branches. Right now foreigners have to go through the more-onerous process of setting up local subsidiaries, with their own capitalization. The free-marketeers at the U.S. Treasury Department see financial services as the grease that would speed growth of the Russian economy. The Russians are worried that their regulators won't be able to adequately supervise branches and that domestic banks won't be able to compete with international institutions.

U.S. Treasury Secretary John Snow made no headway at a meeting in Moscow this morning with his Russian counterpart, Alexei Kudrin, in advance of tomorrow's gathering of Group of Eight finance ministers. The U.S. side has proposed a transitional period during which Russia would open its financial system to more foreign competition.

The branch-banking issue "is one of the main sticking points," a senior U.S. official said afterwards. "The Russians aren't completely sold on market efficiencies and the idea that consumers are king." Russian officials point out that the current ban on branches hasn't deterred such big foreign players as Citigroup, which is investing heavily in Russia. Russian President Vladimir Putin called President Bush before Christmas to complain about the holdup, then sounded off in public about it again last week. The U.S. is also concerned about Russia's limits on farm trade and its commitment to cracking down on pirated CDs, DVDs and other copyrighted material.

The WTO talks come amid rising American concerns about Mr. Putin's foreign and domestic policies, ranging from his crackdown on opposition at home to Russia's recent cutoff of natural gas supplies to Ukraine to a Kremlin invitation to Hamas leaders from the Palestinian territories to visit Moscow. --Michael M. Phillips and Greg White * * * Brazilian Advice? The Bush administration is looking to Brazil for advice about how to kick the oil addiction that the president owned up to in his State of the Union Address.

At a meeting in Moscow this afternoon, Treasury Secretary John Snow asked Brazilian Finance Minister Antonio Palocci how his country has gotten to the point where it expects to be energy independent within a couple of months. Palocci, a guest at this weekend's gathering of the Group of Eight finance ministers, touted Brazil's 30-year campaign to replace oil with ethanol, most of it sugar-based.

"Nobody does it in an economically feasible manner like we do," Palocci told reporters after his sit-down with Snow. The Brazilians would like the U.S. to invest in a joint research-and-development, but the Treasury secretary made no commitment.

"We're very interested" in understanding Brazil's success with ethanol, said a senior U.S. official.

Tax overhaul's demise leaves unhappy Bush panel.

Former Sen. Mack, "disappointed" that presidential advisory group he headed isn't producing action, cautions the issue will become "more difficult" to push as president's term continues. Absence of tax overhaul in Bush's State of the Union address is seen as sign of Treasury Secretary Snow's lack of clout.

Some senior Republicans want to put off overhaul debates until Washington tackles baby-boom retirement, the subject of commission Bush has called for. The liberal Center for American Progress wants Democrats to step in, placing tax overhaul atop its "15 new ideas," with plan to cut employee payroll-tax contributions on earnings below $90,000.

Ex-Sen. Breaux, Mack's co-chair, got note from Snow but "no saying 'thank you' " from Bush for panel's work.

Republicans speak up to House leaders about election-year needs.

Democrats Accuse Cheney, Bush Of 'troubling' Secrecy (WT)

By Agence France-Presse

The Washington Times, February 15, 2006

Democrats in Congress yesterday accused Vice President Dick Cheney of a pattern of secrecy, and demanded that he "level" with the public on the accidental shooting of a hunting partner last weekend.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, called "troubling" the day's wait before the public announcement of the hunting mishap in which Harry Whittington, 78, took bird shot in the neck, chest and face.

"A tendency of this administration -- from the top all the way to the bottom -- is to withhold information ... to refuse to be forthcoming about information that is of significance and relevance to the jobs that all of you do," Mrs. Clinton said at a press conference.

"Putting it all together, going back years now, there's a pattern and it's a pattern that should be troubling," she said. "The refusal of this administration to level with the American people on matters large and small is very disturbing, because it goes counter to the way our constitutional democracy ... is supposed to work."

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada also said the secretive tendency goes beyond Mr. Cheney, pervading the entire Bush White House.

"I think the reason it took the vice president a day to talk about this is part of the secretive nature of this administration," he said. "They keep things pretty close to the chest."

"I think it's time the American people heard from the vice president, in a real meeting just like we're having here," said Mr. Reid, who called the currentBush presidency "the most secretive administration in modern history."

DOJ_NMG_0015338

"In the last many, many decades, there's no administration more secretive than this," he said.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, said the time has come for the vice president to hold a press conference -- which Mr. Schumer estimated would be the vice president's first in some four years -- to clear the air.

"In light of the recent shooting accident and all the questions surrounding his role in the leaking of classified national security information ... there are many questions that Americans have for VP Cheney," Mr. Schumer stated in a press release.

Cheney Stays Mum On Hunting Accident (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The man accidentally shot by Vice President Cheney in a weekend hunting accident suffered a minor heart attack Tuesday, as Cheney maintained his public silence over the circumstances of the shooting.

Harry Whittington, 78, who has a piece of birdshot lodged near his heart, will remain hospitalized at least another week for observation, said David Blanchard, emergency room chief at a hospital in Corpus Christi, Texas.

As many as 200 pieces of birdshot could be inside Whittington, Blanchard said, though the problem is a single BB-size pellet that irritated the heart muscle and caused an abnormal heartbeat. Barring further problems, doctors will leave the pellet where it is and Whittington will be fine, he said.

“There are tens of thousands of people that go around with shrapnel in their bodies,” the doctor said.

Cheney visited Capitol Hill on Tuesday for a private meeting with members of Congress, but he has not spoken about how the shooting occurred since it happened at a Texas ranch Saturday about 5:50 p.m. CT. His office noted he has issued two written statements, the latest saying Cheney called Whittington after hearing of the heart attack to ask “if there was anything he needed.”

Cheney is not scheduled to make a public appearance until a Friday speech to members of the Wyoming Legislature.

Blanchard and hospital administrator Peter Banko called Whittington's problem a “silent” heart attack because there were no symptoms such as chest pains or shortness of breath. Doctors discovered it after an examination revealed an irregular heartbeat.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., sent Cheney a letter urging him to hold a news conference to discuss such controversies as the shooting and last year's indictment of his chief of staff.

Some conservatives are also pressing Cheney to speak out.

National Review magazine posted an editorial on its website that said, “not talking only feeds speculation and aids the cause of those who want to lampoon and smear him. Let's hear from the vice president.”

Experienced Hunters Put Cheney At Fault In Shooting (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, February 15, 2006

Experienced hunters yesterday said Vice President Dick Cheney alone bears the blame for a weekend mishap in which he accidentally shot a hunting companion in the face and chest with a shotgun.

Every local hunter interviewed by The Washington Times yesterday said the vice president violated hunting's cardinal rule: Never pull the trigger unless you are 100 percent sure of your target. And, they said, he violated Rule No. 2, as well: Never swing on game outside the safe zone of fire.

"I just want the guy to say, 'Hey, I screwed up, I made a mistake,' " said James Harris, 51, a hunter and taxidermist from Mechanicsville, Md., who said he fears that the accident will make people think hunting is unsafe.

"He apparently was overzealous or too excited about the shot, and he didn't practice safe measures to make sure he didn't shoot his friend. He should have, and he was wrong," Mr. Harris said.

Said hunter Bob Rice, 73, of Golden Beach, Md.: "Ninety-nine percent of the blame falls on the person who discharged that round with his trigger finger, and that's Cheney."

A Cheney spokesman yesterday said the vice president's office "had confirmed" every point in a firsthand account of the incident by Katharine Armstrong, who owns the Texas ranch where Mr. Cheney went hunting with Harry Whittington, 78, and one other hunter.

Mr. Whittington "came up from behind the vice president and the other hunter and didn't signal them or indicate to them or announce himself," Mrs. Armstrong said after the mishap.

"The vice president didn't see him," she said. A covey of quail "flushed and the vice president picked out a bird and was following it and shot. And ... Harry was in the line of fire and got peppered pretty good."

DOJ_NMG_0015339

Mrs. Armstrong has downplayed the accident, saying, "This is something that happens from time to time. You know, I've been peppered pretty well myself."

Robert Bealle of Waldorf, Md., 54, who grew up hunting quail, said he has hunted since he was 9 years old and has never known anyone who was hit by birdshot, which are tiny pellets that spread out as they travel away from the barrel of the shotgun.

"I have never sprayed anybody, nor have I ever been sprayed, and if I ever was, I'd never go hunting with that guy again," he said with a laugh.

Mr. Bealle also questioned why the hunting party would split up. Mrs. Armstrong said in her account that after Mr. Whittington shot a bird, he went to look for it in the tall grass, while Mr. Cheney and a third hunter walked to another spot and found a second covey.

Mr. Bealle said that although hunting methods are different across the country, it is common practice for three hunters, for instance, to walk abreast as they move forward flushing out quail. The left hunter can shoot left or center, the middle one straight only, and the right one center or right only -- "never, ever to the left."

"And they shouldn't have left a hunter straggling back behind them. They should have got dogs over there, or they should have gone over there to help find the bird. I don't care if you're the vice president; go help," he said. "And then they should have all regrouped; they should have stayed abreast."

Mr. Cheney's spokeswoman, Lea Anne McBride, dodged questions about the hunters' comments.

"The vice president has made his comments on what happened," she said.

Mr. Cheney has not spoken publicly about the incident since it occurred, except in statements issued by his office.

Of the hunters' comments, Miss McBride said: "If you've got other sources saying other things even though they weren't present, that's, you, you certainly ..." She left the sentence unfinished.

The Times interviewed five hunters, and all said their opinions on blame would be held by any experienced hunter and had been shared among shooters in recent days.

Two days after the shooting, the Texas Parks and Wildlife Department released a report of hunting accidents in 2005. "Swinging on game outside of a safe zone of fire is still the primary accident type" in dove and quail hunting, the report said.

It found that of 30 accidents last year, just two were classified as "victim out of sight of shooter/moved into line of fire."

It's 'Cheney's Law' In Albany, But He Wouldn't Claim It (NYT)

By Michael Cooper

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

ALBANY, Feb. 14 — They are calling it "Cheney's Law."

Named laws are nothing new in Albany. From Megan's Law to Kendra's Law to VaSean's Law, state lawmakers often use names to try to put a human face on the occasionally arcane issues that they address with their legislation.

Usually the laws are named for the victims of violence. But now a bill on hunting safety that has been introduced in several legislative sessions but never became law has been christened "Cheney's Law" by several Republican senators.

The bill, which would make it a felony to leave the scene of a hunting accident, passed out of the Senate Codes Committee yesterday, just as much of the nation continued to discuss Vice President Dick Cheney's accident on Saturday, in which he shot and wounded a 78-year-old lawyer while on a hunting trip in Texas.

Officials have said that Mr. Cheney did not leave the scene after he shot the lawyer, but stayed with him while he received medical treatment.

The curious timing of the committee vote was not lost on the bill's sponsor, Senator George H. Winner Jr., an upstate Republican who is one of the senators calling it Cheney's Law. "It's some circumstances," he said.

The bill would make it a felony to leave the scene of an accident involving a serious physical injury. Senator Winner said that the bill was inspired by a 2001 hunting accident in Steuben County, in which the victim was left to die.

Assemblyman Richard L. Brodsky, a Westchester Democrat, said that he would introduce the bill in the State Assembly.

State Senator Thomas K. Duane, a Manhattan Democrat, marveled that the vice president's hunting accident could serve as a catalyst to change the law in New York. "We must have him come for the bill signing," he said.

Gov. George E. Pataki, meanwhile, was asked at a news conference if he would accept an invitation to go hunting with Mr. Cheney.

The governor merely smiled and said he would not comment.

A Red-Stater Even Before There Was Such A Thing (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0015340

HOUSTON, Feb. 14 — Back in the 1960's, when politicians jokingly referred to Texas as a two-party state, dominated by conservative Democrats and not-so-conservative Democrats, Harry M. Whittington was a rare figure: a die-hard Republican.

Before Vice President Dick Cheney sprayed him with birdshot in a hunting accident over the weekend, Mr. Whittington, 78, was known largely for his pivotal role in building the Republican Party in Texas into a powerhouse.

A grocer's son from hardscrabble East Texas noted for his blunt style, Mr. Whittington accompanied the patrician George H. W. Bush around Texas during Mr. Bush's unsuccessful race for the Senate in 1964 and has remained a figure in Republican politics ever since, raising money and advancing the ambitions of the party's office seekers.

A lawyer with a knack for lucrative real estate investing but with decidedly old-school habits, Mr. Whittington has eschewed not only billing by the hour but even a personal computer at his penthouse office in the 10-story Vaughn Building in Austin.

"I know he must be very close to the Republicans," said Joe R. Greenhill, 91, a former chief justice of the Texas Supreme Court and a monthly card-playing companion of Mr. Whittington, but "he doesn't talk about it."

Mr. Greenhill and Mr. Whittington had been scheduled to meet this Wednesday for a game of pitch, in which the loser can return home poorer to the tune of $5 or $6, Mr. Greenhill said, though "it looks like Harry won't be making it this week."

Mr. Whittington, a graduate of the University of Texas and of its law school, is used to maneuvering for much larger amounts anyway, as in his tussles with the political establishment in Austin, where Democrats still hold substantial sway. He has spent hundred of thousands of dollars on legal fees to fight a decision by the city six years ago to condemn property owned by his family and build a $10.5 million parking garage there.

In January, the Texas Supreme Court handed him a victory, declining to hear an appeal from a lower court ruling that officials had failed to prove the land was needed for a public purpose. In a recent profile of Mr. Whittington, The Austin American-Statesman said he could now end up owning not only the garage, which had been built in the interim, but also another facility constructed on the property, a water-chilling plant used for air-conditioning. Together they are valued at $29.8 million.

If private-property rights are one of Mr. Whittington's passions, he has others that do not fit so squarely with his image as a Republican elder. One is prison reform. While serving on the board of the Texas Department of Corrections in the 1980's and after observing the conditions in many state prisons, he once claimed, "Prisons are to crime what greenhouses are to plants." He also led an effort to move mentally retarded inmates out of the general prison population and followed this with outspoken support of a bill to ban execution of retarded prisoners. (Although Gov. Rick Perry vetoed that bill in 2001, the United States Supreme Court later outlawed such executions.)

"A person who is born with a body that becomes an adult and a mind that remains a child needs special protection in our criminal justice system," Mr. Whittington, one of whose four daughters is retarded, wrote in a letter to The Dallas Morning News in 2001.

Mr. Whittington and his wife, Mercedes, live comfortably in a ranch-style home in northwest Austin near Mount Bonnell, a breathtaking spot overlooking much of the city. He is trim, and frequently begins his day with a workout at Tarry House, a private social club he founded in 1968.

Mr. Whittington is close to President Bush, who in 1999, as governor of Texas, named him chairman of the regulatory Funeral Service Commission. The Texas funeral industry was then riddled by claims of irregularities, some surrounding Service Corporation International, of Houston, a large chain of funeral homes headed by an ardent supporter of the Bush family. Under Mr. Whittington, the commission reluctantly settled a whistle-blower lawsuit filed by a former state regulator who maintained that she had been fired for investigating the company.

Dealing with that issue and others at his first meeting of the funeral commission, Mr. Whittington said, "If any agency needs divine guidance, it's this one."

Meet The Press (NR)

National Review, February 15, 2006

Never has an accidental shooting occasioned so much glee. Whatever mistakes Vice President Dick Cheney might have made while hunting on the Armstrong Ranch in Texas this weekend, or in deciding how to make the mishap public, have been eclipsed by the disgusting wallowing in the accident of all his critics and the unsurpassable self-regard of national reporters outraged by a delay of at least 14 hours in getting alerted to the story. They worked themselves into a first-class tizzy at Monday's White House press briefing, proving that no matter what the story is, reporters think it’s all about them. It is understandable that Cheney would not consider notifying the media his first priority following an accident during a quail-hunting trip with friends, and the meaning that is being read into the incident — about Cheney's character, the administration's competence, Bush's foreign policy, and much else — is absurd.

That said, there are customary political and media rules about how to handle such things. Those rules require rapid disclosure. It was a mistake not to alert the national press of the incident immediately. And if an accident seems to be much less important than a matter of policy, that doesn't make it less important politically — oftentimes, it is the non-substantive issues that can be most powerful politically. With Harry Whittington having suffered a minor heart attack Tuesday morning, and still in intensive care 72 hours after the shooting, the perception that the vice president is downplaying the seriousness of the incident and not playing straight is going to be stronger than ever. There is a risk that the administration will sustain significant political damage from the controversy.

Cheney himself should make a public appearance on the matter, and the sooner the better. He should get himself with a respected national anchor — perhaps Brit Hume of Fox News — as soon as this evening to express his regret and explain in his own words what happened. He should stop relying on press aides who were not present at the accident to tell his side of the story. Not talking only feeds speculation, and aids the cause of those who want to lampoon and smear him. Let's hear from the vice president.

Cheney Misfires, Then Ducks, Making Himself Comic Target (USAT)

USA Today, February 15, 2006

Until the condition of Texas lawyer Harry Whittington took a turn for the worse on Tuesday, his accidental shooting by Vice President Cheney was notable mainly as fodder for TV comics and cartoonists.

"I think Cheney is starting to lose it," Jay Leno quipped. "After he shot the guy he screamed, 'Anyone else want to call domestic wiretapping illegal?' "

Far from being trivial, humor says a lot about a nation. In fact, a great informal test of a country's freedoms and psychological health is this: Can comedians poke fun at political leaders?

That question was one of the best barometers of how much 9/11 traumatized America: For weeks after the attacks, the late-night comics declared a moratorium on President Bush's mangling of words and facts.

For Cheney, the quail hunting accident tapped a rich vein of humor because it symbolized so many of the traits that critics have leveled at him: Trigger happy (pushing for war in Iraq). Obsessed with the wrong target (Iraq again). Excessively secretive and unaccountable (his hush-hush energy task force and aversion to admitting error). Too cozy with lobbyists, one of whom was along on the quail hunt.

The accident — and Cheney's stay-in-the-shadows response to it — reinforced those perceptions. The jokes resonate because they contain grains of truth.

On Tuesday, the Bush administration tried to join in the levity; presidential spokesman Scott McClellan joked about wearing a hunter-orange tie. Unfortunately for the White House, the laugh-it-off approach fell flatter than the Texas prairie when news broke that a birdshot pellet had shifted to Whittington's heart, causing what a doctor called a "silent, or minor heart attack" that will keep the 78-year-old patient hospitalized another week.

Cheney is undoubtedly deeply distressed and embarrassed that he unintentionally hurt his good friend. It's understandable he doesn't much feel like talking about it.

But when a vice president shoots a man (for the first time since Aaron Burr fatally shot Alexander Hamilton in the USA's most famous duel, as a few comics noted), it's news. Not Iraq or Hurricane Katrina level news. Nothing that will shape the fate of the nation. But still news, and the best official response is not humor but candor.

Cheney has plenty of high-priced public relations experts on his payroll to give him advice, so he probably doesn't needs ours. But for what it's worth: Go to Corpus Christi. Comfort your friend. Hold a news conference in the hospital parking lot. Explain what happened. Express anguish. Take responsibility.

That won't end all the jokes, but it might take the sting out of many of them.

Cheney's Coverup (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

The press corps is outraged that the White House waited 20 hours or so to disclose that Vice President Dick Cheney had shot a hunting companion, and we can see why. Don't these Bush people understand that the coverup is worse than the crime?

In the name of media solidarity, and in the interest of restraining the Imperial Presidency, we have put together the following coverup timeline with crucial questions that deserve to be answered:

· 5:30 p.m., Saturday (all times Central Standard Time). Mr. Cheney sprays Harry Whittington with birdshot, and the Secret Service immediately informs local police. Who is Harry Whittington and whom does he lobby for? Does he know Scooter Libby?

· 6:30 p.m. White House Chief of Staff Andy Card informs President Bush that there's been a hunting accident involving the Vice President's party. Did Mr. Bush ask followup questions? Was he intellectually curious?

· 7 p.m. Karl Rove tells Mr. Bush that it is Mr. Cheney who did the shooting. Why was this detail withheld for a full 30 minutes from the President? Who else did Mr. Rove talk to about this in the interim? Was Valerie Plame ever mentioned?

DOJ_NMG_0015342

· 5 a.m., Sunday. White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan learns that Mr. Cheney is the shooter. He also fails to alert the media. Did he rush to write talking points or fall back to sleep?

· 11 a.m. Katharine Armstrong, owner of the ranch where the shooting took place, blows the story sky-high by giving the news to the Corpus Christi Caller-Times. According to Ms. Armstrong, Mr. Cheney told her to do what she thought made sense. Has Ms. Armstrong ever worked for Halliburton?

· 11:27 a.m., Monday. Mr. McClellan finally holds a press conference and gets grilled. One reporter actually asks (and we're not making this one up), "Would this be much more serious if the man had died?"

· 1:30 p.m. The Texas paper posts the story on its Web site, after calling the Veep's office for confirmation. Everyone involved confirms more or less everything, or so the official line goes. Their agreement is very suspicious.

For the record, Mr. McClellan replied, "Of course it would." We hope the 78-year-old Mr. Whittington recovers promptly after his heart attack yesterday. As for the Beltway press corps, it has once again earned the esteem in which it is held by the American public.

An Arrogance Of Power (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

There is a temptation that seeps into the souls of even the most righteous politicians and leads them to bend the rules, and eventually the truth, to suit the political needs of the moment. That arrogance of power is on display with the Bush administration.

The most vivid example is the long delay in informing the country that Vice President Cheney had accidentally shot a man last Saturday while hunting in Texas. For a White House that informs us about the smallest bumps and scrapes suffered by the president and vice president, the lag is inexplicable. But let us assume the obvious: It was an attempt to delay and perhaps suppress embarrassing news. We will never know whether the vice president's office would have announced the incident at all if the host of the hunting party, Katharine Armstrong, hadn't made her own decision Sunday morning to inform her local paper.

Nobody died at Armstrong Ranch, but this incident reminds me a bit of Sen. Edward Kennedy's delay in informing Massachusetts authorities about his role in the fatal automobile accident at Chappaquiddick in 1969. That story, and dozens of others about the Kennedy family, illustrates how wealthy, powerful people can behave as if they are above the law. For my generation, the fall of Richard Nixon is the ultimate allegory about how power can corrupt and destroy. It begins not with venality but with a sense of God-given mission.

I would be inclined to leave Cheney to the mercy of Jon Stewart and Jay Leno if it weren't for other signs that this administration has jumped the tracks. What worries me most is the administration's misuse of intelligence information to advance its political agenda. For a country at war, this is truly dangerous.

The most recent example of politicized intelligence was President Bush's statement on Feb. 9 that the United States had "derailed" a 2002 plot to fly a plane into the U.S. Bank Tower in Los Angeles. Bush spoke about four al Qaeda plotters who had planned to use shoe bombs to blow open the cockpit door. But a foreign official with detailed knowledge of the intelligence scoffed at Bush's account, saying that the information obtained from Khalid Sheik Mohammed and an Indonesian operative known as Hambali was not an operational plan so much as an aspiration to destroy the tallest building on the West Coast. When I asked a former high-level U.S. intelligence official about Bush's comment, he agreed that Bush had overstated the intelligence.

Perhaps the most outrageous example of misusing intelligence has been the administration's attempt to undercut Paul Pillar and other former CIA officials who tried to warn about the dangers ahead in Iraq. I'm not talking about the agency's botched job on weapons of mass destruction but about its warnings that postwar Iraq would be chaotic and dangerous. Pillar said so privately before the war, and he helped draft an August 2004 national intelligence estimate warning, correctly, that the situation in Iraq was deteriorating and heading for "tenuous stability" at best.

Bush was unhappy at this naysaying, just as he has grumbled about pessimistic reports from the CIA station in Baghdad. When Pillar made similar warnings about Iraq at a private dinner in September 2004, the White House went ballistic -- seeing Pillar as part of a CIA conspiracy to undermine the president's policies. Soon after, Bush installed a former Republican congressman, Porter Goss, who began a purge at the agency that has driven out a generation of senior managers. Pillar and many, many others have retired, leaving the nation without some of its best intelligence officers when we need them most.

Bush and Cheney are in the bunker. That's the only way I can make sense of their actions. They are steaming in a broth of daily intelligence reports that highlight the grim terrorist threats facing America. They have sworn blood oaths that they will defend the United States from its adversaries -- no matter what . They have blown past the usual rules and restraints into territory where few presidents have ventured -- a region where the president conducts warrantless wiretaps against Americans in violation of a federal statute, where he authorizes harsh interrogation methods that amount to torture.

When critics question the legality of the administration's actions, Bush and Cheney assert the commander in chief's power under Article II of the Constitution. When Congress passes a law forbidding torture, the White House appends a signing statement insisting that Article II -- the power of the commander in chief -- trumps everything else. When the administration's Republican friends suggest amending the wiretapping law to make its program legal, the administration refuses. Let's say it plainly: This is the arrogance of power, and it has gone too far in the Bush White House.

Shooter Slips On A Silencer (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON

Who did this old guy think he was, coming between Dick Cheney and his helpless prey?

The luckless 78-year-old Texas lawyer, Harry Whittington, is in intensive care after a heart attack, with up to 200 pellets riddling his face and body — one stuck in his heart — from Dick Cheney's designer Perazzi Brescia shotgun. And still his friend, the vice president, is Swift-BB-ing him.

Private citizens have been enlisted to blame the victim. Maybe poor Mr. Whittington put himself in the wrong place at the wrong time. But he was, after all, behind Vice, not in front of him. And the hunter pulling the trigger is supposed to make sure he has a clear shot. Wouldn't it be, well, classy for Shooter to express just a bit of contrition and humility?

Instead, the usual sliming has begun, with the Cheney camp trying to protect the vice president by casting a veteran hunter as Elmer Dud.

Scott McClellan told the White House press corps that Katharine Armstrong, a lobbyist with government ties who owns the Texas ranch (and whose mother, Anne, was on the Halliburton board that hired Mr. Cheney as C.E.O.), "pointed out that the protocol was not followed by Mr. Whittington when it came to notifying the others that he was there."

As the story of the weekend's bizarre hunting accident is wrenched out of the White House, the picture isn't pretty: With American soldiers dying in Iraq, Five-Deferment Dick "I Had Other Priorities in the 60's Than Military Service" Cheney gets his macho kicks gunning down little birds and the occasional old man while W. rides his bike, blissfully oblivious to any collateral damage. Shouldn't these guys work on weekends until we figure out how to fix Iraq, New Orleans, Medicare and gas prices?

This version of "The Most Dangerous Game" neatly follows the four-step Bush-Cheney cycle:

Step 1: Set out to pick off what you think is an easy target, like quail this time or pen-raised and netted pheasant in the past, or a certain sanction-caged Iraqi dictator.

Step 2: In the corrupt company of lobbyist-contractor friends, botch things up. Ignore the peril at hand — as with, oh, Osama at Tora Bora, or Katrina, or the Iraq occupation — and with steely resolve, indulge your raging incompetence. (Oops.)

Step 3: Stonewall. Resist giving Congress information about 9/11 or Katrina; don't tell the public how you're tapping phones at home, setting up gulags abroad and making war and energy policy in secret. Why give the taxpayers, who are ponying up for these weekend hunting trips, the extraordinary news that Vice shot his hunting companion in the face and chest? Scott McClellan knew before yesterday's White House briefing at noon that Mr. Whittington was worse, but did not tell the reporters. He left that to Corpus Christi doctors, who spun the heart attack as "an inflammatory response to a metallic foreign BB."

Step 4: Admit no mistakes. Express sympathy. Blame the victim without leaving fingerprints by outsourcing the smear to the private sector.

Trent Lott joked in a meeting yesterday that Mr. Cheney was now the "shooter in chief," while other wags noted that Quayle was always a problem for Bushes.

Presidential staff members and lawmakers speculated yesterday about whether Shooter would resign and make room for Condi if Mr. Whittington did not survive. His death would trigger a more thorough police investigation and probably a grand jury.

"Are you crazy?" one Republican senator told a reporter. "He'd never quit." (Aaron Burr presided over the Senate after he killed Alexander Hamilton in a duel.)

The shooter in chief can't quit because he is the administration. Who'd even tell him to quit? If necessary, he'd probably make W. take the fall.

Despite efforts by Mr. McClellan to joke and urge reporters to get back to "the pressing priorities of the American people," the hunting debacle once more showed Mr. Cheney running the imperial show.

He didn't talk to the sheriff for 14 hours, or even call the president to notify him after the 5:50 p.m. accident. Vice left that to Andy Card, who called Mr. Bush at 7:30 p.m. to say there had been a hunting accident, without mentioning that Vice was the gunman. Soon after that, Karl Rove called Mr. Bush back with that little detail.

A reporter, surprised, pressed Mr. McClellan: "The vice president did not call the president to tell him he was the shooter?"

Usually when there's a White House cover-up, the president's in on it.

The Shooting Party (WT)

By Tony Blankley

The Washington Times, February 15, 2006

In the absence of any pressing news these days — other than Iran's nuclear weapons development crisis, the election of Hamas terrorists in Palestine, on-going worldwide Muslim riots and killing in reaction to a cartoon, Al Gore's near sedition while speaking in Saudi Arabia, the turning over of our East Coast ports to be managed by a United Arab Emirates firm, the criminal leaking of vital NSA secrets to the New York Times, Mexican military incursions across our southern border, the Iraqi crisis, Congress's refusal to deal with the developing financial collapse of Social Security and Medicare, inter alia — the White House press corps has exploded in righteous fury over the question of the vice president's little shooting party last weekend.

As I understand the profound concern of the ever alert White House reporters, they smell a constitutional crisis because the shooting party failed to alert the media of the accidental shooting down in Corpus Christi, Texas. Well, actually they did alert the Corpus Christi media — but that didn't count. Unless the exalted ones have been formally informed by an official government press secretary, no public communication has technically occurred.

I checked the bylaws of the White House press corps, and they are right. It seems that the bylaws refer to Article XXIII of the U.S. Constitution which expressly designates that White House reporters with a minimum annual income of $375,000 (plus minimum stock options equal to not less than two-thirds their yearly salary, plus use of driver and long sedan during business hours, which hours must include post-deadline dinner engagements of a semi-social nature) are the exclusive recipients of all government information.

If information isn't hand-delivered in gold-edged paper to them while they are reclined on their chaise longue, it hasn't been released to the public. And if they don't report a fact, it hasn't happened. This provision is vital to a vigorous and independent free press. (I should note, my copy of the Constitution must be outdated, because it doesn't have an Article XXIII.)

Of course, this provision technically makes the White House press corps not reporters, but receivers — sort of glorified shipping clerks, but with the prerogative to rewrite and repackage the material before they deliver it to the public.

When an out-of-town newspaper got the scoop, the dignity of the White House press corps had been impeached, so they threw a public temper tantrum. As that has worked for many of them since their early childhood, they obviously expect it to work while on the job — to use the term loosely.

To add to their indignity, the reporter for The Washington Post went on MSNBC dressed up in a hunting costume to ridicule the vice president. (It is said that the enfeebled and debased French Dauphin, Charles VII, dressed in women's clothing to hide from Joan of Arc, who was trying to save France.)

I suppose most of us, as we rise in life, develop a sense of entitlement and pompous dignity. Doubtless we all think we are more important than we are.

As Charles de Gaulle once sardonically observed while walking past a graveyard: "that place is full of indispensable men."

But the Washington press corps, and particularly the White House press corps, has developed, as an institution, a grossly dilated view of itself. Most of us can tolerate arrogance, if it is accompanied by extraordinary capacity and virtuosity. The brilliant scientist, the war-winning general, the great artists are entitled to their pride.

But the hallmark of the Washington press corps these days is mediocrity, groupthink, a lack of curiosity and rampant careerism. These attributes were all on show in the shooting-party incident. But this is just a trivial incident — except for the poor, shot gentleman who suffered a heart attack, may he recover fully and quickly.

We live at a moment of revolutionary change in the international order. The rise and violenceofradical,possibly caliphate-forming Islam and the huge, culture-changing, unexamined consequences of rampant globalization make the present one of the least predictable moments to be alive.

Both government officials and citizens are in desperate need of a national press corps that is alive to the change and digging to find factual hints of the near future. We need the kind of future-oriented intellectual vigor, curiosity and genuine iconoclasm that typified American reporters in the first half of the last century.

Instead, as the shooting-party incident exemplified, we have in the White House at the most elite level of American journalism, self-absorbed, self-important men and women who stand on their prerogatives even over marginal and inconsequential matters.

Should they ever have a truly daring, creative, productive, hard-researched idea about what is going on in this dangerous world — they should alert the media.

Alito Hires As A Clerk Former Ashcroft Aide (WP)

By Charles Lane

DOJ_NMG_0015345

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. has hired one of the architects of then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft's policies to serve as his law clerk at the Supreme Court for the rest of the current term, the court announced yesterday.

Adam G. Ciongoli, 37, a senior vice president at Time Warner Inc., served as counselor to Ashcroft from 2001 to 2003. He attended Georgetown University Law Center, clerked for Alito at the Philadelphia-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit from 1995 to 1996, and helped prepare the justice for his recent confirmation hearings.

Ciongoli was an aide to Ashcroft during Ashcroft's years as a senator and then came to the Justice Department, where he advised Ashcroft on terrorism issues in the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Among the issues he worked on were the detention of thousands of terrorism suspects in the United States and the use of military tribunals to try them.

As a law clerk for Alito, his responsibilities will include helping Alito draft opinions, prepare for oral argument and sift through the mountain of appeals that arrive each week.

Ciongoli's appointment, which will last about five months, is unusual: Though there has been a slight trend at the court toward hiring law clerks with a few years of work experience, the vast majority of clerks are recent law school graduates.

Among those who have come to the court after working elsewhere, none in recent memory had held a government position as senior as Ciongoli's at the Justice Department, where he was widely regarded as one of Ashcroft's closest confidants.

Perhaps the closest parallel to Ciongoli's appointment was the 2002 appointment of Rachel Brand, then associate White House counsel, to serve as a law clerk to Justice Anthony M. Kennedy. Brand is now assistant attorney general for legal policy.

This raises the possibility that Ciongoli will face issues at the court that he had worked on in government.

For example, the arrest of U.S. citizen Jose Padilla and his subsequent detention as an "enemy combatant" took place while Ciongoli was on Ashcroft's staff. The Supreme Court is currently considering whether to hear Padilla's appeal.

"There is a process in place to evaluate whether a law clerk should be recused," Supreme Court spokeswoman Kathy Arberg said yesterday. Ciongoli did not return a phone call to his New York office.

According to a 2002 federal publication, "Maintaining the Public Trust: Ethics for Federal Judicial Law Clerks," clerks should not participate in cases that they worked on "in a previous legal job," or about which they have personal knowledge of disputed facts.

Ciongoli was one of five lawyers named as law clerks to Alito. Benjamin Horwich and Alexander Volokh will switch to Alito from the chambers of retired justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Hannah Smith and Jay Jorgensen will join Alito after having worked for Justice Clarence Thomas and then-Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, respectively.

Administration Officials Look To Ease GOP Concerns On Medicare (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, February 15, 2006

Senate Republicans met with senior Bush administration officials in private yesterday afternoon to discuss their concerns with the Medicare prescription-drug program and to prepare for the escalated Democratic attacks on the program expected next week during the recess.

Democratic leaders and strategists last week had urged lawmakers to launch a barrage of criticisms against the drug program.

About 30 Republican lawmakers sat down with Mike Leavitt, the secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, and Mark McClellan, the administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS).

Lawmakers, according to a senator in attendance, asked the officials about two major criticisms of the drug plan, which was the legislative centerpiece of President Bush's first term: that the drug plan offers too many programs and as a result is too confusing for seniors, and that it has a hole in a coverage. Drug costs between $2,250 and $5,100 a year are generally not covered by the program.

Senior senators such as Pete Domenici (N.M.) and Larry Craig (Idaho) said the program is fundamentally sound and will help many senior citizens.

Administration officials gave the lawmakers promising statistics about the program: 24 million of the 42 million eligible participants have signed up, 250,000 seniors sign up each week and the monthly individual premium cost has dropped from $37 to $25 per month, according to a lawmaker who took notes during the meeting.

However, Democrats note that many of the seniors who have "signed up" were automatically enrolled or have long been part of an employer-sponsored program.

Leavitt and McClellan also reported that the administration is addressing the gap in coverage by sending out letters to enrollees alerting them when their medical costs are approaching a level that will exceed government coverage. The officials said that seniors approaching the so-called "doughnut hole" would have the option to switch plans to avoid the gap.

DOJ_NMG_0015346

Some healthcare experts predict that many seniors will hit the doughnut hole right before the November elections.

Domenici called the bill a "giant step forward" and said, "When it works it's going to help a lot of people."

But he acknowledged "it's too bad managementwise we haven't got better assistance and put out better word."

Nevertheless, he said he disagrees with Senate colleagues who are proposing a legislative fix to the program, advocating instead for administrative solutions.

"I've heard senators say, 'See? It didn't work. Let's fix it,'" Domenici said. He said that "every management tool should be used to smooth this over as best as possible."

During the meeting, Craig offered a rebuttal to colleagues who said the program offers too many plans and is too confusing.

"My retort was: 'You want one federal program, take it or leave it?'" he said.

Meanwhile, Leavitt is scheduled to meet with Presidcent Bush today.

One Republican senator who might support a legislated change to the program is Sen. John Ensign (Nev.), who voted against the drug plan because of its lack of what he called "cost containment."

Ensign said he thinks Congress should "restructure the program and make it means-tested," meaning that benefits would be based on the recipient's ability to pay.

Senate Republicans are asking tough questions of administration officials to prepare for an expected Democratic assault on the prescription-drug program.

Last week, Democratic strategists Stan Greenberg, James Carville and Matt Hogan circulated a memorandum urging Democratic leaders and allies to focus their criticisms of the Republican Party on Medicare.

"Although the plan is already unpopular, Democrats now have the opportunity to raise opposition to the drug benefits to new heights and use the plan as a powerful symbol of Republican corruption and irresponsibility," the strategists wrote. "Coupled with attacks over budget cuts to Medicare, an assault on the prescription-drug program could cause serious damage to the GOP, especially among seniors."

The strategists reported that opposition to the plan among voters between 50 and 64 years old has risen from 38 percent to 51 percent since the fall and that voters 65 or older are opposed to the program by a 28-point margin.

A Republican Senate aide said that the Democratic tactics are a politically motivated effort to scare seniors away from signing up for a program that would help them.

Still, criticism of the administration's handling of the benefit has come from both sides of the aisle. House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) recently called the early implementation of the benefit "a disaster."

House Democratic leaders circulated a "Dear Colleague" letter last week to Democratic lawmakers, urging them to hold public events, including town-hall meetings and visits to senior centers, criticizing the Medicare program.

The same day that Democratic strategists released their memo, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) held a town hall meeting in San Francisco charging that the Republican program has hurt seniors.

"Hundreds of thousands of Medicare beneficiaries across the country have been unable to get their needed prescriptions, have faced outrageous delays and have been overcharged," Pelosi said.

Sen. Jay Rockefeller (W.Va.), the ranking Democrat on the Health Care Subcommittee of the Senate Finance Committee, said analysts predicted a few years ago that the Republican plan would encounter difficulties because of its complexity.

Rockefeller said that he has put together legislation that would address the problems by eliminating the gaps in prescription-drug coverage experienced by low-income seniors and the disabled. He added that several Democratic colleagues have drafted other plans but that the caucus has decided to wait to reveal a comprehensive party proposal on Medicare.

"The question is whether we come out with plans right now or let them vent," he said, referring to internal squabbles with Republicans over the drug program. "If we came out with a plan right now, Sean Hannity would shred it," referring to the conservative talk-show host and his allies on the right.

A senior Democrat said Democrats would wait until they are closer to Election Day.

Grants To Religious Groups Fall, Study Says (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

Despite the Bush administration's rhetorical support for religious charities, the amount of direct federal grants to faith-based organizations declined from 2002 to 2004, according to a major new study released yesterday.

White House officials immediately disputed the findings. They said they will release their own figures next month showing an increase in federal funding for religious groups.

DOJ_NMG_0015347

The dispute highlighted a lack of independent, widely accepted data about how many federal tax dollars are going to religious organizations, what they are doing with the money and whether they are more, or less, effective than other charities.

Some critics of the President's Faith-Based Initiative have long contended that the administration is shifting who gets money, but not increasing the total amount of federal funding available to shelter the homeless, counsel prisoners and provide other social services.

The study released yesterday "is confirmation of the suspicion I've had all along, that what the faith-based initiative is really all about is de-funding social programs and dumping responsibility for the poor on the charitable sector," said Kay Guinane, director of the nonprofit advocacy program at OMB Watch, a liberal watchdog group in Washington. "It sounds warm and fuzzy, but they've been cutting down the size of the pie all along."

The study by the nonpartisan Roundtable on Religion and Social Welfare Policy examined 28,000 grants made by nine federal agencies over three years. It found that religious charities got an unchanging share -- about 18 percent -- of the money awarded each year.

But because the total pie of available funding shrank by more than $230 million over the three years, the slice that went to religious groups also declined, from $670 million in fiscal 2002 to $626 million in fiscal 2004.

At the same time, the study found that the initiative has succeeded in encouraging more religious groups to apply for funding, and the number receiving grants rose almost 15 percent. "Less federal money is being divided into more grants," the study concluded.

In a telephone interview, the study's authors declined to discuss its political implications. Lisa M. Montiel and David J. Wright said the study focused only on direct federal grants, not monies distributed through block grants to states and municipalities, which are several times larger.

The authors also said they did not attempt to determine how much money went to religious organizations before President Bush took office in 2001. They looked only at grant programs that were in existence for all three years covered by the study, Montiel said, because they were trying to get a picture of the "trend line," not a static snapshot of the money given to religious charities in any one year.

H. James Towey, director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, accused the study of bias, saying it was "only the latest indication of the Roundtable's agenda in opposition to the president's faith-based initiative."

The study did not count grant-making programs that were created after 2002 and ignored such programs as Head Start, which he said was the second-largest source of federal funds for religious organizations, after the Department of Housing and Urban Development's Section 202 housing program for the elderly poor.

"They have picked rotten cherries and come up with a rotten pie," Towey said. "They took a very small sample of programs and grants and are drawing conclusions that are completely inaccurate."

Towey said the White House has been collecting growing amounts of data on grants each year, beginning with two federal agencies in 2002, five in 2003, seven in 2004 and 10 in 2005. When it issues its report for 2005 in March, he said, "we'll look at 25,000 grants in just one year" and "will show there's been an increase every year in the category of competitive, nonformula grants for social services."

Several independent researchers who were not involved in the study defended the Roundtable.

Candy S. Hill, senior vice president for social services at Catholic Charities USA, said the study's findings fit with her experience. "It doesn't surprise me, because overall the funding for most social service programs is shrinking," she said. "We're grateful there's a recognition by the administration of the wonderful work that faith-based groups do, but we continue to be concerned about the levels of funding."

Stanley Carlson-Thies, director of social policy studies at the Center for Public Justice, an evangelical Protestant think tank in Annapolis, said the study "gives the lie to alarmists" who think the administration is funneling vast sums to churches.

"Look at the huge percentage of money that continues to go to secular organizations," said Carlson-Thies, who formerly worked in the White House faith-based office. "The image that there's this Bush push that's going to turn the government into a religious apparatus -- if people think that that's what's happening, they're wrong."

Senator Sees No Rush For Debt Limit Hike (REU-Y2)

By Richard Cowan

Reuters, February 14, 2006

The U.S. Senate might wait until mid-March to raise the U.S. borrowing limit, despite Treasury Department warnings that the government could exceed the current cap within days, a key Senate Republican said on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0015348

Sen. Charles Grassley (news, bio, voting record) of Iowa, who chairs the Finance Committee, said that if the Senate does not raise the $8.18 trillion debt limit this week before the start of a weeklong recess, it would vote before the next recess tentatively set for March 18.

On Monday, a Treasury Department spokesman said the federal government was on track to hit the current debt ceiling by mid-February.

If U.S. borrowing authority is not lifted soon, the Treasury Department could use such extraordinary measures as dipping into several government funds to avoid default, as it has in the past.

Grassley, an Iowa Republican, told Reuters the goal would be to get the debt limit legislation passed "with the least debate."

"I would like to see a bill on any Thursday night just prior to a recess. So if it's not this recess it would be the Thursday before we go home for the other recess and in the meantime I think the Treasury has time to borrow," he said.

Under a nonbinding budget blueprint approved by Congress last spring, the debt limit would rise by $781 billion. Such an increase would bring to more than $3 trillion the total increases in government borrowing authority enacted under President George W. Bush.

Successive years of deficit spending have fed an explosion in U.S. debt. The Bush administration is forecasting a record budget deficit this year of $423 billion.

Asked whether he would seek Senate passage of the full $781 billion debt limit increase, Grassley said, "Well, it might as well be; it doesn't necessarily have to be."

Some conservative House Republicans want to link a debt limit rise to an initiative to reform budget procedures in a way that would force deeper domestic spending cuts.

Pelosi, Others Request New Vote On Budget Bill (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, February 15, 2006

House Democrats, asserting the budget reconciliation measure signed into law last week is constitutionally unsound, called on the chamber's Republican leadership Tuesday to hold a new vote on the bill.

In a letter to Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and an additional seven senior Democratic Members, charged a clerical error has created a "constitutional problem" in upholding the $39 billion deficit reduction bill.

"[W]e urge you to reconsider this legislation this week and to work with the Senate to ensure that any spending reconciliation bill that is passed is identical in both the House and the Senate, as the Constitution demands, and then presented to the president for his signature," the letter states.

Although both the House and Senate passed the deficit reduction act — in both cases, the legislation passed by slim margins, with Vice President Cheney issuing a tie-breaking vote in the Senate — a clerical mistake made to a Medicare provision resulted in the chambers approving technically different versions of the legislation.

Because of that error, the version of the bill signed into law has not been approved by the House.

In the Senate, lawmakers sought to rectify the difference last Wednesday by passing a resolution under unanimous consent intended to clarify the legislation.

The resolution, authored by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), states the deficit reconciliation bill "is deemed the true enrollment of the bill reflecting the intent of the Congress in enacting the bill into law."

It is not yet clear whether the House will take up the measure. A Hastert spokesman did not return a late-afternoon telephone call seeking comment, and the resolution does not appear on the Majority Whip's legislative calendar for this week.

In addition, Democratic lawmakers assert the mistake represents an "abuse of the process" and claim that GOP leaders were aware of the incident prior to the House vote on the bill Feb. 1.

"[W]e can only conclude that the reason that the error was not fixed through a legitimate manner was because it involved another vote that might have failed the second time around," the Democrats assert in the Feb. 14 letter.

The Silencing Of Science (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

One of the benefits of writing newspaper articles is that sometimes, instead of sending anonymous insults, readers call you up and tell you interesting things. Two weeks ago, after news broke that a NASA press officer had resigned amid revelations that he'd tried to muffle the agency's top climate scientist, I got several such calls. All were from people with similar tales of government-funded scientists intimidated by heavy-handed public relations departments. Curiosity piqued, I followed one up, at least as far as the nervous scientists and the equally nervous government press officers would let me. Here's what I learned.

The story begins with the publication of an article -- "Potential Environmental Impact of a Hydrogen Economy on the Stratosphere" -- in the June 2003 issue of the journal Science, which is not exactly beach reading. Yet although crammed with graphs, equations and references to chlorofluorocarbons, the basic premise isn't hard to explain: The five authors, all affiliated at the time with the prestigious California Institute of Technology, wanted to explore the potential long-term impact of hydrogen fuel cells on the Earth's atmosphere.

For those who've forgotten, hydrogen fuel cells were, three State of the Unions ago, the thing that was going to save Americans from their oil addiction and stop the auto emissions that help cause global warming. Nowadays switch grass and biomass are the hot alternative fuels, but back in 2003, the president won applause for proposing "$1.2 billion in research funding so that America can lead the world in developing clean, hydrogen-powered automobiles." On Capitol Hill, there were demonstrations of one such "Freedom Car," and the president called on scientists to be "bold and innovative" in their hydrogen research.

Unfortunately for the authors of "Potential Environmental Impact of a Hydrogen Economy on the Stratosphere," their research, while bold and innovative, didn't exactly mesh with the hype. According to their model, tiny leaks from hydrogen cells, if such cells are ever mass-produced, could cause serious environmental damage. But they made no suggestion of inevitability: One of the study's authors, John Eiler of Caltech, pointed out that foreknowledge of potential environmental problems could "help guide investments in technologies to favor designs that minimize leakage." Presumably thinking along the same lines, NASA, which had helped pay for the research, prepared a news release and news conference on the paper.

Abruptly, both were canceled. Although "we often hear that releases are held up for political reasons," one NASA employee told me, "that one was a surprise: It went all the way to the top and then got killed." In fact, the release and the conference were "killed" by the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy. An official there told me this was because the office wanted to give Energy Department scientists a chance to respond to the study before it was publicized: "Our role is to facilitate interagency cooperation." Coincidentally or not, it also happens that Spencer Abraham, then the energy secretary, was that same week preparing to depart for Brussels, where he was to tell Europeans that U.S. hydrogen research proved the Bush administration cared about the environment.

All of that part of the story is confirmed. The rest -- the story of how none of the scientists ever got government grants for further research on this subject -- is complicated by rumor and hearsay. Eiler, seeing that the Energy Department was looking for proposals to study the environmental impact of hydrogen, applied for a grant to do so. He was turned down on the grounds that he thought were "peculiar" -- that the department was not, in fact, interested in proposals on the subject. Today he gets his only money for related research from the private sector. The National Science Foundation officially rejected another researcher's grant application -- and then unofficially told him that some in the foundation thought the timing of the Science magazine paper had been deliberately designed to embarrass the energy secretary. One of the authors has now changed his research focus, he e-mailed me, to something that "has less politics." Others refused to talk about the paper at all.

None of this means that there really was any government interference in the funding. Another eminent scientist who does related research, Mark Jacobson of Stanford University, told me that while he considered the Science paper "groundbreaking" and "pioneering," because it was "the first to actually go after this issue," he disagreed with the conclusions and methodology, and said that perhaps grant reviewers did too. The science and technology policy office says it is "preposterous" to think that the White House was involved in funding issues. Abraham remembers the trip to Europe but (very plausibly) doesn't recall anything about this contrarian paper at all.

I'm thus left with nothing to report -- except that a fuss over a press release and a rumor about who said what to whom at the National Science Foundation left some scientists feeling, rightly or wrongly, that they'd better stay away from "political" subjects if they want government grants. And, three years down the road, they have.

Fed Nominees Pressed On Political Ties (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

President Bush's decision to elevate three former administration economic advisers to the Federal Reserve Board prompted questions yesterday about whether they would be able to steer the economy independently of the White House they have served.

Bush's most recent Fed nominees, Randall S. Kroszner and Kevin M. Warsh, would join Ben S. Bernanke, who became chairman of the Fed earlier this month after serving for six months as chairman of Bush's Council of Economic Advisers.

Bernanke is scheduled to testify today before the House Financial Services Committee in his first public appearance on Capitol Hill as Fed chief.

If Kroszner and Warsh are confirmed by the Senate, it will mark the first time in many years that three of the seven Fed board members will have recently served in the White House that appointed them, said Thomas Schlesinger, executive director of the Financial Markets Center, a nonprofit group that monitors the Fed.

"This is inevitably going to create the impression that the board is more political than in the past," Schlesinger said. "This creates more of a burden on Bernanke and company to prove they're not taking their cues from [White House Deputy Chief of Staff] Karl Rove."

In past decades, White House officials and members of Congress have pressured Fed officials to keep interest rates low, which is politically popular. But Fed officials are supposed to keep inflation low, which sometimes requires raising interest rates. The Fed also regulates some banks and financial institutions, which can stir up opposition from affected interest groups.

Kroszner, 43, a professor of economics at the University of Chicago's business school, was a CEA member from 2001 to 2003. Warsh, 35, who has served on Bush's National Economic Council for the past four years, is a special assistant to the president for economic policy.

Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (Md.), the ranking Democrat on the Senate Banking Committee, pressed Kroszner and Warsh during their confirmation hearing yesterday on whether they would be able to act independently of outside political pressures.

Both men promised that they would.

"The independence of the Federal Reserve is fundamental to its mission," Kroszner told the committee. "The central bank cannot be a political animal. It must be an independent animal."

Warsh, who worked on Wall Street before joining the Bush administration, said it is "essential for [financial] markets to believe the judgments" of Fed officials are politically impartial. He said he knew he'd be "taking off one hat and putting on another."

Bush's nominee to become CEA chairman, Edward P. Lazear, 57, also promised at the hearing that he would see it as his duty to "inform policymakers in an unbiased and professional manner." Lazear, a professor at Stanford University and a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution, served last year on Bush's advisory commission on tax reform.

Bush has appointed the four other members of the Fed board -- two Republicans, a Democrat and a political independent. The presidents of the 12 regional Fed banks are chosen by their boards of directors and include members of both parties.

Bernanke, 52, a former Princeton University economics professor, served on the Fed board for more than two years before joining the White House. He was renowned during his academic career for his work on monetary policy, the central bank's efforts to influence the economy through controlling the money supply, chiefly by adjusting interest rates.

Kroszner has published research on banking and financial regulation, international banking, financial crises and monetary economics.

Warsh is a lawyer who has worked for Morgan Stanley as an investment banker and as an adviser on mergers and acquisitions.

Some critics have questioned Warsh's credentials for the Fed job.

"There are plenty of people with better résumés to fill the responsibilities of a Fed governor," said Lee Price, research director at the Economic Policy Institute, citing Warsh's lack of experience with banking regulation and monetary policy.

However, Warsh's confirmation appeared assured yesterday when he was warmly endorsed during the hearing by Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.).

Moreover, Senate Banking Committee Chairman Richard C. Shelby (R-Ala.) supports the nominations and plans to move toward holding a committee vote as soon as possible, said committee spokesman Andrew S. Gray.

Shelby "believes that all the nominees performed well in the hearing and demonstrated an ability to engage the many issues they would encounter in their new positions," Gray said.

Fed Nominees' Remarks Portend Debate Over An Inflation Target (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Two nominees to the Federal Reserve Board expressed qualified support for an inflation target, suggesting Chairman Ben Bernanke has more work to do before the central bank adopts one.

The Fed must "provide clarity and transparency about monetary policy making and processes," Randall S. Kroszner, a University of Chicago economist, told the Senate Banking Committee. A target "is one possible way to increase transparency."

White House aide Kevin M. Warsh said, "The markets might well see [a target] as additional clarity and provide some incremental benefit going forward. That's a deliberation I look forward to participating in."

DOJ_NMG_0015351

Mr. Bernanke has long argued such a target will help the public understand the Fed's goals and enable the Fed to better communicate what it is doing and why. He has also said he would press for a target only if he can achieve consensus on the 19-member Federal Open Market Committee. Of those 19 members, 12 vote: the seven governors, including Mr. Bernanke, of the Federal Reserve Board, and five of the 12 reserve-bank presidents.

Current FOMC members are split on support for a target. The fact the two nominees may also need convincing suggests adoption isn't a forgone conclusion.

President Bush nominated Messrs. Kroszner and Warsh to fill two board vacancies. Mr. Bernanke created one vacancy when he left to become chairman of Mr. Bush's Council of Economic Advisers in June. In an appearance on Capitol Hill today, he makes his first major remarks on the economy since becoming Fed chairman Feb. 1.

Appearing before the same panel, Stanford University economist Edward Lazear, nominated to take Mr. Bernanke's old job as chairman of the CEA, called the tax code "chaotic, somewhat inflexible and not necessarily conducive to economic growth." In particular the alternative minimum tax "has really run amok." The AMT was originally aimed at ensuring that the wealthy pay some tax but each year ensnares more upper-middle-income taxpayers.

Mr. Lazear served on Mr. Bush's advisory panel on tax reform, which recommended abolishing the AMT. However, Mr. Bush hasn't indicated when he intends to act on tax reform.

None of the handful of senators at yesterday's hearing objected to any nominee, suggesting confirmation will be straightforward. A committee spokesman said it is "realistic" that the Fed nominees will be confirmed in time for the next FOMC meeting, on March 27-28.

Fed Nominees Vow To Make Inflation Control A Top Priority (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

The nominees for the Federal Reserve, Randall S. Kroszner and Kevin M. Warsh, said yesterday in testimony to the Senate Banking Committee that controlling inflation was the best way to keep the United States economy growing.

Stable prices are "crucial to achieving maximum employment and overall economic stability," Mr. Kroszner, 43, a University of Chicago economist, said. Mr. Warsh, 35, a White House adviser, said he was devoted to keeping prices in check and fostering "maximum sustainable employment."

If confirmed, Mr. Warsh and Mr. Kroszner would join the Fed's board of governors as the central bank begins its biggest transition in almost two decades. Ben S. Bernanke, who succeeded Alan Greenspan as chairman two weeks ago, has pledged more openness and will need support from Fed members for new policies like a numerical inflation goal.

Mr. Bush's nomination of Mr. Warsh, a lawyer by training who would become one of only two members of the Fed's seven-member board of governors without a Ph.D. in economics, has been greeted by criticism and bewilderment by some former Fed officials and economists. They point to his political connections and inexperience, and say the White House could have found a better-known, more qualified choice.

"The Warsh nomination came out of left field," said Tom Schlesinger, executive director of the Financial Markets Center, which monitors the Fed.

If Mr. Warsh and Mr. Kroszner are confirmed, Bush will have appointed all seven members of the Fed board. The reaction to Warsh contrasts with the praise Mr. Bush has received for his other appointments.

The new governors would provide Mr. Bernanke, an academic specialist on central-bank policy, with banking and markets expertise and return the Fed's board to a full seven members for the first time since June.

Following Alan Greenspan (NYT)

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

The new chairman of the Federal Reserve, Ben Bernanke, delivers his first report to Congress today, covering interest rate policy and the Fed's economic forecast for this year and next.

It's a big moment for Mr. Bernanke, and perhaps for the economy. The new chairman's success at establishing his Street cred will be a big factor in controlling that most unpredictable of economic forces: market psychology.

His predecessor, Alan Greenspan, could help by playing the circumspect banker a while longer. Last week, days after becoming a private citizen, Mr. Greenspan talked privately to an audience at Lehman Brothers, the world's biggest bond-trading outfit. His remarks were promptly leaked, and traders quickly concluded that interest rate increases were bound to continue.

The extent to which Mr. Greenspan's remarks moved the markets is debatable. We also don't know how accurate the leaks were. (It does seem unlikely that Mr. Greenspan has suddenly taken to speaking with crystal certainty, as suggested by the traders' interpretation of what he is supposed to have said.)

What's not arguable is that any transition at the Fed is tricky, and that this one is particularly fraught. What will happen to consumption — and economic growth — when the housing boom subsides? Will Mr. Bernanke cut interest rates if housing prices tank, as Mr. Greenspan did after the Internet bubble burst? Would the new chairman even be able to do that, given that higher rates help to attract the foreign capital to cover America's deficits? How would more rate increases affect deeply indebted households?

Mr. Greenspan's devotion to the strength and integrity of the Federal Reserve is beyond doubt; the institution's solidity owes much to his leadership. But the public and the markets need to have confidence in the new chief, and that is best built by hearing from Mr. Bernanke without what is likely to be interpreted as cues from the wings or, worse, cross talk.

Did You Hear The One About The Trade Deficit? (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

The White House Council of Economic Advisers is not generally known for its playful sense of humor. But in the annual Economic Report of the President, released this week, the CEA decided to have a bit of fun with the record $726 billion trade deficit.

At nearly 6 percent of gross domestic product, a deficit that large would in be treated in most other countries like the economic equivalent of Defcon 3. But rather than dwell on the negative, those wry PhDs framed their analysis not as consumption exceeding production (the so-called current account deficit), but as a consequence of cheap foreign capital financing our profligacy (the capital account surplus, which by definition is its mirror image). It's a bit like General Motors, ending a disastrous sales month, declaring what a good period it had been for inventory replenishment.

This upbeat view of the trade deficit reflects the thinking of outgoing CEA chairman Ben Bernanke, who thinks that the root cause of the world's massive economic imbalances is that the rest of the world is producing and saving too much, not that Americans are producing and saving too little. And what makes it possible for these trade deficits -- er, capital account surpluses -- to continue year after year is that foreigners have decided that the best place to stash all the cash they earn from selling us sneakers, computers and oil is right back in the United States.

There is certainly a good deal of truth in the idea of a global "savings glut." When excessive saving in Asia and Europe leads to too much capital flowing into the United States, it has the effect of bidding up the price of real estate and stocks while lowering interest rates. In turn, Americans respond by borrowing more against their newfound paper wealth, using the money to buy more stuff from overseas, creating a self-reinforcing cycle.

Viewed in this way, it is the capital surplus that drives the trade deficit, rather than the other way around. Or put more crudely, it's their fault, not ours.

What's significant about this view is that its chief proponent is no longer just a respected academic advising the president. As the new chairman of the Federal Reserve, Ben Bernanke is now the world's most influential central banker. And his instinct to view trade deficits, and the asset bubbles associated with them, as relatively benign -- or at least outside the scope of the central bank's concern -- could put monetary policy behind the eight ball.

A somewhat different view has recently been offered by Mervyn King, head of the Bank of England, and economist John Makin of the American Enterprise Institute. Their warning is that the "savings glut" is, to a large extent, really a "liquidity glut" caused by central banks, primarily those of China and Japan. For reasons that made sense in the context of sustaining growth and stabilizing prices at home, these central banks wound up printing too much money -- money that is now sloshing around the globe looking for some place to be invested.

Some of this excess liquidity has gone into bidding up the price of stocks, particularly outside the United States. Some of it has gone into real estate, particularly inside the United States. Some of it has been used to bid up the global price of commodities, such as gold or oil futures.

But a big portion of that money has gone into government bonds everywhere, creating a bond market bubble, which has the effect of lowering inflation-adjusted interest rates to ridiculously low levels.

That was evident last month when the interest rate on inflation-adjusted, 50-year British bonds fell to 0.38 percent, well below its historic norm of 2.5 percent. And we saw it last week when the U.S. Treasury, issuing its first 30-year bonds in four years, got $28 billion in bids for $14 billion of bonds being offered, making it cheaper for the Treasury to borrow for 30 years than six months.

The problem, as King and New York Fed President Timothy Geithner laid out in separate speeches last month, is that these asset-market "bubbles" now have the potential to spill over into the real economy, generating excess growth and, eventually, unacceptable levels of inflation. Rather than wait for the full measure of inflation to show up in the official numbers, when it becomes much harder to deal with, they suggest that the Fed and other central banks should consider the economic equivalent of the policy of preemption. The idea is that raising rates earlier to slow the economy and take some air out of asset prices will reduce economic pain later.

Up to now, Bernanke has staunchly opposed the idea that the Fed should prick bubbles or target asset prices. But I suspect he's about to get some polite push back from Geithner and other regional Fed presidents.

As Makin points out, even excluding food and energy, the closely watched index of "core" consumer prices was up 1.8 percent last year, near the top of what the Fed considers its acceptable range. And with labor markets relatively tight, and health, energy and commodity costs putting upward pressure on prices, and a falling dollar likely to raise the price of all those imports, it's likely that the Fed will soon have to break the news that it won't be able to stop raising rates after its next meeting on March 28, as financial markets now expect.

It's at that point that a sense of humor will come in handy.

Senate Scrubs Hearings As Politics Trump Policy In An Election Year (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 — The Senate has never been a bastion of managerial efficiency. But as the campaign season gets into full swing, lawmakers say things are clearly getting worse.

Four cabinet secretaries, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, an Army general and the secretary of the Army were supposed to testify Tuesday morning at hearings on matters including Hurricane Katrina and the Bush administration's proposed budget for foreign affairs.

But their invitations were rescinded and the hearings canceled when the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, scheduled a marathon series of 16 votes on amendments to a pending tax bill — all of them, both parties agree, intended more to score political points than to make policy.

Ultimately, most of those votes were canceled.

They could have been held Monday night, but that did not work for Mr. Frist. He was holding a fund-raiser at his Washington home, with President Bush as the featured guest and some of his Republican colleagues on the guest list, including the Senate whip, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky. The event raised $3.5 million for Republican Senate candidates.

So Mr. Frist put the votes off until Tuesday. Half of them were to be on amendments offered by Democrats.

As Jim Manley, a spokesman for the Democratic leader, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, explained, "They were designed to show that Republicans were favoring tax cuts for the wealthy instead of tax breaks for the middle class."

Republicans had responded with what Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi, the former Republican leader, called eight of "our own blatantly political amendments."

By Tuesday morning cooler heads prevailed, and the number of votes was pared back to three. By that time, though, all of the scheduled hearings had been canceled, leaving a lot of miffed and sheepish senators.

"I look around," Mr. Lott said, "and think, 'Am I the only one who thinks this is stupid?' "

Senator Ted Stevens, Republican of Alaska, said, "It's sort of arrogant of us, isn't it, scheduling them and then not keeping our appointments?"

Stupid, perhaps. Arrogant, maybe. But not entirely out of character for the Senate, where roll-call votes are frequently held late into the night and schedules can change at a moment's notice. Still, some said the organizational chaos was worse than usual, and this being Washington in an election year, many fingers were being pointed.

Mr. Lott, who prided himself on keeping the trains on time when he was majority leader and who might try to return to a leadership spot if he is re-elected in November, said both sides were at fault.

"The Senate continues to fiddle while Rome burns," he said in a long speech on Monday afternoon on the Senate floor. He complained that the Senate had previously voted on similar Democratic amendments and urged Republican leaders to "get a grip on this situation."

Some Democrats, meanwhile, suggested that Republicans had let their fund-raising efforts pre-empt Senate business.

"When you have a Senate that is dictated by airline schedules and fund-raising events, we don't have as many days to work," said Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois. "That's why I'm supporting public financing" for campaigns, he added.

Mr. Frist's chief of staff, Eric Ueland, shot back that the Democrats were the ones practicing the politics of delay.

"It is not Bill Frist who is slowing down the process for obstruction's sake," Mr. Ueland said. "It is Harry Reid who is responsible for this inanity."

But Mr. Reid, a former boxer, defended himself, saying his eight amendments were a show of restraint. "We could have filed 80 or 800," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0015354

In the end, most of the hearing appearances were rescheduled. The Army secretary, Francis J. Harvey, and the general, Peter J. Schoomaker, who is the Army chief of staff, testified on Tuesday afternoon.

Secretary Rice and Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, are expected to appear Wednesday morning. Jim Nicholson, the secretary of veterans affairs, is scheduled to testify Thursday. But an appearance by John W. Snow, the treasury secretary, had not been rescheduled.

Mr. Snow was making his second effort to fulfill a Senate obligation; he was initially to appear last week, but the session was canceled because it conflicted with the funeral for Coretta Scott King.

Mr. Snow's spokesman, Tony Fratto, said the secretary did not mind being invited, uninvited, reinvited and uninvited again. "We try to be understanding about it," Mr. Fratto said. "There aren't any hard feelings."

Still, the changes created confusion. Mr. Reid was asked if a business could be run like the Senate is. "Yeah," he replied, "but not very well."

Westmoreland, Lewis Cool Squabble (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, February 15, 2006

One of the first squabbles to erupt in the growing debate over earmark reform appears to have subsided, after freshman Rep. Lynn Westmoreland (R-Ga.) met with House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) over the weekend.

Westmoreland lashed out at the Appropriations panel in a "Dear Colleague" letter last week, following the leaking of a committee report that detailed the earmark requests of several dozen Members who have signed on as co-sponsors of earmark reform legislation sponsored by Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.).

A Westmoreland aide said that the freshman lawmaker and Lewis discussed the incident Friday afternoon while attending the House GOP retreat in Cambridge, Md.

"The chairman spoke to him and said it was not done with his knowledge or permission, and it was done on the staff level," said Westmoreland aide Brian Robinson.

While it remains unclear whether the source of the leaked information will be reprimanded, it appears that the matter has been settled for now.

"At the end of the day, we're not on the committee," Robinson said. "The Congressman made his concerns known to our leadership and to the chairman of the committee in a personal conversation. That's all that he can do for now. But he has made it very clear ... that the analysis was done at all. It was a blatant attempt to intimidate those seeking reform."

Appropriations Committee spokesman John Scofield declined to comment on the Friday discussion, describing it as a private conversation between Members.

But he did say that the evaluation of Members' earmark requests had not been intended for public distribution.

"It is true that the document was for internal purposes, it was not to be made public," Scofield said.

In the meantime, support for Flake's reform proposal seems to have been largely unaffected by the incident. In all, 63 Members are listed as co-sponsors of the legislation.

Although Flake frequently highlights earmarks he considers particularly offensive, he expressed support for lawmakers included on the list.

"I don't begrudge any rank-and-file Member for seeking earmarks — that's how the game is played here," Flake said in an interview Friday afternoon.

But Flake did take aim at House appropriators, asserting that panel Members are able to "blackmail" lawmakers under current rules.

"They force the rank and file to submit [their requests in writing], so they have a paper trail, so they can blackmail them later," Flake said. "That's what's really objectionable about what they're doing. It's not that these things are kept secret."

Under the Obligation of Funds Transparency Act authored by Flake — one of several reform proposals now being floated in both the House and Senate — earmarks would be included in the text of legislation, rather than attached in committee or conference reports that accompany the bills. That provision would give Members the ability to purge legislation of any earmarks deemed unnecessary once the bill reaches the House floor.

Lewis, likewise, has called for reforming the earmark process and unveiled his own proposal in late January.

In addition to calling for strict limits on the number of earmarks each Member may submit to each Appropriations subcommittee, Lewis has suggested that the process needs greater transparency, requiring Members to file formal request letters not just with each subcommittee but also with the Clerk of the House and to have them printed in the Congressional Record.

The California lawmaker also has stated that any new reforms should apply not only to his own panel but to authorizing committees as well.

Job Competition Victory By NIH Workers Is More The Rule Than The Exception (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

One of the largest job reviews at the National Institutes of Health has ended, with about 380 federal employees involved in property management prevailing in a competition against a private-sector bidder.

The job competition began in October 2002 and involved a group of employees who provide services in property management and operations, construction management and central utilities.

NIH said that the employee team won when the government's proposal, known as a "most efficient organization," was determined to be the lowest-cost plan. NIH said the long-running competition had been extended under a settlement agreement, which called for a reevaluation of the offers, between NIH and an unsuccessful bidder.

The NIH's statement did not say how much money would be saved by keeping the work in the agency. In the statement, Elias A. Zerhouni , NIH's director, said, "Now our challenge is to successfully implement the new management process, manage more wisely and effectively carry out the NIH mission to improve people's health."

NIH has run more than two dozen job competitions since 2002. Of those decided, most have kept the work in-house.

Across government, federal employees have been winning about 90 percent of job competitions. In numerous cases, the in-house team has reduced staffing and revamped operations in order to win.

The Bush administration began a push in 2001 to review the government's "commercial activities" to see whether the work could be performed at less cost by contractors. The initiative, known as competitive sourcing, has roiled much of the federal workforce and led unions to lobby against the initiative on Capitol Hill.

Unions contend that such outsourcing does not produce long-term budget savings, but the Office of Management and Budget reported this month that agencies are on track to produce savings of $900 million a year because of competitive sourcing.FEMA

Department of Homeland Security officials will be conferring with Congress and the White House on Secretary Michael Chertoff's proposal to create a full-time cadre at the Federal Emergency Management Agency to respond to catastrophic events.

The government has been criticized for waiting too long to respond to Hurricane Katrina, which killed more than 1,300 people. Chertoff said Monday that he would like to create a response force of 1,500 FEMA employees, which his spokesman said would probably be a mix of new hires and transfers from elsewhere in the department.

"We're talking about our interest in a substantial increase in the permanent base of FEMA employees, specifically to deploy in response to catastrophic events," department spokesman Russ Knocke said.

FEMA relies on volunteers in the field to provide disaster relief and recovery assistance. The agency has about 2,500 full-time employees and relies on about 3,493 seasonal and reserve workers who can be called into action for disasters.

The proposal for a 1,500-person response force is not part of the president's fiscal 2007 budget request for FEMA. That request includes $29 million to "strengthen operational capability" and fill job vacancies at FEMA.Retirements

Helene Deramond , team leader for the protection of human subjects in research for the Education Department, will retire March 1 after 30 years of federal service.

Mark Gillen , director of the office of program evaluation and risk analysis at the Internal Revenue Service, will retire March 3 after more than 37 years of government service. During his career, he also worked at the General Accounting Office, Health Care Financing Administration, Defense Contract Audit Agency and the House Appropriations and Ways and Means committees. Federal Web Search Upgraded (WP)

By Caroline E. Mayer

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

Need to know how many calories are in that margarita you drank last night?

The temperature at the beach you hope to go to this weekend?

How many minutes your flight will be delayed because of high winds in Newark?

Or the winning number in the Pennsylvania lottery?

The answers are at a comprehensive one-stop federal Web site, FirstGov.gov, the official gateway to federal, state and local government Web sites and documents.

DOJ_NMG_0015356

The nearly six-year-old Web site, which has won innovation awards for being consumer-friendly, has just been updated to make it easier for consumers, businesses and federal employees to find a mind-boggling array of information from A (airline complaints) to Z (Zip codes). With a click or two of the mouse, users can download tax forms, collect all sorts of economic trivia or play educational online games to learn about consumer scams and how to avoid them, of course.

FirstGov launched a powerful new search engine last month, expanding the number of accessible documents from 8 million to 40 million, including more state and local Web sites. Perhaps equally significant for time-constrained browsers, the new search engine uses improved algorithms to provide more relevant results.

With the old search engine, for example, a search for "baseball" brought up the Web site Afterschool.gov because it features a picture of a boy holding a baseball bat. With the new search engine, that same search steers you to a list of World Series winners. (Who knew the government even had such information?)

Using the old search engine, a person who typed "Social Security" in the search box would get a link to the Social Security Administration and related Web sites, including the President's Commission to Strengthen Social Security.

The same search today turns up a list of frequently asked questions, such as "What are the Social Security and Medicare increases the government has in store for 2006?" or "How do I contact Social Security's nationwide Toll-Free Hotline?" There is also a special section where a browser can further refine the field of research by choosing retirement or disability, as well as a tab to easily download federal forms.

Consumers in the market for a new car can just enter a make and model to get gas mileage and crash test results on a single page. In the past, it would have taken visits to two different government Web sites (one by the Environmental Protection Agency, the other by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration) to get the data.

"All this information is out in the government, but it does you no good if you can't find it," said M.J. Pizzella, associate administrator of the General Services Administration's Office of Citizen Services and Communications, which oversees FirstGov.gov.

The government had been running its own search operations -- at an estimated annual cost of $3.2 million. The new search engine is being operated for $1.8 million a year under a contract with two private companies: Microsoft Corp. and Vivisimo Inc.

FirstGov.gov also offers podcasts, as well as Espanol.gov for Spanish-speaking consumers.

By presenting frequently asked questions and special sections to allow consumers to refine their initial search, FirstGov is more than a Google for government, said Larry Freed, president of ForeSee Results, a Michigan firm that measures customer satisfaction of Internet sites. "It's sort of a Google-plus" because you do not have to rely on scrolling through pages and pages of search results to find what you want, Freed said.

Launched in the last days of the Clinton administration, FirstGov was revamped in 2002 to make it easier to use. At that time, the goal was "three clicks to service." But under the latest redesign, just one or two clicks may be all that is needed.

When the site began, "customer satisfaction was fairly low," Freed said. But the government "has made great strides," he said. "Is the government really building Web sites for me? They are, and it's a win-win for the government and consumers. Consumers are getting more information, and the government is lowering its cost by making it easier to get information off the Web," helping reduce calls to call centers.

US Retail Sales Beat Expectations (FT)

By Andrew Balls and Christopher Swann

Financial Times, February 15, 2006

Americans stormed the shops in January, pushing retail sales up 2.3 per cent and laying to rest fears that consumer spending was starting to fade.

Economists said the reading was boosted by unseasonably warm weather, with Americans basking in the warmest January since records began in 1895. Christmas gift cards may also have boosted January sales, as they are only recorded as retail spending when redeemed in the shops.

But there were signs of underlying strength in spending across virtually all sectors, setting up a strong start to the year after weak consumer spending growth in the fourth quarter. Retail sales for December were revised slightly lower, to 0.4 per cent from the Commerce Department's initial reading of 0.7 per cent

The rise in the headline retail sales last month was more than double the Wall Street consensus forecast of 0.9 per cent, with strong readings for clothing, furniture, electronics and building materials sales.

Stripping out car sales, a volatile component of the report, sales rose 2.2 per cent, the strongest reading in six years, and again far higher than the 0.8 per cent consensus. Spending at petrol stations rose 5.5 per cent in January, but excluding autos and petrol, core sales still rose 1.8 per cent.

Bond prices dropped slightly after the report. Since the middle of January, the yield on the two-year and 10-year notes have both risen by about 30 basis points, to 4.57 and 4.6 per cent respectively.

Ben Bernanke, chairman of the Federal Reserve, gives testimony before Congress on Wednesday, on the central bank's monetary policy report to Congress.

Tuesday's retail figures, and other recent indications, support the Fed's view, expressed when it raised interest rates at the end of last month, that the economic expansion remains solid in spite of a temporary dip in the fourth quarter.

Futures markets are pricing in the near certainty of another rate increase at the first meeting of the Federal Open Market Committee that Mr Bernanke will chair, at the end of March, and a good chance of another rate increase in May, bringing the federal funds rate to 5 per cent. A month ago, investors saw an increase at the March meeting as doubtful.

"There is no sign at all now that US consumers have started to tighten their belts," Nigel Gault, head of US research at Global Insight, the consultancy, said. "This will increase the chances that the Federal Reserve will continue to raise rates up until May."

Strong sales in January, as warm weather encouraged people to shop for spring clothes, is likely to have borrowed from spending later in the quarter, economists said, with the cold weather in the northeast also expected to depress sales in February.

Consumers Spend January Shopping (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Retail sales rose at the fastest pace in more than four years in January as consumers cashed in holiday gift cards and unusually warm weather enticed shoppers to get out of their homes and spend, the government said Tuesday.

The report was a surprise. Economists, including those surveyed by USA TODAY earlier this year, have been anticipating that consumer spending growth would slow in 2006. Such a slowing is still anticipated as the housing market cools and related purchases, such as couches and carpeting, ease and consumers pocket less money when they sell.

But with consumer spending accounting for 70% of U.S. economic activity, the boost in January suggests the overall economy began 2006 on solid footing.

"It's a good sign that the consumer has some momentum going into the start of the year, and that probably reflects the fact that the labor market is continuing to improve, albeit modestly," says Patrick Fearon, senior economist at A.G. Edwards in St. Louis. "It's a positive for economic growth."

Retail sales rose a seasonally adjusted 2.3% in January from December, the Commerce Department said. That was up from a 0.4% gain in December and was the largest rise since October 2001, when sales rebounded after a lull following the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Sales rose across a broad range of categories, including at car dealerships, furniture stores, building material and garden equipment dealers, clothing retailers and restaurants and bars. Higher gasoline prices also led to an increase in sales at gas stations.

The only category that saw a decline in sales was "non-store retailers," which includes websites. Sales in that sector fell 2.6%, the first decline since July.

Weather played a key part in the sales gain in January, says Michael Niemira, chief economist at the International Council of Shopping Centers. January was the warmest on record, according to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. The average temperature was 39.5 degrees, 8.5 degrees above the 1895-2005 mean.

Such warm weather not only gets people out of their homes, but it inspires them to buy spring items, which often hit store shelves in January, Niemira says.

"Weather was a big catalyst," Niemira says.

Holiday gift card sales also helped increase sales in January, says National Retail Federation chief economist Rosalind Wells. Gift cards are counted in retailers' sales when they are redeemed, not when they are sold. Consumers often spend above the amounts of their gift cards, providing a further boost to sales.

Niemira says because of the influence of gift cards and weather, January's strength is unlikely to be repeated in coming months. "It'll be a very choppy pattern," he says.

Retail Sales Surge 2.3%, Underlining Economy's Health (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

DOJ_NMG_0015358

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

Consumers went on a postholiday shopping spree in January, a strong sign of economic vigor that increases the likelihood the Federal Reserve will keep raising short-term interest rates.

The Commerce Department said yesterday that retail sales surged a seasonally adjusted 2.3% in January from December, largely because of gift-card redemptions and abnormally mild winter weather. The January jump followed a tepid 0.4% rise in December. January sales were up 8.8% from a year earlier.

Coming after an earlier report that employers added nearly 200,000 jobs in January and pushed the unemployment rate down to 4.7%, the retail-sales report was cheered as evidence that the economy has roared back from a fourth-quarter lull. "It wipes out the weakness we saw in preceding months," said Peter Hooper, chief U.S. economist at Deutsche Bank. "We were expecting the fourth-quarter slowdown was transitory. This confirms that."

Reflecting such optimism, as well as a decline in oil prices, investors sent the Dow Jones Industrial Average surging 136.07 points, or 1.3%, yesterday to close at 11028.39 -- its best one-day gain since late October. (See related article1.)

Many economists had anticipated a strong increase in retail sales after the weak showing of December, especially in light of earlier reports of strong auto sales in January, but few expected such robust growth. Even excluding the 2.9% increase in sales of motor vehicles and parts and a 5.5% rise in gasoline-station sales driven by higher pump prices, the remainder of January retail sales -- everything from department stores to bars -- were up 1.8% from December, when such sales rose just 0.3%.

"It was extraordinary," said Rosalind Wells, chief economist at the National Retail Federation, a trade group.

With overall consumer spending so vigorous last month, Peter Kretzmer, senior economist at Bank of America Corp., said he now believes the economy will expand at more than a 5% annual rate in the first quarter, rebounding from the 1.1% growth rate of the fourth quarter of 2005. Based on recent data, many economists now expect the government to revise up the fourth-quarter estimate to around 1.3% when it issues new data on Feb. 28.

After weighing recent indicators showing low unemployment, rising wages, elevated consumer confidence and a healthy manufacturing sector, markets now seem assured the Fed will raise its target for short-term interest rates by another quarter percentage point to 4.75% at its March 27-28 meeting -- the first for new Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke. Mr. Bernanke makes his debut in Congress as Fed chairman today to give testimony on the economy and monetary policy to the House Financial Services Committee.

"We already thought there was going to be another hike in March," Mr. Kretzmer said. "To say that this cements it is probably an understatement."

Ms. Wells of the retail federation and other economists cautioned that two primary drivers of January's sales growth -- balmy weather and gift-card purchases -- will likely evaporate this month, particularly after a blizzard last weekend snowed in consumers throughout the Northeast. Discount chain Target Corp. yesterday said colder weather will hurt February sales and that it now expects sales of stores open more than a year to climb 2.5% to 3.5% in February, down from its previous prediction of 2.5% to 4.5% growth.

The January bounce was "a one-month shot," Ms. Wells said. "We're likely to see weak February sales because of the blizzards in the Northeast, and then generally I think the economy is going to slow as the year goes on."

Many industries posted increases in January. Sales at clothing stores leapt 4.2% from the previous month, while sales at department stores rose 1.6%, and at electronics and appliance dealers, 2%. Sales in all three categories fell in December.

There was good news for housing-related businesses, too. Sales at furniture stores were up 3.7%, after falling 1.1% in December. Sales at building-material and garden-equipment suppliers, an indicator of home-remodeling activity thought to be particularly sensitive to signs of a cool down in the housing market, were up 3.4%, after December's 0.2% decline. The data suggest the slowdown in home-price appreciation has yet to crimp consumer spending and reinforce the view that the housing market is in for a soft landing rather than a broader crash.

Grocery-store sales were flat, though, and sales at Internet, catalog and other "nonstore retailers," as the Commerce Department calls them, fell 2.6% in January, another strong indication that consumers took advantage of January's unusually mild weather to visit brick-and-mortar stores.

Meanwhile, the Commerce Department reported yesterday that business inventories rose 0.7% in December after a 0.6% increase in November. Inventories, however, were outpaced by a 1.2% jump in sales, the largest monthly increase in nearly a year.

Retail Sales See Best Gains Since Late '99 (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, February 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0015359

Consumers, energized by unusually warm weather and the tame heating bills that went with it, hit the malls with gusto last month, sending retail sales soaring by 2.2 percent -- the biggest jump in six years.

The sales spurt, which coincided yesterday with a drop in premium crude oil prices below the psychological threshold of $60 a barrel, sent the Dow Jones Industrial Average surging by 136 points to 11,028.

"You have lower oil prices; you have a healthy employment situation; and you have a consumer that is still willing to do a little bit of spending," said Gordon Fowler, chief investment officer at Glenmede Trust Co. "That all adds up to a positive for the economy."

The biggest drawback is that the consumer rebound may encourage the Federal Reserve to keep raising interest rates -- a possibility that newly installed Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke is expected to address in testimony today.

Triggering the excitement yesterday was a Commerce Department report showing that retail sales, excluding autos, last month zoomed the most since December 1999 after inching up 0.2 percent in December. Including autos, sales were up 2.3 percent -- the biggest jump since May 2004.

"It looked like consumers were hibernating in December, and all they needed was an excuse to go on a spending spree," said Brian Bethune, an economist at Global Insight Inc. "The weather provided that."

Consumers often stay at home during cold and snowy weather. But last month they enjoyed springlike conditions in many areas, with January making history books as the warmest in a century.

Aside from inspiring the urge to shop, one major boon from the mild weather was that a widely anticipated spike in winter heating bills never occurred. Many consumers had been bracing for big bills after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita struck in August and September and sent the price of natural gas and heating oil spiraling to record levels.

By yesterday, oil and gas prices had fallen to pre-hurricane levels as the warm weather sapped the demand for fuel. Many utilities fear they may be left with unused stores of fuel they stockpiled for the winter.

The lower heating bills appear to have left some homeowners with spare change that they spent shopping.

"Retail sales posted stunning results," said Scott Hoyt, analyst with Moody's Economy.com, noting that sales at clothing stores soared by 4.6 percent while department stores rang up a 1.6 percent jump in sales. Over the year, sales were up by nearly 9 percent.

The sales rebound boosted the stocks of Wal-Mart, Home Depot and other retailers yesterday.

The exceptional spending spurt could spur growth as strong as 5 percent in the first quarter, up from an anemic 1.1 percent pace set in the fourth quarter of 2005, economists said.

Many economists had been expecting consumer spending to remain subdued because consumers had been on a debt binge that culminated last year with them spending more than they earn, collectively, for the first time since the Great Depression.

One explanation of the spending surge is that consumers took advantage of gift cards that were sold widely at Christmas. The popularity of gift cards has extended the Christmas shopping season -- the busiest of the year -- increasingly into January, which traditionally had been a slow sales month. Gift cards do not count as sales until they are redeemed.

Analysts say the jump in sales likely was exaggerated because the Commerce Department's adjustments for seasonal variations in spending likely are not fully taking into account the new Christmas spending pattern.

The department figures also are not adjusted to reflect price increases, thus the sales figures were inflated by higher prices, such as those for gasoline during the month.

What Fuel Bills? U.S. Consumers Still Spending (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj And Michael Barbaro

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

Shaking off a middling holiday shopping season and fears of higher heating bills, Americans spent freely in January, the government reported yesterday, providing reassurance that the economy is beginning the new year with fresh strength.

Buoyed by the unexpectedly robust spending data and a drop in oil prices, investors sent stocks higher across the board. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 1 percent, to 1,275.53, and the Dow Jones industrial average closed above the 11,000 level again, climbing 1.3 percent, to 11,028.39. Crude oil prices dipped below $60 for the first time since late December.

"The momentum going into 2006 is clearly healthy," said Anthony Chan, chief economist at J. P. Morgan's private client services group. "We will be able to withstand weaker growth for the rest of the quarter and almost not miss a heartbeat."

While many economists expect spending increases to slow for the rest of the winter, the strong consumer spending and solid job gains last month helped overcome fears that economic growth was about to stagger under the weight of rising energy costs, higher interest rates and a slowing housing market. The jump in retail sales virtually assures that economic growth, which slowed to just 1.1 percent for the final quarter of 2005, will register a much stronger showing in the first quarter of 2006.

Retail sales jumped 2.3 percent last month, recovering from a modest 0.4 gain in December, to register their biggest monthly increase since May 2004. Americans, flush with year-end bonuses, took advantage of the warmest January on record, leftover gift cards and enticing discounts to shop avidly for clothes, furniture and cars.

There was little doubt that the unusually warm weather last month contributed to the strong start for the economy this year. Temperatures averaged 39 degrees for the country as a whole — the highest on record for January — and 8.5 degrees warmer than the average for the month, according to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

Warmer weather helped bolster inventories of oil, natural gas and other energy sources, pushing down prices — at least for now — and leaving consumers more to spend on other things like food and clothes.

Gary Nicosia, 29, a waiter in Buffalo, said mild weather shaved $100 from his home heating bill last month and let him dine out, guilt-free, two to three times a week.

"It was so warm out we had our windows open," he said.

Sales at restaurants and bars, a measure some economists look to as a barometer of consumer sentiment, rose 3.2 percent in January.

The increasing use of gift cards, which stores count as sales when they are redeemed, appears to have pushed some holiday sales into January from December. The National Retail Federation had projected that gift card sales would increase 7 percent, to $18.5 billion, during the holiday shopping season.

Many retailers, including Abercrombie & Fitch and Coach, introduced spring lines earlier than usual to entice consumers back into their stores, stocking polo shirts and floral-patterned handbags in midwinter.

"There is no question gift cards helped," said Peter E. Nordstrom, president of full-line stores at Nordstrom, the high-end department store, which reported strong sales of handbags, sunglasses and lingerie.

Over all, sales at department stores rose 1.6 percent last month after a relatively weak holiday season.

January proved a strong month for a wide range of retailers, including chains like Gap and Kmart, which have struggled for much of the last year.

Still, the role of the weather and gift cards — both seen as one-time benefits — suggest that January's economic gains are not likely to maintain their strength over the next few months.

Already, the weather has turned markedly cooler and last weekend's record snowfall in the Northeast forced some store closures in New York City and elsewhere.

Economists also noted that gasoline prices and other energy costs, in spite of the recent drop, could easily reverse course with a persistent cold snap.

"We will see much weaker sales in February," said Rosalind Wells, chief economist for the National Retail Federation. "I think consumers will be harder pressed to spend the way they have been spending."

But few analysts now fear that consumer spending will fall off a cliff. Job gains and wage growth, typically the leading factor in consumer behavior, appear to be on an upward trajectory after their post-Katrina sluggishness of last fall. The economy added 193,000 jobs in January; wages rose 0.4 percent; and the unemployment rate dropped to 4.7 percent, its lowest level in four and a half years.

"The deep fundamentals, the personal income numbers, are healthy," said Gregory Miller, chief economist at SunTrust Bank in Atlanta.

With growth picking up again, economists now expect the Federal Reserve to increase its benchmark short-term interest rate, currently at 4.5 percent, at least once but possibly twice more over the next few months before it brings its tightening cycle to an close. They will be paying particularly close attention today and tomorrow to the Fed's new chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, who is scheduled to testify to Congress for the first time since replacing Alan Greenspan.

"The way data is coming in sort of confirms the high probability that the Fed goes to 5 percent," Mr. Miller said.

Juiced-up Dow Spills Over 11,000 Once Again (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, February 15, 2006

NEW YORK — A big dip in oil prices and a report showing consumers shopped till they dropped in January gave cautious investors a reason to buy stocks again, propelling the Dow Jones industrial average back above 11,000.

The Dow gained 136 points to 11,028, its first close above 11,000 since Jan. 11 and 15 points shy of a 4½-year high. The Dow has closed and stayed above 11,000 for at least one day on 20 prior occasions, only to relapse, raising doubts that it can sustain this move.

DOJ_NMG_0015361

The gain surprised some market strategists because it occurred on the eve of new Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's first testimony before Congress today and Thursday. “Anytime you have a new guy at the helm you don't know how he's going to work out,” says Ken Tower, strategist at CyberTrader.

After topping 11,000 earlier this year for the first time since June 2001, stocks have been weighed down by concerns over the direction of monetary policy under Bernanke. Over the next two days investors will be closely analyzing Bernanke's comments to lawmakers, seeking clues as to whether the Fed is nearing the end of its 19-month campaign of rate increases.

But interest rate worries were overshadowed by crude's $1.67 drop to $59.57 a barrel — the first close below $60 this year. Also helping: better-than-expected 2.3% growth in January retail sales that signaled consumers continue to spend and aren't tapped out.

“The perfect scenario,” says Quincy Crosby, strategist at The Hartford, “is the Fed does its job, wrings out inflation pressures, but the economy remains standing and the consumer doesn't end up dead.”

Investors have fretted that consumer spending would slow after the Fed raised rates 14 straight times since June 2004, boosting short-term rates to 4.5% from 1%. Now they hope Bernanke will lead Fed policymakers to raise rates just one more time, to 4.75%, at their March meeting. Tuesday's rally was driven in part by belief that he won't surprise investors by suggesting more rate increases are needed to control inflation.

“The market is clearly expecting some positive news on interest rate policy,” says Sung Won Sohn, CEO of Hanmi Bank.

Alan Skrainka, strategist at Edward Jones, says investors are focusing too much on interest rates and oil. “The economy is strong and corporate earnings continue to grow,” he says. Skrainka believes stocks are attractive right now. Stocks in the Standard & Poor's 500 are trading at just 15 times expected earnings in 2006, which is the cheapest since 1996.

Retail-Sales Data Boosts Stocks (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

Call it the gift-card rally.

A government report that retail sales rose 2.3% in January, nearly triple the pace expected and the strongest increase since May 2004 helped send the Dow Jones Industrial Average above 11000 for the first time since Jan. 12.

Mild weather and a wave of shoppers cashing in holiday gift cards were two factors behind the increase in retail sales, analysts said.

The Dow industrials surged 136.07 points, or 1.25%, to 11028.39 for their biggest gain since Oct. 28. Only two components -- Pfizer and Exxon Mobil -- were down. Alcoa, one of Tuesday's chief drags on the average, added 3.7%, making it the best-performing component. Retail stocks also rallied: Home Depot gained 3.6% and Wal-Mart Stores added 2.1%.

Light, sweet crude fell $1.67 to $59.57 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Gold for April delivery rose $6.80 to $548.90 an ounce on the Nymex. Treasury prices declined. Energy sensitive stocks jumped as crude-oil prices declined again. The Dow Jones Transportation Average, which tracks trucks, trains and airlines, surged 109.45, or 2.6%, to 4407.78, a record close.

There were some unusual circumstances behind the jump in retail sales last month. But economists said the report is evidence that consumer spending remains in good shape despite frequent warnings to the contrary. "The improvement in the labor market is the real deal, and something that will continue," said Carl Steidtmann, chief economist at Deloitte Research. That "puts the consumer in a position to continue spending."

Heading into 2006, most economists forecast an economic slowdown this year, largely because of expectations that consumer spending would decline. While one month's data don't wipe the crystal ball clean, analysts said, they do lead to a more upbeat outlook1 for the first quarter.

"With these good economic numbers, strong retail sales and lower energy prices" there's more optimism that first-quarter earnings could come in better than expected, said Barry Hyman, equity market strategist at Ehrenkrantz King Nussbaum.

Strong economic reports have caused concern that the Federal Reserve may raise interest rates too far. But investors took Tuesday's report as a sign that the economy could weather a few more increases. The Fed is "raising rates because the economy is strong," said Mr. Steidtmann. "Yes, interest rates will go higher, but that's a reflection of the strength of the economy."

Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist at High Frequency Economics, said the report indicates that the economy will grow by 4% or more during the first quarter, up sharply from the 1.1% pace seen during the fourth quarter of 2005. Most economists expect the fourth-quarter numbers will be adjusted upward.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index added 12.67, or 1%, to 1275.53 and the Nasdaq Composite Index added 22.36, or 1%, to 2262.17. One stock that didn't join in on the rally: Google, which slid nearly 1% to $343, adding on to its 27% skid from its all-time high of $471.63 a share, hit on Jan. 11.

A number of investors were likely caught leaning the wrong way in what's been a downward-trending market, said Robert Pavlik, chief investment officer at Oaktree Asset Management. Those betting the market would fall, in some cases using short sales -- borrowing and selling stock, hoping to buy it back later at a cheaper price and pocket the difference -- likely had to cover their bets to stave off worse losses, creating what is known as a classic short-squeeze rally.

"It obviously caught a lot of people by surprise how big retail sales were," said Bill Groenveld, head trader at vFinance Investments. He said the steady decline by crude, which has declined in nine of the last 11 trading sessions, is also starting to relieve fears that high commodity prices could push up inflation.

Inflation jitters have been a thorn in Wall Street's side in February after a strong January employment report raised concerns that the Fed would keep raising rates to slow growth. Those concerns have been amplified this week ahead of congressional testimony by new Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke on Wednesday.

The sales reports also cheered investors concerned that a slowing housing market will eat into consumers' discretionary income, as fewer home owners refinance their mortgages. Recent downward guidance by luxury-home builder Toll Brothers raised the stakes on those worries.

Another dark cloud floated over the housing market Tuesday after KB Home said that canceled orders rose in the first two months of the year, while net orders for new homes declined. Despite the increasingly negative tone, shares of home builders advanced Tuesday amid the broad market rally. Both KB Home and Toll Brothers gained nearly 2% after declining in early trading. The Philadelphia Housing Sector index gained 1.9%.

Lawmakers Plan An Effort To Reverse Royalty Relief (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 — Democratic lawmakers and the White House both said on Tuesday that oil and gas companies should not receive lucrative incentives when energy prices are near record highs.

The lawmakers and senior Bush administration officials were responding to a report in The New York Times on Tuesday that energy companies are expected to avoid $7 billion in royalty payments to the federal government over the next five years.

The Interior Department forecasts that energy companies will produce about $65 billion worth of oil and gas in federal waters in the Gulf of Mexico on which they will not pay any royalties to taxpayers.

Administration officials say their hands are tied on the royalties by laws dating back to 1996 and then sweetened by the Clinton administration.

Two Senate Democrats, Ron Wyden of Oregon and Maria Cantwell of Washington State, said that they were drafting legislation to change the government's rules.

"Given oil and natural gas prices that are expected to hover near record levels for the foreseeable future, we question whether royalty relief for these companies is necessary or appropriate," the two lawmakers said in a letter to Senator Pete V. Domenici of New Mexico, the Republican chairman of the Senate energy committee.

In the House, four leading Democrats said they would introduce a bill this week to stop the incentives immediately.

"The American people are getting stood up and hung out to dry," said Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts.

But while Mr. Markey and other Democrats blamed the Bush administration, White House officials sharply retorted that the incentives stemmed largely from specific decisions that the Clinton administration made in 1998 and 1999. At the time, the government was seeking to increase domestic production at a time when prices were comparatively low.

President Bush "opposed additional incentives for oil companies with the price of oil where it is," said Scott McClellan, the White House spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0015363

Administration officials did not suggest that they would try to halt the benefits that energy companies are expected to receive on the basis of existing regulations. And some Congressional analysts were skeptical that Congress had the power to alter commitments now embedded in thousands of federal leases that energy companies bid on through auctions.

In general, the Interior Department charges energy companies that pump oil and gas on federal property a royalty of 12 percent or 16 percent on the sales value of what they produce. But the government has also given billions of dollars' worth of "royalty relief" to companies that drill in deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico.

In most cases, government regulations also suspend those benefits when energy prices climb above certain "threshold levels," which have been exceeded for more than two years now.

The Clinton administration waived those price limitations for leases awarded in 1998 and 1999, however, and the Interior Department estimates that those leases will account for most of the $65 billion in royalty-free oil and gas pumped over the next five years.

A number of energy companies are challenging the Interior Department's authority to stop the giveaways for any leases awarded from 1996 to 2000.

The companies argue that Congress never gave the administration authority to impose "price thresholds" during those five years.

Administration officials said last week that Kerr-McGee Exploration and Production has informed them that it will take the government to court. Nine other companies have challenged the government's authority to demand about $132 million in royalties owed in 2004.

If Kerr-McGee wins its case, the government could end up losing at least another $28 billion in royalties over the next five years.

The Interior Department said Kerr-McGee and two other companies had refused to pay back royalties for 2004.

But one of the companies that government officials said had refused to pay — Agip, a subsidiary of ENI of Italy — said on Tuesday that it was not disputing any royalties and did not believe it was in arrears.

Allan Hubbard (CSM)

By David T. Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, February 15, 2006

Allan Hubbard, assistant to the president for economic policy and director of the National Economic Council, was Tuesday's guest. Here are excerpts from his remarks:

On reports that current law will allow oil companies to pump $65 billion worth of oil and gas from federal lands without paying royalties:

"As the president has said, when you have oil ... north of $40 [a barrel] ... you don't need to be providing incentives to oil and gas companies to drill and we should be collecting the appropriate amount of royalties."

On Republican economist Bruce Bartlett charging in a new book that Bush administration economic policies are "developed on the fly and in secret with little or no analysis or forethought."

"It is a very thorough, thoughtful process inviting wide par-ticipation within the administration. We also talk to experts outside the administration."

On the president's push for Health Savings Accounts so workers can contribute pre-tax dollars to pay the high deductible amounts on their health insurance:

"We will know it is working when growth in healthcare starts to slow down.... [I]f people do pay for the service ... it has a huge impact on [bringing down the] price."

On the need to repair the federal tax system:

"It is obviously not a priority right now but it is not something the president is going to give up on. He very much believes the tax system is broken, it is impossible to understand.... It needs reform."

K Street Keeps Growing (HILL)

By Jim Snyder And Jeffrey Young

The Hill, February 15, 2006

Lobbyists had a banner 2005, the year before simmering controversies involving Jack Abramoff and former Rep. Randy “Duke” Cunningham (R-Calif.) boiled over outside the Beltway and brought new pressures on Capitol Hill to keep lobbyists at arm’s length.

Early returns on end-of-year revenues show strong growth all along Washington’s lobbying corridor.

DOJ_NMG_0015364

Several well-known firms reported a revenue jump greater than 20 percent, including Barbour Griffith & Rogers, Quinn Gillespie & Associates, the Federalist Group and the Livingston Group, as a series of policy and legislative efforts brought new business to K Street, from Social Security reform to a national energy plan to the budget bill.

Reigning number one, Patton Boggs, reported an even better 2005. It made $37 million last year, up from roughly $31 million it took in in 2004.

Cassidy & Associates, which ended 2004 number two, reported more modest growth. It had revenues of $28.34 million in 2005, up from $27 million in 2004. Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, number three, reported revenues of $28.58 for the year, up from its $27.6 million in 2004.

With Congress eyeing new curbs on earmarks and congressional travel in response to scandals, 2005 could wind up being a high-water mark for the lobbying industry.

But lobbyists said that so far their business hasn't suffered under the intense spotlight, as both retainers and client lists are continuing to grow.

James Chapman, co-chairman of the government-relations practice at Bracewell & Giuliani, a Texas-based firm that former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani joined in 2004, said the firm has been "busier than ever" in a range of policy areas. He said he didn't see much potential for a lag, despite the push for lobbying reform.

The firm reported sharp growth on revenues of $9 million, up from around $6 million in 2004, Chapman, a former Democratic congressman from Texas, told The Hill.

Firms were required to file end-of-year revenue figures, commonly called LDAs for the Lobbying Disclosure Act that established reporting requirements, by midnight.

A complete list of the top firms' totals for the year was not available by press time. Several of the largest were still compiling their registrations at 5 p.m.

Figures for Van Scoyoc Associates, Dutko Worldwide, Williams & Jensen, DLA Piper Rudnick were unavailable. For big firms, lobbying reports often run hundreds of pages long, and several lobbyists reported taking extra care in light of recent scandals to ensure that their figures were accurate. A few lobbyists reported difficulties in operating the House's electronic-filing system.

Others firms said corporate counsels advised against reporting lobbying revenues in the "quiet period" before the release of financial information.

But those that did provide their figures to The Hill reported higher, sometimes much higher, returns.

Barbour, Griffith & Rogers's business grew 32 percent in 2005 from 2004. The perennial top-10 firm reported revenues of $19 million, verses the $14.39 million it brought in the year before.

Loren Monroe, chief operating officer, said the firm saw its biggest growth in its financial-services practice, with additional work for FM Policy Focus, a banking group, and on postal reform for the Financial Services Roundtable.

But Monroe attributed the overall growth to the diversity of the firm's portfolio. It operates four practices in addition to financial services: appropriations, international, healthcare and telecommunications.

Quinn Gillespie also saw a substantial boost in its lobbying revenues coinciding with the return of its eponymous partner Ed Gillespie from the Republican National Committee. The company earned $15.3 million from lobbying last year, which was $3.3 million more than the prior year. PMA Group continues to grow. It reported revenues of $15.1 million, up from $13.1 million.

And the Federalist Group, which until recently was all-Republican (it now has one Democratic lobbyist), continued to benefit from its contacts among Capitol Hill's leaders. Its revenues were $13.8 million, versus $12.1 million it collected in 2004. Holland & Knight also enjoyed healthy growth. The firm earned $13.2 million in 2005, an increase of $3.4 million over 2004.

Richard Gold, a partner at the firm, attributed the increase to contracts related to the budget-reconciliation bill. Holland & Knight lobbied on provisions related to natural-gas interests and the repeal of the so-called Byrd trade amendment. Budget and appropriations are mainstays for the firm, he said.

PodestaMattoon reported revenues of $12.34 million, up from $11.4 million in 2004.

Washington Council Ernst & Young was one firm that saw revenues dip, hurt by the absence of a major tax bill. It estimated its end-of-year total to be $11.7 million, down from $12.7 million.

But the Livingston Group, founded by former House Appropriations Committee Chairman Bob Livingston (R-La.), is another firm on the rise. It earned $10.9 million in 2005, a nearly $2 million increase over 2004.

Other totals: Preston Gates Ellis & Rouvelas made $10.8 million, up from $8.1 million; the Carmen Group made $10.5 million in 2005, up from $9.6 million; Alcalde & Fay brought in $10.1 million, versus the $8.8 million it made in 2004; and Clark & Weinstock reported revenues of $9.28 million, up from $9 million.

End-of-year numbers add to the strong start lobbyists made in 2005. PoliticalMoneyLine, which tracks lobbying spending, reported this week that companies and other special interests spent $1.16 billion to lobby Congress and federal agencies during the first part of last year. That represented a growth rate of 8 percent and a new six-month record for lobbying spending.

The figures in this story were provided by the firms themselves.

Roughly half of firms that fell in the top 25 a year ago reported rising revenues in 2005. Others looked poised to break into the upper echelon. Blank Rome Government Relations, for example, is positioned to move up. The firm, which merged with Peyser Associates last year, saw growth of greater than 50 percent. It will report an end-of-year total of $9.8 million, versus the $6.1 million it brought in a year ago.

The Ferguson Group, which specializes in representing cities, counties and other public entities, continued its upward course.

The firm's 2005 revenues were $9.24 million, up from just over $7 million. That is a growth rate of nearly 24 percent.

Despite recent controversies, Roger Gwinn, president of Ferguson's executive committee, said business has kept pace early in 2006.

But while the firm has continued to add clients at the same clip so far in 2006, there was one troubling instance: a client the firm had expected to sign backed out, concerned that the payoff may not be as big now that Congress is taking a hard look at the growth of earmarks.

Iraq War Veteran Pulls Out Of Ohio Senate Race (REU)

Reuters, February 14, 2006

CINCINNATI (Reuters) - Iraq war veteran Paul Hackett, an Ohio Democrat who gained attention last year for criticizing President George W. Bush and nearly scoring a huge congressional upset, said on Tuesday he would drop his U.S. Senate bid and retire from politics.

Hackett said he was under heavy party pressure to end his Senate race and clear the way for Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown to face vulnerable Republican incumbent Sen. Mike DeWine in November.

"I made this decision reluctantly, only after repeated requests by party leaders, as well as behind the scenes machinations that were intended to hurt my campaign," Hackett said in a statement.

Hackett, a Marine reservist in Iraq, almost pulled off a stunning upset in a special House election in heavily Republican southern Ohio last year after he sharply criticized Bush and his conduct of the war.

Democrats said Hackett's performance was a sign of voter unhappiness with Bush and the war and a bellwether for the 2006 congressional elections, but Republicans dismissed the result as a function of low turnout and local issues.

Some Democratic leaders were unhappy Hackett planned to enter the Ohio Senate race and force a primary against Brown, a seven-term House veteran. The Ohio filing deadline for the May 2 primary is on Thursday.

Hackett's withdrawal spares Democrats a potentially costly primary fight and clears the way for Brown to focus on DeWine. Polls show DeWine is vulnerable in Ohio, where state Republicans have suffered from a series of scandals and the deep unpopularity of Republican Gov. Bob Taft.

Hackett said he would not make another try for the House seat against Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt, even though he gained 48 percent of the vote against her last year in a heavily Republican district where no Democrat in decades had managed even 40 percent.

"I told the voters from the beginning that I am not a career politician and never aspired to be -- that I was about leadership, service and commitment," he said. "Thus ends my 11 month political career."

The Associated Press, February 15, 2006

CINCINNATI —

Iraq war veteran Paul Hackett, a Bush administration critic who had been recruited by top Democrats to run for U.S. Senate, said Tuesday he was reluctantly dropping his campaign and declared his political career over.

Hackett said he was pressured by party leaders to drop out of the Senate primary and run for the House against Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt instead.

DOJ_NMG_0015366

National Democratic leaders, especially Sen. Charles Schumer, added to that pressure by telling his top fundraisers to stop sending money, Hackett said.

"My donor base and host base on both coasts was contacted by elected officials and asked to stop giving," Hackett told The Associated Press on Tuesday. "The original promise to me from Schumer was that I would have no financial concerns. It went from that to Senator Schumer actually working against my ability to raise money."

Schumer, a New York Democrat who heads the party's Senate campaign committee, was not immediately available for comment.

The deadline for candidates to file for the May 2 primary is Thursday.

Hackett, a Cincinnati attorney and Marine Reservist, captured national attention last summer by blasting Bush's war policies, raising huge sums on the Internet and capturing 48 percent of the vote in one of the country's most conservative House districts. Republican Jean Schmidt won the special election in a tight race.

Hackett had declared his candidacy for Republican Mike DeWine's Senate seat after it appeared Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown would not run.

A few days afterward, Brown announced that he would run, and national Democrats privately began urging Hackett to step aside for the more seasoned politician.

Democrats also considered Schmidt vulnerable in a rematch against Hackett. She was widely criticized for saying in a speech about a troop pullout recommendation by Rep. John Murtha, a decorated Vietnam veteran: "Cowards cut and run, Marines never do."

But Hackett said he had promised three Democrats running in the district that he would not run.

"I couldn't sleep with myself if I did to them what was done to me," he said.

"At the end of the day, my word is my bond and I will take it to my grave," he said. "Thus ends my 11-month political career."

Hackett said he still supports the party's effort to unseat DeWine.

"Whatever personal emotions I have about Sherrod, if he asks me to help in some way, and I can help and it doesn't interfere with my own life, I will do the best to help him," Hackett said.

Party leaders had been urging Hackett to switch to the House race since Brown jumped in, and on Sunday, some national Democrats made those requests public.

"If he stays in the Senate race, I'm with Paul Hackett, but this is about the House race and giving us another member of the Democratic caucus," said Rep. Tim Ryan of Ohio, a Democrat who backed Hackett in the early going. Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, also urged Hackett on Sunday to run for Congress instead.

Ohio Democratic Party Chairman Chris Redfern said Hackett still has the popular support to have an impact.

"It is my hope that whatever disappointment he might feel about these circumstances, that he will seize a different moment in the future," Redfern said in a news release.

Veteran Of Iraq War Drops Out Of U.S. Senate Race In Ohio (USAT)

By From staff and wire reports

USA Today, February 15, 2006

CINCINNATI — Iraq war veteran Paul Hackett, a Bush administration critic who had been recruited by top Democrats to run for U.S. Senate, said Tuesday he was dropping his campaign and declared his political career over.

Hackett said he was pressured by party leaders to drop out of the Senate primary and run for the House against Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt, to whom he lost a special election last year.

Hackett had declared his candidacy for Republican Sen. Mike DeWine's seat after it appeared Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown would not run. A few days later, Brown announced that he would run for Senate, and national Democrats privately began urging Hackett to step aside for the more seasoned politician.

National Democratic leaders, especially Sen. Charles Schumer, told Hackett's top fundraisers to stop sending money, Hackett said.

“My donor base and host base on both coasts was contacted by elected officials and asked to stop giving,” Hackett told the Associated Press. “The original promise to me from Schumer was that I would have no financial concerns. It went from that to Sen. Schumer actually working against my ability to raise money.”

Schumer, a New York Democrat who heads the party's Senate campaign committee, was not available for comment. Committee spokesman Phil Singer said neither the campaign committee nor Schumer “reached out to donors to ask them to take sides in this race.”

DOJ_NMG_0015367

Singer praised Hackett for making a “statesman-like decision” that would help the party in an important race. DeWine, a centrist, is seeking a third Senate term.

The deadline for candidates to file for the May 2 primary is Thursday.

Hackett, a Cincinnati attorney and Marine reservist, captured national attention last summer by criticizing Bush's war policies, raising huge sums on the Internet and capturing 48% of the vote against Schmidt in one of the country's most conservative districts.

Democrats also considered Schmidt vulnerable in a rematch against Hackett. She was criticized for saying in a November speech about a troop pullout recommendation by Rep. John Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat and decorated Vietnam veteran: “Cowards cut and run, Marines never do.”

Hackett said he had promised three Democrats running in the 2nd Congressional District that he would not run. “At the end of the day, my word is my bond and I will take it to my grave,” he said. “Thus ends my 11-month political career.”

Hackett said he still supports the party's effort to unseat DeWine and will help Brown.

Party leaders had been urging Hackett to switch to the House race since Brown jumped in, and on Sunday, some national Democrats made those requests public. “This is about the House race and giving us another member of the Democratic caucus,” said Rep. Tim Ryan, D-Ohio.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., chairman of the House Democratic campaign committee, also urged Hackett on Sunday to run for the House instead.

Schmidt's predecessor in the 2nd District, Rob Portman, consistently won election to the seat based in the Cincinnati suburbs by 70% or more. Portman resigned to become U.S. trade representative.

Iraq War Vet Pulls Out Of Senate Race In Ohio (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

Iraq war veteran Paul Hackett withdrew from Ohio's U.S. Senate race yesterday, blaming the national Democratic Party for his inability to gain financial traction in his primary contest against Rep. Sherrod Brown.

"I made this decision reluctantly, only after repeated requests by party leaders, as well as behind the scenes machinations, that were intended to hurt my campaign," Hackett said in his formal withdrawal statement.

Hackett alleged that several party leaders -- including Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.) and Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) -- had made calls to donors discouraging them from contributing to his campaign, an allegation that DSCC spokesman Phil Singer denied.

Hackett's departure from the race ensures that Brown, a seven-term House member from the Akron area, will be the Democrats' standard-bearer in the fall against Sen. Mike DeWine (R). Democrats are heavily targeting DeWine this fall because of the political upheaval involving state Republicans -- the result of scandals surrounding outgoing Gov. Bob Taft (R) and one of his chief fundraisers.

Liberal blogs, which are largely credited with building Hackett into a national force, were divided on his decision and its ramifications. Former senator Gary Hart (D-Colo.) condemned the situation as "old politics at its worst" on the Huffington Post blog. Markos Moulitsas, who runs the popular Democratic blog Daily Kos, defended the move, however, arguing that Hackett "didn't stand a chance" against Brown in the primary.

Republicans sought to paint Hackett's withdrawal as a blow to Democrats' chances in November. "Hackett was controversial and said some nutty stuff, but he had the potential to play in the middle," said National Republican Senatorial Committee spokesman Dan Ronayne. "Sherrod Brown has a long record, and it is more liberal than Dennis Kucinich's -- that's a real tough sell to make to mainstream Ohioans."

Hackett's decision not to run for the Senate ends a political odyssey that began in August 2005 with his largely unheralded candidacy in the Cincinnati area's 2nd District. The seat was vacated when Rep. Rob Portman (R) was named U.S. trade representative. Democrats were given little chance in the district, which President Bush had carried with 64 percent less than a year earlier.

Hackett ran as a straight-shooting outsider -- a persona typified by his calling Bush a "son of a bitch" and then refusing to apologize. Fueled by support (both financial and organizational) from liberal blogs, he nearly upended Rep. Jean Schmidt (R), losing the contest 52 to 48 percent.

Riding a wave of national publicity after that near miss, Hackett jumped into the race against DeWine after Brown initially demurred last summer. Brown later reconsidered and entered the contest.

DOJ_NMG_0015368

Reports have surfaced in recent days that Hackett was contemplating switching races -- jumping from the Senate to a rematch against Schmidt in the 2nd District. Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) fomented that chatter by publicly urging Hackett to make the swap last weekend.

Hackett, apparently disillusioned by his experience in the Senate race, rejected that possibility yesterday. "There was no quid pro quo," Hackett said. "I will not be running in the 2nd Congressional District nor for any other elective office. This decision is final and not subject to reconsideration."

With the filing deadline in Ohio set for tomorrow, it is unlikely that Democrats will field a top-tier candidate against Schmidt this fall. The freshman Republican will face a serious challenge in the May 2 primary, however, from former congressman Bob McEwen.

Vets Miffed By Hackett's Decision (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington And Josh Kurtz

Roll Call, February 15, 2006

Iraq war veteran Paul Hackett's (D) abrupt withdrawal from the Ohio Senate race late Monday sparked an outcry from some liberal activists and at least one group supporting candidates who are military veterans — even though some Democratic leaders are privately relieved because they think it avoids a bloody primary.

Hackett had faced growing public and private pressure in recent days to drop his statewide bid in favor of another run against Rep. Jean Schmidt (R-Ohio), whom he narrowly lost to in a special election where he garnered national attention last August.

But in exiting the race, Hackett said he was done seeking elected office and he chastised Democratic leaders, whom he charged with exerting undue pressure on him to abandon the Senate race.

"I made this decision reluctantly, only after repeated requests by party leaders, as well as behind-the-scenes machinations, that were intended to hurt my campaign," Hackett said in a statement.

Hackett's departure from the Senate race comes as military veterans in a handful of lower-profile races around the country have been subtly or not-so-subtly pushed aside in favor of candidates who are viewed as stronger general election nominees.

Democratic leaders, however, denied any political sabotage in the Ohio race and praised Hackett's decision, which leaves Rep. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio) as the likely nominee against Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) in November.

Brown, who formally entered the race after Hackett had been recruited to run, has the strong backing of the state Democratic establishment and organized labor as well as a campaign war chest of close to $2.4 million.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said Tuesday he was surprised to hear that Hackett had lashed out at party leaders and that the one-time candidate had not made his concerns known to him directly. Noting that he had helped recruit Hackett into the Senate race, Reid did express regret that the situation had unfolded as it did, telling reporters that he "is very sorry" if Hackett believes national leaders pushed him out.

"I certainly never said 'You should get out of the race,'" Reid said.

The Democratic leader did, however, sidestep questions about whether Brown is a better candidate, saying simply "He's the only candidate in the race so I assume he's the best candidate."

On Tuesday, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee released the head-to-head results of a survey taken earlier this month that showed Brown with a 44 percent to 41 percent lead over DeWine, who is seeking a third term this fall.

DSCC spokesman Phil Singer called Hackett's decision "statesman-like" and reiterated that "neither the DSCC nor [Chairman Charles] Schumer [(N.Y.)] reached out to donors to ask them to take sides in this race," a charge that Hackett had leveled in press reports Tuesday.

At the same time Republicans wasted little time in pouncing on Brown now that it is clear he will face DeWine in November.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee released a statement painting the seven-term Congressman and former Ohio secretary of state as too liberal to be elected statewide.

"The [Democratic] party bosses dumped a candidate with mainstream vote-getting potential for one of their most liberal members," said NRSC spokesman Dan Ronayne.

But Hackett is not the only Iraq war veteran to get out of a Congressional race this week.

Just last weekend Iraq war veteran and attorney David Ashe (D) dropped his campaign for a rematch with freshman Rep. Thelma Drake (R) in Virginia's 2nd district. Ashe garnered 45 percent of the vote against Drake in 2004, in a late-developing open-seat race sparked by the last-minute retirement of then-Rep. Ed Schrock (R-Va.).

According to a local newspaper report, Ashe's decision was based primarily on the fact that he has been offered a position in the new administration of Gov. Tim Kaine (D). He did not specify what the position was but his move clears the field for Virginia Beach Commissioner of Revenue Phillip Kellam (D), who had been viewed as party insiders' preferred nominee. Kellam is a political legacy whose family is well known in the Tidewater area.

DOJ_NMG_0015369

Meanwhile, in New York's 29th district, it briefly appeared this week as if retired Navy commander Eric Massa (D) might be getting pushed aside within the Democratic establishment in favor of a self-funding candidate in the race against freshman Rep. Randy Kuhl (R-N.Y.).

On Monday, Democratic officials released a news release from businessman David Nachbar in which he announced that he would challenge Massa for the nomination.

Privately, Democratic Congressional leaders had high hopes for Nachbar, an executive at the Bausch & Lomb eye products company who was expected to pour at least $100,000 of his own money into the race. But problems with his candidacy became immediately apparent Tuesday morning.

Nachbar is an unaffiliated voter, not a registered Democrat, meaning he would have to go through extraordinary measures to get on the Sept. 12 primary ballot — an effort that would have been complicated by the fact that seven of the eight county Democratic chairmen in the expansive 29th district had already endorsed Massa.

A high-ranking New York Democratic official who did not want to be named said state party leaders were huddling with lawyers Tuesday afternoon to determine whether the county chairmen had the ability to put Nachbar on the ballot — a scenario that would have worked to Massa's advantage — or whether the full Democratic committees in each county had the responsibility to determine whether he could compete.

But the fact-finding would prove to be moot. Nachbar said Tuesday night that he would not run because he did not want to be "a divisive force."

"The thought that I had in mind was to defeat Randy Kuhl in November," he said.

Massa, who served in the Persian Gulf war and also was the top aide to Ret. Gen. Wesley Clark when Clark was Supreme Allied Commander, has been campaigning against Kuhl for more than a year, impressing party leaders with his passion and hard work. But while he had received the endorsement of his former boss and other military veterans like ex-Sen. Max Cleland (D-Ga.), some Congressional Democrats had worried about Massa's fundraising ability. Through Dec. 31, he had just $88,000 on hand, compared to Kuhl's $421,000.

But Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee officials are prepared to rally around Massa now.

"Massa has a strong organization, the overwhelming support of county leaders and the national security credentials to take on Randy Kuhl," said DCCC spokeswoman Jennifer Psaki.

Meanwhile, in Pennsylvania, Democratic leaders had to intervene when they had one too many military veterans seeking to take on Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.).

Last week Iraq war veteran and attorney Bryan Lentz (D) announced he was getting out of Pennsylvania's 7th district race after conversations with local party leaders and Gov. Ed Rendell (D). Instead, the 41-year-old Army Reserve major will run for state House this year.

Lentz's departure leaves retired three-star Vice Adm. Joseph Sestak, 54, as the likely nominee against Weldon in a district that voted for Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) in the 2004 presidential contest. Sestak, who served in Afghanistan, announced two weeks ago that he was running.

Democratic consultant Bob Doyle, whose clients include Massa and Kellam, said that the fact that the party has too many interested candidates in some races is a welcome sign after two cycles where the party lost House and Senate seats. He also sees it as a signal that the current national political environment will produce Democratic gains this November.

"It's indicative of the cycle that we're in," he said. "Democrats are clearly energized and are on the offense... and our recruiting has really shown that."

Democratic party strategists say they remain supportive of veterans of the Iraq and Afghanistan conflicts running for office and point to a number of races where they are touting veteran candidates.

Iraq war veteran Tammy Duckworth, who is running in the open seat contest in Illinois' 6th district, is perhaps their highest-profile recruit.

The party is also touting veterans running against Republican Reps. Robin Hayes (N.C.), Michael Fitzpatrick (Pa.) and Anne Northup (Ky.), although those races have yet to develop into first or even second-tier contests.

Still, there was audible disappointment stemming from Hackett's decision from at least one group seeking to elect veterans this cycle. In a statement, Jon Soltz, executive director of the Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America Political Action Committee described the circumstances surrounding Hackett's departure as "an outrage."

"The good news is that there are still a number of Iraq and Afghanistan veterans running for office around the nation," Soltz said. "We are committed to getting these patriots the early institutional support they need, because it is becoming abundantly clear that the party leadership has no interest in them."

Ohio-based Democratic strategist Dale Butland, who had signed onto Hackett's campaign last month, said he was more concerned about his party's leadership's unwillingness to let the primary process play itself out.

He warned that the handling of the Hackett situation could keep some of the Democratic base home from the polls and thus hinder the party's ability to win in November.

"From a political point of view this sort of bossism is really kind of dumb," he said.

He added: "We've taken a guy who was a rising star and we've turned him into a fallen star. It doesn't make any sense to me."

2 Major Construction Unions Plan To Leave A.F.L.-C.I.O. (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

The national labor movement suffered a new split yesterday when two major construction unions — the laborers and the operating engineers — announced that they were quitting the Building and Construction Trades Department of the A.F.L.-C.I.O.

The unions also said they would soon announce the creation of a rival building trades group, the National Construction Alliance, that would include the carpenters, the bricklayers, the iron workers and the Teamsters. The new group, officials from the two unions said, would have more than 1.5 million members and would be more vigorous than the Building and Construction Trades Department in unionizing construction workers.

"We cannot stand idly by, tied to a past that promises only further decline for construction workers," said Terence M. O'Sullivan, president of the Laborers International Union of North America, which has 700,000 members. He indicated that his union would soon quit the A.F.L.-C.I.O., following five other unions that have left the federation in the past year.

Mr. O'Sullivan and Vincent J. Giblin, president of the International Union of Operating Engineers, said the Building and Construction Trades Department had been ineffective in stopping a decline in construction union membership. The percentage of construction workers who are unionized has plunged to 13 percent today from 40 percent in 1973.

In recent days, officials with the A.F.L.-C.I.O. and several construction unions have engaged in intense talks with Mr. O'Sullivan and Mr. Giblin to try to persuade them not to quit the building trades department.

"We're saddened by their decision to leave," said Sean McGarvey, the department's secretary-treasurer. "This is a net negative for unionized construction workers as we're faced with one of the biggest building booms ever."

He said some builders might grow more reluctant to deal with unions if they risked being called on to sign differing contracts with rival construction federations.

The laborers and operating engineers, which has 400,000 members, had threatened to quit the building trades department unless four demands were met: replacing the department's leaders; trimming its budget; having a voting system of one worker, one vote; and updating a system several decades old for determining which unions are to have jurisdiction over which types of work.

Mr. McGarvey and A.F.L.-C.I.O. officials said they had gone far to satisfy Mr. O'Sullivan and Mr. Giblin on all but one demand: replacing the leaders of the building trades department.

Mr. Giblin said yesterday that the department's current leadership was indecisive, ineffectual and directionless. But several union presidents rejected the demand for new leadership and rallied behind Edward C. Sullivan, the department's president.

Teachers Earned Health Care (USAT)

By Edward J. McElroy

USA Today, February 15, 2006

This might come as a surprise to many readers, but in the 25 years that I negotiated contracts with school districts for affiliates of the American Federation of Teachers, no one ever threw money at me.

Retirement health benefits weren't a gift, either. School districts recognized that a generous retiree health plan can serve as an incentive for higher-paid, more experienced teachers to retire and be replaced by lower-paid entry-level teachers.

It was often an advantage to district negotiators to exchange an increase in salary for a benefit that could be funded over time. No one gives away these benefits to teachers and other school workers. They are traded.

But retirees' health care bills have come due, and the Governmental Accounting Standards Board's new rules are showing what the real costs are. All working families and retirees are experiencing the same ballooning health care bills. We need to work toward a national solution, but that will take time. Meanwhile, obligations don't disappear.

Hard-working people earned these benefits over many years, deferring compensation until now. Employers need to honor their contractual obligations. Violating these promises is nothing short of theft.

DOJ_NMG_0015371

As a nation, we are in the middle of a retirement crisis. The just-released federal budget, calling for billions in cuts to Medicare, makes it worse. This is on top of more than 2,000 companies that have unloaded their pension obligations on the federal Pension Benefit Guarantee Corp. The elimination of pensions and other retiree benefits for workers at companies such as United Airlines — while top executives lock in lucrative individual retirement awards — is scandalous.

Our retirement security problem, as bad as it is, moves to a completely new and damaging level when the government fails to live up to its obligations.

All citizens should heed what is happening to teachers, public employees and workers in the private sector. Everyone who has a pension or retirement benefits should be alarmed. If employers are allowed to walk away from their obligations, contracts of all kinds become meaningless. And when the government doesn't live up to its obligations, we're all in trouble.

Edward J. McElroy is president of the 1.3 million-member American Federation of Teachers.

Iran Feeding Centrifuges: Official (REU)

Reuters, February 14, 2006

VIENNA (Reuters) - Iran has begun feeding uranium hexafluoride gas into centrifuges at its pilot nuclear fuel enrichment facility at Natanz, an official close to the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency said on Tuesday.

He said International Atomic Energy Agency inspectors had observed Iranian scientists putting UF6 gas into a "very small number" of centrifuges, machines that can turn uranium into fuel for nuclear reactors or, if enriched to high levels, atomic bombs.

The head of Iran's atomic program, Gholamreza Aghazadeh, said the enrichment begun at Natanz was on a "small and laboratory scale", the ISNA students news agency reported soon after.

"Injecting gas into one or a few centrifuges could not be termed enrichment," he was quoted as saying.

Earlier on Tuesday, Iran said no actual uranium enrichment work had begun at Natanz, but that preliminary work was under way to prepare centrifuges for production after a 2 1/2-year suspension in such work, maintained under Western pressure.

The West suspects Iran of trying to develop atom bombs under cover of a civilian atomic energy drive and persuaded the IAEA's governing board last week to report Iran to the U.N. Security Council for possible action, which could include sanctions.

Iran denies any military intent in its nuclear work, saying it is designed solely to generate electricity for its economy.

The official close to the IAEA said the amount of UF6 being introduced into centrifuges "was of absolutely no use" in making weapons-grade fuel and that the new work was "an early testing phase en route to mastering the technology".

He said Iran remained some way from reactivating the entire cascade of 164 centrifuges it had running before the 2003 suspension and that many hundreds would have to be in operation, spinning at supersonic speeds, to purify enough fuel for a bomb.

"They face technical difficulties merely getting the 164 back on line," he told Reuters.

Iran had vowed to resume uranium enrichment and halt short-notice IAEA inspections in retaliation for the IAEA vote, which Tehran called illegal as the agency has found no hard proof of secret bomb-making after three years of probes.

"What they are doing now is entirely legitimate within the safeguards agreements Iran has with the IAEA. The main issue for the agency is for Iran to clarify unanswered questions regarding (past) concealment of its programme," the official said.

"But what they're doing now may demonstrate that maybe the board vote wasn't the wisest way forward, from the pragmatic point of view. The train (enrichment) has left the station and it will be pretty hard to stop it now."

Why Iran's Enrichment Rattles The West (CSMonitor)

By Peter Grier

Christian Science Monitor, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - To begin enriching raw uranium into fissile material, as Iran now may have done, is to take a fateful step down the path of nuclear capability.

That's because it is perhaps the most difficult aspect of developing a nuclear power - or weapons - program. Centrifuge enrichment is a sort of technological ballet, requiring thousands of thin tubes to spin at outrageous speeds, each feeding a thin stream of uranium gas along to a neighboring tube, until the gas reaches the end of the cascade line.

And once a nation has mastered the art of enriching uranium for a power plant, it does not take much more effort to increase the concentration of fissile elements to the level required for bombs. Thus, Iran may already have collected almost everything it requires, if it wants to become a member of the nuclear weapons club.

"I don't see that they need anything more except knowledge and experience, and they'll get that by running the [enrichment] cascade," says David Albright, president of the Institute for Science and International Security in Washington.

On Tuesday, Javad Vaeidi, a senior Iranian nuclear negotiator, said that Iran has resumed small-scale uranium enrichment, defying preventive efforts by the United States and much of the rest of the world. Mr. Vaedi, deputy Secretary of the Supreme National Council, told reporters in Tehran that work has resumed at Iran's main enrichment plant at Natanz. The work is preliminary, and the amount of enriched uranium it might produce would be small, as Iran's existing enrichment cascade is only an experimental one.

To produce usable amounts of enrichment material, Iran must still construct a larger facility, said Vaedi.

"We need time to have 60,000 centrifuges," he said.

This week Iran also said it has postponed indefinitely talks with Russia on a plan to enrich uranium on Russian territory, to allay fears that it would build an atomic weapon.

In a joint statement, Russia and France immediately called on Tehran to reconsider, and to halt enrichment work. The US has also criticized Iran for its recent enrichment activities.

"They're continuing to choose defiance and confrontation over cooperation and diplomacy," said White House press secretary Scott McClellan on Monday.

On Feb. 4, the International Atomic Energy Agency reported Iran to the UN Security Council, calling on it to stop all enrichment-related activities. Iran has retaliated by ending some of its cooperation with IAEA inspectors.

Iran has long maintained that its nuclear activities are solely for the purpose of nuclear power, and that enrichment for civilian purposes is not outlawed by the Non-Proliferation Treaty, of which Iran is a signatory.

"They say, 'we're within the treaty, we're within our rights,' " says Daryl Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association in Washington.

Enrichment of uranium is necessary because, as it comes out of the ground, uranium is just a lump of natural material.

But it is a natural material with potential. It's all a matter of isotopes, which are forms of the same element that have different numbers of neutrons in their nuclei.

Ninety-nine percent of uranium is the unexciting U-238 isotope. But the other 1 percent is the isotope U-235, which is slightly lighter, has three fewer neutrons, and can be split to release astounding amounts of energy.

The point of enrichment is to increase the percentage of U-235 - to the 5 percent level for fuel for nuclear power plants, and to the 90 percent level for nuclear weapons.

The first step is to take uranium ore and mill it. Then this crumbled material is heated to produce a gas, uranium hexafluoride.

In the centrifuge process - invented in the 1960s - this gas is then fed into a cylinder spinning at high speed. The heavier U-238 isotopes are spun to the outside, while the lighter U-235 stays closer to the vertical axis, where it can be drawn off.

This slightly enriched gas is then fed into another centrifuge, where it is enriched more. It is then drawn off, and fed into another, and so on down a line of thousands of spinning tubes.

Once it has reached the desired concentration, after much effort and use of electricity, the gas cools and solidifies, and the material is milled into a usable form.

Starting this process is much more difficult than simply continuing it. Thus production of a bomb core, which is 90 percent enriched, requires only about 25 percent more effort than producing 5 percent enriched fuel rods for civilian power reactors, estimates Mr. Albright of the Institute for Science and International Security.

It will take Iran some time to get its enrichment technology under control, says Albright, given that the experimental centrifuge cascade at Natanz has long lain idle. Moisture has penetrated the system, corroding pipes. Vacuum in the system must be secure for the cascade to work perfectly.

If Iran proceeds to a production cascade of thousands of centrifuges, it is now unlikely to build it at Natanz, says Albright. For security purposes, the Iranians would hide it in a new facility, perhaps among the many light industries clustered around Tehran.

Iran Sets New Date For Atomic Talks With Russia (REU)

By Parisa Hafezi

Reuters, February 14, 2006

TEHRAN (Reuters) - Iran announced on Tuesday it was deferring until next week talks with Russia on its nuclear plans, but gave no sign it was ready to stop enriching uranium on its own soil -- the key element in Moscow's plan.

However, a senior Iranian official said no actual uranium enrichment had yet taken place at the Natanz facility where Iran had halted work during negotiations with the European Union.

"No work has been done on the centrifuges and no gas has been injected yet," said the official, asking not to be named.

"They are preparing the ground. A facility that has been suspended for two and half years cannot become functional in one night."

Centrifuges spin uranium hexafluoride at supersonic speed to make atomic fuel, or if highly enriched, bomb-grade material.

DOJ_NMG_0015373

Other officials had said preliminary work to revive a pilot project had begun at Natanz this week, intensifying world concern over Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Russia and France called on Iran to cease "all activities connected with enrichment and processing" of nuclear fuel. Their joint statement was issued by the Kremlin during a visit to Moscow by French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin.

Russia has offered to enrich uranium on Iran's behalf in a compromise designed to allay world fears that the Iranians might divert nuclear material into bombs.

Iranian nuclear negotiator Javad Vaeedi said talks on the proposal would now start in Moscow on February 20.

"We still want to reach a formula to prove that we will not divert uranium enriched on Iranian soil," he told reporters.

Russia confirmed that Iran had asked to postpone the talks, originally planned for Thursday, and voiced no objection.

DELAYING TACTICS?

Western countries suspect Iran wants nuclear weapons and this month persuaded the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) to report it to the Security Council. Iran says it wants atomic fuel only to make electricity.

Diplomats said Iran wanted to drag out talks with Russia, without giving up its right to enrich uranium at home, hoping that diplomatic activity will defer any Security Council action.

Iran has already undercut Moscow's proposal by announcing it was exercising its right to resume uranium enrichment at Natanz.

Officials close to the IAEA in Vienna said inspectors had arrived at Natanz on Tuesday to monitor any activity there.

Vaeedi said earlier in the day that Iran had begun preliminary work to revive small-scale uranium enrichment at Natanz, adding that industrial production was some way off.

"We need some time to reach that level with all centrifuges because of the 2-1/2 year suspension. However, the preliminary phases have been launched," he said.

A Vienna-based European diplomat said "a very few" of the cascade of 164 centrifuges Iran had running at Natanz before the 2003 suspension were now operating again.

"They will have to be tested first but the Iranians' goal is clearly to get all 164 operational again which would effectively revive the pilot fuel enrichment plant at Natanz," he said.

Iran is believed to have the parts to assemble another 1,000-1,500 centrifuges. This task, marking the first step toward commercial-scale enrichment, would take several months or more to accomplish, the diplomat said.

Germany and China called separately for more diplomacy on the nuclear row with Iran.

"The international community should not give up diplomatic efforts under the IAEA's framework," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said.

German Defense Minister Franz Josef Jung said: "A military solution is not being discussed right now. I hope that if the international community stands together we can find a solution."

An Iranian official said Tehran was halting some IAEA monitoring carried out under the Additional Protocol of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT), which it had been observing voluntarily. Iran has not ratified the protocol.

"Since the Additional Protocol is not in force any more, some of those cameras should be taken out," said Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization.

The European diplomat said non-compliance with the protocol would not affect the IAEA's remote cameras observing declared sites such as Natanz and a uranium processing plant in Isfahan.

The protocol applies mainly to areas such as research and parts assembly centres where the IAEA suspects Iran of failing to declare links to its atomic program as required by the NPT.

IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei is to report to the agency's board on March 6 on Iran's nuclear program. His report will go to the Security Council ahead of an expected debate on how to curb Iran's atomic work, with sanctions a possible option.

Russia-Iran Nuclear Talks Back On (FT)

By Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, February 15, 2006

Iran confirmed on Tuesday it had resumed uranium enrichment but agreed to the resumption of talks with Russia aimed at defusing the international stand-off over its nuclear programme.

Javad Vaeedi, deputy secretary of the Supreme National Security Council, said the talks would take place on February 20. They aim to discuss proposals to enrich his country's uranium in Russia to allay international concerns it might divert the material into weapons use.

In a joint statement release by the Kremlin during a visit by Dominique de Villepin, French prime minister, Russia and France called on Iran to stop work linked with nuclear fuel, urging Tehran to "fulfil the February resolution and the demands of the governing council of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), including the full cessation of all activities connected with enrichment and processing. ”

Separately, the European Union on Tuesday applauded Moscow’s initiative on the eve of talks with Russia in Vienna. Benita Ferrero-Waldner, EU external relations commissioner, said Russia was “playing a constructive role in the search for a diplomatic solution”.

Though Tehran confirmed it had resumed uranium enrichment at its Natanz plant, it denied production was on an industrial scale.

The enrichment, which is apparently being done in the plant’s research facilities, is not enough to make fuel for reactors or produce weapons, but it signals Iran’s determination to press ahead with its nuclear programme despite the February 4 decision of the IAEA to refer it to the UN security council.

Mr Vaeedi said Iran needed time “to have 60,000 centrifuges” – referring to the devices used to spin uranium hexafluoride gas into enriched uranium. But he added it had begun “the preliminary stage”.

The announcement by Mr Vaeedi on the Moscow talks seemed to contradict a government spokesman’s statement on Monday that they had been postponed indefinitely because of the “new situation”, a reference to Russia voting at the IAEA for Iran’s referral to the security council.

Iranian officials have blown hot and cold on the Russian idea, which is incompatible with Tehran’s insistence that it enrich at home. Mr Vaeedi said Iran wanted a “formula to prove we will not divert uranium enriched on Iranian soil”.

Mohammed ElBaredei, the IAEA director general, is due to produce another report on Iran’s programme in early March.

While the US and the EU strongly back referral to the security council, which could impose sanctions, Russia and China are less keen.

Liu Jianchao, Beijing’s foreign ministry spokesman, on Tuesday reiterated China’s preference for “diplomatic efforts under the IAEA framework ..[and] … a solution through dialogue”.

Iran Restarts Uranium Program (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

PARIS, Feb. 14 -- Iran announced Tuesday that it had resumed uranium enrichment efforts in defiance of international pressure to curb its nuclear program and said it will no longer comply with voluntary measures designed to enhance international inspectors' access to its nuclear facilities.

"The order to resume uranium enrichment has been issued," Javad Vaeidi, deputy head of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, told reporters in Tehran, according to Iranian news agencies. "The Iranian Atomic Energy Organization has restarted the process."

Monitors from the International Atomic Energy Agency confirmed during inspections Tuesday that Iran had begun the first small-scale steps in the years-long process of enriching uranium that could be used for nuclear power, or eventually weapons production, according to a Western diplomat close to the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency. The diplomat spoke on condition of anonymity because the monitoring team's report will not be released officially for several weeks.

Although Iranian officials said Tuesday that they are years away from being able to produce atomic fuel on an industrial scale, the decision to restart uranium enrichment represents a significant escalation of the political crisis between Tehran and foreign governments.

"They've now walked across the line in such a blatant way that it's hard to see where any other red line could be drawn," said Mark Fitzpatrick, an analyst with the International Institute of Strategic Studies in London and a former U.S. liaison to the IAEA in Vienna. "Now they've done what everybody was afraid of."

Iran's announcements and the IAEA monitoring team's findings increased pressure on the U.N. Security Council to take action against Iran for breaching international agreements on its nuclear program, diplomats in Vienna said.

The 35-member IAEA governing board, which includes the five permanent members of the Security Council, reported "serious concerns" about Iran's nuclear intentions to the Security Council on Feb. 4. Diplomats agreed that the Security Council would not take action until an IAEA board meeting on March 6, when the agency's director general, Mohamed ElBaradei, is scheduled to present an update on Iran's actions.

ElBaradei's report will include the finding of IAEA monitors that Iran last weekend began feeding uranium hexafluoride gas into a handful of centrifuges, which spin the material at supersonic speeds to create enriched uranium, a Vienna-based diplomat said.

DOJ_NMG_0015375

"This means the IAEA will have to produce a report that is quite negative with regard to Iran," Fitzpatrick said. "The director general would have been looking to produce a report that described ways in which Iran was cooperating. . . . Iran is not giving ElBaradei anything to work with here."

In Washington, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said Iran was "continuing to choose defiance and confrontation over cooperation and diplomacy."

The IAEA team, after its inspection of Iran's Natanz nuclear facility about 150 miles south of Tehran, reported that Iran is using fewer than five centrifuges, the diplomat said.

Vaeidi, the Iranian national security official, said during comments to reporters Tuesday that Iran needed 60,000 centrifuges for large-scale enrichment, adding, "We need some time to reach that."

Iranian officials Tuesday also said they would end voluntary compliance with an addendum to the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty that allows IAEA inspectors access to any nuclear facility within two hours of their request and grants the IAEA greater access to certain documentation and information about Iran's nuclear program.

"We are in the transition state and the inspectors will work under the NPT," Mohammad Saeedi, deputy of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, said on state television, referring to the treaty. "We will not do anything beyond our commitments to the NPT."

Western diplomats in Vienna said Iran's refusal to comply with the additional voluntary agreements will impede the IAEA's ability to monitor Iranian activities. "It is very difficult for us to provide assurance that there is no parallel or secret program happening," one diplomat said.

Iranian officials describe their decision to move ahead with uranium enrichment as an act of independence in the face of criticism and mistrust on the part of the United States and other Western countries, which Iran accuses of trying to hobble its efforts to produce nuclear energy.

Gholam-Ali Haddad Adel, Iran's parliament speaker, said during a visit Tuesday to Caracas, Venezuela, that U.S. opposition to Iran's nuclear program was "only a pretext."

He added, "They are worried that we want to be independent."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad reiterated in a televised speech Saturday that Iran was trying to develop nuclear technology for fuel in the face of dwindling oil supplies.

"We ask them why they are against our nuclear technology," Ahmadinejad said in the speech. "They answer: Because they do not trust us."

He warned the Iranian people to brace for possible economic sanctions in the coming months.

The Security Council has not indicated a course of action it might take against Iran. The United States and Europe have been pushing hardest for some type of strong political retribution, while Iran's allies and major trading partners, including Russia and China, are wary of the intentions of the Western governments.

Russia, which has invested about $1 billion in constructing an Iranian nuclear facility, has attempted to act as broker, offering to enrich uranium in Russia and turn the product over to Iran.

Ahmadinejad scoffed at the proposal in his speech Saturday, telling his Tehran audience, "They say that they will produce the fuel somewhere else and then they will hand it over to us.

"We say, what a surprise!" he continued. "Do you expect us to be stupid enough to believe you?"

Iranian officials have scheduled a meeting with Russian authorities on Feb. 20 to discuss the proposal.

Iran Resumes Small-Scale Uranium Program (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, February 14, 2006

Iran has resumed small-scale enrichment of uranium, a senior Iranian nuclear negotiator said Tuesday — a defiant declaration in the face of global opposition to Iran's atomic program.

The resumption still leaves Iran a long way from reaching the stage the world fears most: large-scale enrichment of uranium — a process that can produce fuel for an atomic bomb.

Javad Vaeidi, deputy secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, in announcing the small-scale enrichment, also told reporters that Iran would resume negotiations with Moscow on Feb. 20 over its plan to enrich Iranian uranium on Russian soil — a proposal designed to allay fears that Iran will build nuclear weapons.

"The talks with Russia remain valid," Vaeidi said, adding that an Iranian delegation would go to Moscow.

The negotiations with Russia had been due to resume Thursday, but Iran said Monday they were postponed indefinitely.

DOJ_NMG_0015376

Vaeidi gave no indication whether Iran was looking more favorably at the plan now that international pressure over its nuclear program was increasing. Iran has repeatedly said the Russian plan can be complementary to Iran's nuclear program but that Tehran would not accept any requirement to scrap uranium enrichment in Natanz.

Vaeidi said enrichment of uranium resumed last week at Natanz, the country's main enrichment plant, but that Iran had not resumed large-scale enrichment, as required for producing fuel for nuclear reactors.

In Israel, Yuval Steinitz, chairman of the Knesset's defense and foreign affairs committee, said Tuesday's announcement from Iran made it clear that "time is running out."

"If the Iranians will not be blocked, in due course they will obtain a nuclear weapon," he told The Associated Press. "This will be a devastating threat not only to Israel and the Middle East but also to Europe and the United States."

Later Tuesday, Vice President Gholamreza Aghazadeh said resumption of uranium enrichment work was very limited.

"It can't be used even at semi-industrial level. It's only at the laboratory stage for analyzing research activities. This sort of enrichment cannot be used (for producing nuclear fuel)," he said.

According to authoritative reports, Iran had 164 centrifuges in Natanz sealed by the IAEA in 2003. The seals were removed last month when Iran resumed nuclear research. And Iranian officials have indicated that Iran may possess up to 2,000 centrifuges. For a large-scale enrichment of uranium, Iran has to build up to 60,000 centrifuges — something Vaeidi said would take time.

Top Iranian officials have confirmed in the past that the Iranian military had built nuclear centrifuges for civilian use and that Iran was capable of mass producing them.

The world has long sought to stop Iran from enriching uranium, fearing that the process would bring it to the threshold of possessing nuclear bombs. On Feb. 4, the International Atomic Energy Agency reported Iran to the U.N. Security Council and called on its government to suspend all enrichment-related activities.

Instead, Iran suspended certain aspects of its co-operation with the IAEA.

"They're continuing to choose defiance and confrontation over cooperation and diplomacy," White House press secretary Scott McClellan said Monday of Iran's decision to resume enrichment.

Iran insists that as a signatory to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, which provides for peaceful nuclear development, it is entitled to enrich uranium for nuclear reactors. It has threatened to withdraw from the treaty if it was not allowed to exercise that right.

Vaeidi indicated Iran was still open to negotiation.

"We are still prepared to find a formula to clarify the ambiguity in talks with our partners. At the same time, we will pursue our rights," he said.

Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, said Tuesday that Iran has stopped allowing short notice inspections of its facilities by IAEA inspectors.

He said on state television that some IAEA cameras need to be removed from Iranian nuclear facilities and that Iran was "taking the preparatory measures to do that."

Iran maintains its nuclear program is designed solely to generate electricity, but the United States and Israel claim the program is a cover for producing an atomic bomb.

What Putin Hopes To Gain From Iran (TIME)

By Yuri Zarakhovich

Time, February 14, 2006

Monday's news that Iran has postponed Moscow talks, scheduled to start Thursday, on having its uranium enriched in Russia, and has instead resumed its own enrichment activities, was hardly stunning — except, perhaps, to Russian President Vladimir Putin.

Putin had expected a cash windfall from Iran for the Russia-supplied nuclear capacity; the laurels of a global power-broker for defusing the Iranian nuclear crisis; and the praise of his increasingly nostalgic citizens for restoring the lost empire's glory.

Instead, he looks hapless before the specter of a nuclear-armed militant clerical regime that looms beneath the veil of a peaceful nuclear energy project. Putin's massive supplies of conventional weapons to Iran, including air defense missiles and armor, have strengthened that specter — much to Russia's own peril.

For months, Russia and China have been stalling the West's efforts to refer Iran's nuclear program to the UN Security Council. Last week, Russia finally backed an IAEA resolution to do so, only upon the condition that the Council doesn't take up the issue until March. Meanwhile, pundits believe, Putin had hoped to defuse the crisis by persuading Iran to shift its uranium-enrichment to Russia, which would deny it the ability to use such facilities on its own soil to produce weapons-grade material.

DOJ_NMG_0015377

From his own experience, Putin should have known better: Back in 2000, the Russian president had told a G-8 summit in Japan that he had convinced North Korean leader Kim Jong Il to abandon his missile program. Sounded good, until Kim explained he was joking. This time, Putin seems to be the butt of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's practical joke.

Putin's policies were best summed up last Saturday by Hamas spokesman Sami Abu Zuhri commenting on Putin's pledge last week to invite the radical Palestinian group to Moscow: "It will represent a division in the Western position led by the U.S."

"A division in the Western position" helped fuel Saddam Hussein's defiance over the years, finally leading to war. In the long run, Putin's policies will do Hamas or Iran no better than they did Saddam, but they do risk badly hurting Russia.

The regime seems incapable of having long-term strategies. And its short term tactics are driven by cash, whether it be in jailing the oil magnate Mikhail Khodorkovsky and taking over his billions, or endorsing Iran's nuclear ambitions. Russia's projected income from just supplying seven nuclear reactors to Iran runs into $10 billion — and way more for maintenance, fueling, etc.

From 1990 through 1996, Russia supplied over $5 billion worth arms to Iran. Then, Russia heeded a U.S. request to stop military supplies, but resumed them in 2000, just as Putin became president. Last October, Moscow and Tehran signed a deal on military supplies worth $300 million annually. Russia will also supply $700 million worth of surface-to-air missiles. The Iranian arms market now promises Russia some $10 billion over next several years.

These tantalizing riches risk falling into the same chasm, however, as the unpaid billions owed to Russia by Saddam Hussein's regime, and other Moscow-backed rogue regimes. Russia risks ending up unpaid, friendless — and facing a volatile nuclear neighbor, connected to terrorist groups and armed with Russian weapons, right on her unstable southern border. Some return to glory, indeed.

When Tehran Rocks, Discretion Rules (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

TEHRAN — Rock stars are a brash, in-your-face breed, often challenging their audiences with lyrics of defiance. But here, they are all that and a bit scared, too.

"Please, I'm going to be in deep trouble," said a rock musician after a recent show when asked for a copy of the lyrics to a song his group had performed (in English). He handed them over, but cautioned he could get in trouble if they attract the attention of the authorities.

I have a right to be caught by the cops
Have a right to be called by the judge
Have a right to be sent to the fronts
And come back in the back of a truck in a box.

Compared with the defiance that explodes from rock music in the West, the song seemed tame. But this is Iran, a nation that often feels otherworldly, caught someplace between an "anything goes" attitude and the intense restrictions and scrutiny of a religious government.

After the 1979 revolution, when Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini was fashioning Iran into a Shiite Islamic state, one of his many sayings was, "Keep the appearances of Islam." Public profile is important and so, if Iranians chose not to fast during Ramadan, well, O.K., but they were expected to eat in the privacy of their homes. After centuries in which Shiites were permitted to hide aspects of their faith in order to protect themselves against discrimination, a practice called Taqiyah, the principle seems to have etched its way into the national character. Appearance is often valued more highly than truthfulness.

During the years reformers were in power, the authorities permitted some outward challenges to appearance: looser dress codes and some public questioning of the government. Now there is a new president, the ultraconservative Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and people are wondering where the lines will be drawn, how far will they be permitted to challenge appearances.

The president has given some clues, though not necessarily the ones that were expected. Many thought he would quickly issue a strict Islamic dress code for women, but it has not come to pass. In a way, on some matters, the new president seems, by design or circumstance, to be imposing control by not defining where those red lines are.

"There is no written law," said the musician, whose name is being withheld because he was worried about being punished and his band blocked from playing. "You are allowed to do everything, unless you want to share it."

That seems to be the unwritten law in Iran today: no sharing. The act of publicly sharing ideas that challenge the system is forbidden, because, at a minimum, that amounts to challenging the appearance the government would like to promote. A blogger sits in jail for sharing his ideas. Newspapers are shut down for sharing. A journalist is denied permission to leave the country. The BBC's Persian Web site is filtered. Always the offense is sharing which can, of course, lead to the slippery slope of public questioning, public discontent and public organizing.

DOJ_NMG_0015378

Paradoxically, civil society here appears vibrant. It has not been crushed, the way it has by the authoritarian leaders in the Arab world. There is, on many levels, real politics here — often with the outcome unknown — and on the most important issues, leaders must draw consensus from the different levels of power. And so people in many spheres — arts, sports, politics, business — find themselves pressing against the limitations of what is deemed permissible.

Mostly, this is done behind closed doors, in the privacy of people's homes. Some people, like the rock musicians, do risk public sharing, but watchfully.

These are tense times in Iran. The country is under threat of once again becoming an international pariah, as in the days when Ayatollah Khomeini issued a fatwa calling for the death of Salman Rushdie, author of the book "The Satanic Verses." This time it is the leadership's drive for nuclear power that threatens to slam shut the door of international isolation.

That alone has caused widespread anxiety. But those Iranians inclined to challenge appearances, even slightly, have an added worry.

At the awards ceremony to conclude the 24th Fadjr Film Festival in January, Iran's biggest stars were out, having wrestled their way through the mob scene blocking the entrance to Vahdat Hall. The stars milled around the lobby with excited guests who asked for autographs and for a chance to pose with the celebrities.

"Not everybody is capable of laughing when a crisis is going on," said Ali Reza Khamseh, a comic actor whose show (now canceled) had addressed family issues. "It is important to laugh when we are being banged on the head." He said he was talking about divorce, unemployment and other personal issues — but in these tough times, the message had a much broader reach.

Mr. Khamseh said this with a big broad smile. Until a man walked over. The man leaned into the conversation, not smiling, not frowning and listening intently. Approached, he said that his name was Yehia Nouri and that he was a gym teacher. He wore a beard, as religious Muslims do, and a soiled winter jacket, and carried a small briefcase.

"The Koran," he said, "says whatever hardship one is feeling, your attitude should be to bear it."

Perhaps he was a gym teacher eager to listen to a celebrity and to offer his ideas to a foreign reporter. But this is a place where people are, in fact, watched, and so the conversation with the comic actor evaporated.

At a recent concert, as young men and women piled into a small room, one concertgoer leaned over and said, casually, "I hope the Basiji don't rush the place." He was referring to the vigilante squads of bearded men who often use violence to enforce strict Islamic social codes. As the music played, the crowd swayed and clapped, shouted out choruses, and bopped the way any audience of young men and women might in the West. The music, though upbeat, had a slightly funereal quality to it, as the singer took the chance to share his thoughts, in public.

Have a right to be ignored and neglected
Have a right to be segued and be raided
Have a right to be damned a right to be jammed
Have a right to be sanctioned and banned.

When the show was over and the lights came up the band seemed exhilarated — and frightened.

U.S. And Israel Deny Plans To Drive Hamas From Power (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman
The New York Times, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 — American and Israeli officials warned again Tuesday that they would cut off aid and transfers of tax receipts to a Hamas-led Palestinian government if it did not renounce violence and recognize Israel. They said, however, that they had no plans to oust such a government.

"The bottom line is that there is no U.S.-Israeli plan, project, plot, conspiracy to destabilize or undermine a future Palestinian government," said Sean McCormack, a State Department spokesman.

He spoke in response to an article in The New York Times on Tuesday in which American and Israeli officials and diplomats said they were discussing ways to destabilize the Palestinian government, with the intention of forcing new elections. Those officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to speak publicly on the issue, said the discussions were going on at the highest levels of the State Department and the Israeli government.

The article said that if Hamas did not alter its policy, the two governments would seek to bring about the Palestinian Authority's isolation and collapse by cutting payments and controlling entry and exits into the Palestinian areas. They would also try to stop money transfers through pressure on other governments and on the currency used in the Palestinian areas, the Israeli shekel.

Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, dismissed any reports "about some sort of plan that was talking about forcing Hamas from power so that there could be new elections."

DOJ_NMG_0015379

What there was, Mr. McClellan and Mr. McCormack said, was a threat to cut off aid to the Palestinians if Hamas does not renounce violence, recognize Israel and accept previous agreements.

This warning was conveyed two weeks ago by the United States, Europe, the United Nations secretary general and Russia, and it was repeated Tuesday by Israel.

Daniel Ayalon, the Israeli ambassador to the United States, said, "We emphasize that we do not want to harm the Palestinian people, and that it is their choice whether to abide by international norms or become a terrorist entity."

However, an Israeli official, speaking anonymously because of the speculative nature of his comments, said some officials might have begun thinking about scenarios in which Hamas might fall if aid is cut off.

"Part of diplomacy is discussing different scenarios, but without any intention to bring them into an action plan," he said.

In Gaza, a Hamas spokesman, Mushir al-Masri, said any effort to bring down a freely elected Hamas government would be "a rejection of the democratic process, which the Americans are calling for day and night."

Hamas won the Palestinian parliamentary elections on Jan. 25, but several analysts have noted that Fatah might have won if its votes had not been split among competing Fatah candidates.

The Palestinian Authority is heavily dependent on foreign aid. A cutoff of salaries to workers, including the police, could produce violence, many experts say.

Officials In U.S. Deny Plot On Hamas (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, February 15, 2006

U.S. officials said yesterday that they want the future Hamas-led Cabinet to "succeed" and denied any intention of "thwarting the will" of the Palestinian people by undermining their legitimately elected government.

Both U.S. and Israeli officials said they were resigned to the fact that the new Palestinian legislature, expected to convene on the weekend, will elect a Hamas-dominated government.

But Hamas, which won 74 out of 132 seats in elections on Jan. 25, accused the U.S. and Israel of plotting to destabilize the future government, as reported yesterday by the New York Times.

"The United States, which claims herself to be the mother of democracy, must respect the election results and the will of the Palestinian people," said Hamas spokesman Mushir al-Masri.

U.S. and Israeli officials rejected the accusations that they are seeking to bring down the incoming government and force new elections, saying they trust the Palestinian people to take Hamas to task if it does not govern democratically and peacefully.

"We have no intention of denying the Palestinian people the opportunity to have a government they voted for in a democratic election," a senior U.S. official said.

"There's no plot," said White House spokesman Scott McClellan. "The issue that this goes to is the choice that Hamas has before it. If it wants to realize better relations with the international community, then Hamas must renounce violence, recognize Israel and disarm."

At the State Department, spokesman Sean McCormack said, "The conversations that we are having with the Israeli government are the same conversations we are having with other members of the international community."

U.S. officials said they relied on their public comments to send a message to Hamas because they do not deal directly with the group, which the United States, Israel and the European Union consider a terrorist organization.

"The strategy is public," Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said in Jerusalem. "There is nothing secret about it. It's to present the incoming Palestinian leadership with a clear choice: conform to international norms of behavior, recognize Israel's right to exist, renounce terrorism and accept signed agreements" by the Palestinian Authority.

Various anonymous Israeli officials were quoted by the Israeli press and international wire service reports yesterday as saying that their strategy was to starve the Hamas government and engineer its demise.

Both U.S. and Israeli official spokesmen said that was not the policy of their governments.

"We can't send them assistance because our laws and policies don't allow financing a terrorist organization," the senior U.S. official said.

"But if someone else wants to give them money, that's between them and Hamas," he said, referring to current and potential Arab donors, although he urged other countries to condition their assistance on the West's principles.

Those requirements, laid out by the Middle East Quartet -- the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia -- last month, are denouncing violence, recognizing the Jewish state and adopting the Palestinian Authority's commitments.

"We want the new government to succeed in serving the Palestinian people and making peace with Israel," the U.S. official said.

DOJ_NMG_0015380

Israel's Ha'aretz newspaper quoted security sources as saying that measures such as closing the passages between the Gaza Strip and Israel, which would block access of thousands of Palestinian workers, were being discussed.

Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said that if the Palestinian government is "dominated by a majority of Hamas people, it ceases to be the authority it was, becomes something entirely different, something Israel is not ready to compromise nor is it ready to acquiesce with."

The Weapon Of Democracy (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank

I decided that before writing about Hamas's win in the Palestinian legislative elections, I had to talk to people in the West Bank first. I am so glad I did. Everything is now clear to me: What a mess!

The new Hamas parliamentarians will be sworn in on Saturday, and nobody knows what will happen next. Fourteen of the new Palestinian lawmakers are in Israeli jails, including 10 from Hamas. That's more than 10 percent of the whole Parliament.

About the only thing that is clear to me is the radical mood of both Israeli and Palestinian voters. Consider this: Israel is holding its national election on March 28, and the rightist Likud party, led by Bibi Netanyahu, opened its campaign with ads accusing the centrist Kadima Party, led by Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, of planning to pull Israel back to the 1967 borders. The Likud quickly backed off that line, however, when it realized that so many Israeli voters today liked the idea of pulling back to near the 1967 borders that some may have thought the ad was taken out by Kadima — instead of being an attack on Kadima by Likud.

Yossi Beilin, who heads the leftist Meretz Party, opened his campaign with an ad that says: "Beilin Will Divide Jerusalem." Again, if you'd seen that ad a decade ago, you'd have thought it was a wicked libel. Today it's a campaign promise! After the failed peace process and the Hamas suicide-bombing campaign, many Israelis just want total separation from Palestinians — and a barrier.

"Ideologically, Israelis have never been more dovish," said Ari Shavit, an essayist for the Haaretz newspaper. "But that dovishness is based on the condition that there is a partner we can trust. If so, people are ready to give back everything. The overwhelming majority is now for a two-state solution. But we have become sensible at the very moment that Palestinians have lost their senses."

The Palestinians have thrown out Yasir Arafat's old Fatah Party in favor of Hamas, which wants to eliminate Israel and erect an Islamic state in all of Palestine. So just when Israel's majority comes around to two states, Mr. Shavit added, the Palestinians elect a party that favors only one.

Or have they? It's obvious that the ruling Fatah Party and its allies, led by the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, ran an incomprehensibly stupid campaign. There was no discipline, so in many districts Fatah and its secular-nationalist allies ran four candidates, while Hamas always ran only one. So Fatah votes got divided, and Hamas ones didn't.

The result, the pollster Khalil Shikaki said, is that "Hamas won only 44 percent of the popular vote, but got 56 percent of the seats. Fatah and its allies won 56 percent of the popular vote, but only 43 percent of the seats."

Hamas was clearly elected to provide clean government and order. But it was also elected because its suicide campaign was seen as decisive in getting Israel out of Gaza, thereby bringing Palestinians a measure of dignity, which Fatah failed to do.

Israel, with U.S. backing, says it will cut off all its dealings and financial flows to a Hamas-dominated Palestinian Authority — unless Hamas renounces violence, recognizes Israel and accepts all the P.L.O.-Israel accords. Some Israelis anticipate that a cash-starved Hamas-led government will lead to chaos, and that Mr. Abbas will then be able to call new elections.

I don't think it will be so simple.

The sense I got from Hamas officials here is that Hamas will be low-key and patient, trying to rule as long as possible without money from abroad, working on improving Palestinian governance and hoping that Palestinian society will remain steadfast — and that the Arab world and Europe will somehow intervene to keep Israel and the U.S. from depriving Hamas of its legitimate mandate.

As Farhat Assad, the local Hamas spokesman, remarked: "I thank the United States that they have given us this weapon of democracy. But there is no way to retreat now. It's not possible for the U.S. and the world to turn its back on an elected democracy."

But Hamas will have its hands full managing the West Bank, where it doesn't have as many people or arms as Fatah. As the Israeli strategist Gidi Grinstein put it, Hamas "is like a snake that swallowed an elephant." It has a lot to digest before it can move sharply in any direction.

DOJ_NMG_0015381

Hisham Abdullah, the West Bank A.F.P. reporter, told me that when he went into Ramallah's main bookstore the other day and asked what was selling, the owner said he'd noticed Hamas people buying Dale Carnegie books on management. ...

The Right Way To Pressure Hamas (NYT)

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

America and Israel have to walk a very narrow line in defining their relations with a democratically elected Palestinian government built around Hamas, a party that not only endorses terrorism but also commits it. They cannot possibly give political recognition or financial aid to such a government. Neither can any country that claims to oppose terrorism. That defines the right side of the line.

On the wrong side lies the kind of deliberate destabilization that, according to a report by our Times colleague Steven Erlanger, Washington and Jerusalem are now discussing. That would involve a joint American-Israeli campaign to undermine a Hamas government by putting impossible demands on it, starving it of money and putting even greater restrictions on the Palestinians with an eye toward forcing new elections that might propel the defeated and discredited Fatah Party back to power.

Set aside the hypocrisy such a course would represent on the part of the two countries that have shouted the loudest about the need for Arab democracy, and consider the probable impact of such an approach on the Palestinians. They are already driven to distraction by fury, frustration and poverty. Is it really possible to expect that more punishment from the Israelis and the Americans, this time for not voting the way we wanted them to, would lead them to abandon Hamas?

In the long, sorry history of the Israeli-Palestinian dispute, there is not a shred of evidence to support the notion that pushing the Palestinian population into more economic desperation would somehow cause them to moderate their political views. In fact, experience teaches the exact opposite.

Fatah lost last month's election because its incompetence and corruption drove Palestinian voters into the arms of the more austere, social-services-oriented Hamas. If the new government fails to deliver because it puts continued terrorism over the well-being of the Palestinian people, it may indeed be booted out of office. But a Hamas that could explain continued Palestinian misery by a deliberate American-Israeli plan to reverse the democratic verdict of the polls would be likely to become only stronger.

Washington publicly asserts that no such plan is being discussed. A far wiser course for the United States to pursue would be to step back and desist from deliberately provoking the Palestinians, and give Hamas a chance to reconsider its own options. Some hints about its intentions may emerge from the way its leaders respond to overtures by the Russian president, Vladimir Putin. Last week, Mr. Putin indicated that he intended to invite them to Moscow for a visit.

Mr. Putin's move was controversial in the West, and perhaps he should have provided more warning. But that would be a minor snub indeed if he prods Hamas toward renouncing terrorism, accepting Israel's right to exist and reviving the peace process.

Friends Of Hamas (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

The government of Hugo Chavez will receive representatives of Hamas "with pleasure" should they visit Venezuela on a forthcoming tour of South America. Vladimir Putin has announced he will host a meeting with the Palestinian terrorist group/political party next month in Moscow. "We have never considered Hamas a terrorist organization," says the Russian president.

The ostensible reason Russia and Venezuela give for meeting with Hamas is its victory in last month's legislative elections, which gave it a majority of seats in the Palestinian parliament. We agree that the results of those elections must be "respected," in the narrow sense that they reflect the outcome of a lawful democratic process. But just because something is respected does not make it respectable: Recall the diplomatic quarantine the European Union slapped on Austria in 2000 when elections there put the proto-fascist Freedom Party in government.

For Hamas the invitations are excellent news and a ticket to international legitimacy. Venezuela may be far from the Middle East, but Mr. Chavez maintains close ties with Iran, a patron of Hamas, and his influence in the "non-aligned" world has been growing. Russia is a partner in the so-called quartet of parties involved in Arab-Israeli peace negotiations.

Already, Spain and France have endorsed Mr. Putin's invitation to Hamas, and both governments are reported to be working to have Hamas removed from the European list of terrorist organizations, according to Arab and Israeli sources. Expect other countries to follow suit in this tacit legitimization of Hamas, thereby "isolating" the Bush Administration, which refuses to deal with the group.

Which brings us to yesterday's reports that the U.S. and Israel are trying to "destabilize" Hamas by squeezing the Palestinian Authority for funds -- which was played as front-page news. Neither President Bush nor acting Israeli Prime Minister

Ehud Olmert have made any secret of their intention to isolate Hamas and deprive the Palestinian Authority of funds once Hamas assumes the reins of government.

Nor is there any shame in doing so: Donors have the right to impose conditions on their beneficiaries, and so far Hamas has rejected international calls that it disarm, forswear terrorism and accept the legitimacy of the Jewish state. As Hamas leader Khalid Mish'al wrote in Britain's Guardian immediately after the election, "We shall never recognize the legitimacy of a Zionist state. . . . We shall not seek friendships at the expense of our legitimate rights."

Palestinians need to understand that the exercise of self-government carries consequences. For too long, the international community has failed to extract a price for the Palestinian recourse to terror. That failure has not brought peace, but far worse it has produced the "Palestine" we have now: destitute, savage against both Israelis and moderate Arabs, and, so far, incapable of managing its internal affairs peacefully and competently. By refusing to render Hamas respectable, the U.S. and Israel aren't punishing the Palestinians. They're educating them.

Sharon's Son Is Sentenced To 9 Months In Jail (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

JERUSALEM, Feb. 14 — Omri Sharon, a former member of the Israeli Parliament and the elder son of the prime minister, was sentenced Tuesday to nine months in jail after he pleaded guilty to illegally raising more than $1.3 million for one of his father's political campaigns.

But because his father, Ariel Sharon, is comatose after a major stroke, a Tel Aviv court allowed Omri Sharon to delay the start of his jail term until at least Aug. 31. He was also sentenced to nine months of probation, to begin after he leaves jail, and fined $66,700.

In November, Omri Sharon, 41, entered a guilty plea to charges of falsifying corporate documents, perjury and violating party financing laws during a campaign in 1999 for the leadership of the Likud Party. Under a plea agreement, prosecutors dropped charges of fraud and breach of trust but demanded imprisonment on the other counts. He resigned his seat in Parliament in January. His father was not implicated in the case.

Mr. Sharon's lawyer, Navit Negev, said he would appeal the sentence.

As the reality of a Hamas-controlled government in Palestinian areas drew closer, the Israeli defense minister, Shaul Mofaz, went to Egypt, where he met with President Hosni Mubarak. Mr. Mofaz said there was "no way the state of Israel will speak with Hamas" until it met the conditions of Israel and the international community: to recognize Israel's permanent right to exist, to disavow violence and to accept previous agreements.

Mr. Mofaz told Israel radio that Mr. Mubarak "will exert all efforts to convince Hamas to accept" the necessary conditions and says "that he believes that Hamas will change its ways in the future."

On Tuesday evening, the acting prime minister, Ehud Olmert, told American Jewish leaders that Israel "won't negotiate and won't compromise" with Hamas so long as it remained committed to Israel's destruction.

Mr. Olmert and his government have said they will consider the Palestinian Authority to be run by Hamas when the new legislature is sworn in on Saturday and will stop transferring some $50 million a month in customs duties and taxes.

Palestinian leaders met Tuesday with the German foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, asking him and the international community to continue to finance the Palestinian Authority despite Hamas's recent victory in legislative elections.

"Aid to the Palestinian people should continue, whatever party is going to form the government," said the departing Palestinian foreign minister, Nasser al-Kidwa.

Saeb Erekat, a Palestinian negotiator, called for the "democratic choice of the Palestinian people to be respected." "Aid from Germany, the European Union and other donor countries must continue to finance infrastructure projects in all fields," Mr. Erekat said in a statement.

The European Union is the source of cash income for the Palestinian Authority, which is deeply in debt and receives about $1 billion a year in foreign aid of various kinds.

But Mr. Steinmeier said it would be difficult for Germany to provide aid to a Palestinian government that did not meet international conditions. "The German position does not differ from the European position," he said, explaining that until a Hamas government took power, Brussels would continue financing the Palestinians.

International aid organizations issued an appeal for governments to continue financing the Palestinians despite the victory of Hamas. Some 30 organizations, including Oxfam and Doctors of the World, said in a statement that the local Palestinian population needed support.

Cartoon Protests In Pakistan Leave 2 Dead (USAT)

USA Today, February 15, 2006

Thousands of people rampaged through two cities Tuesday in Pakistan's worst violence in response to caricatures of the prophet Mohammed. In Lahore, guards fatally shot two protesters trying to force their way into a bank, Interior Minister Aftab Khan Sherpao said. Mobs burned a government building, a hotel, two banks and a KFC. A Citibank, Holiday Inn and Pizza Hut were vandalized. In the capital, Islamabad, 400 students stormed the heavily guarded diplomatic enclave, brandishing sticks and throwing stones. They were dispersed with tear gas, and no foreigners were hurt.

The cartoons that have inflamed many Muslims first appeared in a Danish newspaper in September and have been reprinted by other Western media.

Britain moves to ban indoor smoking

The House of Commons voted to ban smoking in all indoor public places after rejecting exemptions for private clubs and pubs that do not serve food. If approved by the upper House of Lords, the ban would take effect in mid-2007. The issue split Prime Minister Tony Blair's Cabinet. Blair voted for it. Health officials say 114,000 Britons die each year from smoking-related illnesses.

Sharon's son sentenced to prison

The oldest son of comatose Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was sentenced in Jerusalem to nine months in prison for illegal fundraising during his father's 1999 primary campaign for the Likud Party leadership. Omri Sharon, 41, pleaded guilty in November and resigned his parliament seat last month.

Egypt postpones local elections for 2 years

Egypt's parliament voted to delay local council elections for two years, until April 2008, making it harder for independent candidates to seek the presidency. A constitutional amendment approved last year requires them to be endorsed by at least 140 council members. The opposition Muslim Brotherhood said the delay prevents it from picking up seats, as it did in parliamentary elections in November, to make endorsements. Brotherhood deputy leader Mohamed Habib said that under the current councils, President Hosni Mubarak's National Democratic Party will be free to pick his successor. Mubarak has ruled since 1981.

Protests Over Cartoons Shake Pakistan (WP)

By John Lancaster

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Feb. 14 -- Protesters ransacked Western businesses in the city of Lahore and stormed a diplomatic enclave in the capital Tuesday to vent their anger over caricatures of the prophet Muhammad. It was the worst such violence in Pakistan since the cartoon controversy erupted last month.

Two protesters in Lahore were killed when they tried to force their way into a bank and were shot by a security guard, authorities said.

Protesters in the historic eastern city burned a hotel, two banks, a KFC restaurant and the office of Telenor, a Norwegian telecom company, as well as vehicles and two movie theaters, the Associated Press reported. Tear gas and smoke from burning vehicles wafted through the center of the city as police fired shots in the air.

In Islamabad, the Pakistani capital, hundreds of young men pushed past security guards and made their way into the heart of the main enclave for foreign embassies. They vandalized cars, smashed windows at a branch of the British bank Standard Chartered and shouted slogans such as "Expel European Ambassadors" and "Death to Denmark," the country where the cartoons originally were published in a newspaper. The Danish Embassy is outside the enclave.

Police used tear gas to drive the protesters out of the fenced, partially forested enclave once they had congregated near the Indian and British embassies. The heavily guarded U.S. Embassy is deeper inside the enclave and was not directly affected.

The mocking cartoons of Muhammad have aroused intense anger across the Muslim world, especially in the Middle East, but Pakistan until this week had avoided violent protests such as those that have roiled the capitals of Lebanon and Syria.

Gen. Pervez Musharraf, Pakistan's president, has strongly condemned the cartoons, and a number of peaceful protests have been held across the country. The protest campaign has included not just hard-line religious parties, whose leaders have called for prosecution of those responsible for the cartoons, but also mainstream secular parties. Earlier this month, Pakistan's Senate overwhelmingly passed a resolution condemning the "blasphemous and derogatory cartoons." Religious leaders say they are planning a series of "million man" marches in major cities across the country in the next several weeks.

On Tuesday, Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz told reporters that the publication of the cartoons had "created a big sense of unease," adding, "Such acts cannot be condoned and must be condemned." Members of parliament from across the political spectrum marched from the parliament building to the enclave to hold a five-minute silent protest.

Last week, an editorial in the Friday Times, a liberal newsmagazine, said Western governments, in defending the right of newspapers to publish the cartoons, had "demeaned the West's lofty ideals and exposed the designs of its new crusaders."

DOJ_NMG_0015384

Besides burning some businesses, protesters in Lahore ransacked a McDonald's and a Pizza Hut and threw stones at a Holiday Inn and Western-owned filling stations, the Reuters news agency reported. Police responded by wielding batons and firing tear gas.

In Islamabad, several thousand protesters gathered outside parliament, where some shouted anti-American slogans.

Italian Minister Puts Mohammad Cartoon On T-shirts (REU)

By Crispian Balmer

Reuters, February 14, 2006

Italy's Reform Minister Roberto Calderoli has had T-shirts made emblazoned with cartoons of the Prophet Mohammad in a move that could embarrass Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi's government.

Calderoli, a member of the anti-immigrant Northern League party, told Ansa news agency on Tuesday that the West had to stand up against Islamist extremists and offered to hand out T-shirts to anyone who wanted them.

"I have had T-shirts made with the cartoons that have upset Islam and I will start wearing them today," Ansa quoted Calderoli as saying.

He said the T-shirts were not meant to be a provocation but added that he saw no point trying to appease extremists.

"We have to put an end to this story that we can talk to these people. They only want to humiliate people. Full stop. And what are we becoming? The civilization of melted butter?" Calderoli said.

The publication of the cartoons in some European newspapers, including one showing an image of the prophet with a bomb for a turban, have provoked widespread anger in the Muslim world.

Many Muslims believe it is blasphemous to depict the Prophet and there have been a number of violent protests in the Middle East and Asia.

The Northern League, which is gearing up for an April general election, has leapt on the controversy to promote its own far-right political agenda.

RELIGIOUS WAR

The League has long led the charge against illegal immigration and its leaders say the cartoon violence shows the dangers of allowing Muslim immigrants to settle in Italy.

"This is only the tip of the iceberg of the religious war Islamist extremists have declared on us," Calderoli told reporters earlier this month.

The Italian press reported that Berlusconi last week urged Calderoli to take a more moderate stance over the issue, but the minister said on Tuesday he had no intention of keeping quiet.

"As for Berlusconi, seeing as he has compared himself to Jesus Christ, I would call on him to follow (Christ's) example and think about evangelizing Christian values and not be evangelized by Islam," Calderoli was quoted as saying.

Berlusconi caused a storm at the weekend when he said: "I am the Jesus Christ of politics...I sacrifice myself for everyone."

Maintaining a steady stream of anti-foreigner invective, Calderoli earlier this month dismissed a Palestinian journalist on a television chat show, as: "that suntanned lady." He also said he was delighted newcomers to Italy would not benefit from a government scheme to encourage people to have more children.

"I am proud of the fact that the baby bonus will only go to Italian citizens. I say to all those Ali Babas that either Allah or their governments will have to think of them."

The League's anti-immigrant stance has found a sympathetic audience in the wealthy north of Italy, where many third world immigrants have settled in recent years.

League politicians say the immigrants are responsible for growing crime rates and are also challenging Italians for jobs.

Latest opinion polls say the League will get up to six percent of the vote in the April election against just 3.9 percent in the 2001 ballot. However, it is not clear what part the anti-immigrant rhetoric has played in this increase.

Blasphemy!

Wow. You want blasphemy, try Christianity in America.

Here's the latest cover of Rolling Stone, featuring rapper Kanye West wearing Christ's crown of thorns! Go to the bookstore for "The Da Vinci Code," a thriller that posits Christ had sex!

Television! "South Park's" notorious "The Spirit of Christmas" short, featuring an obscenity-filled fistfight between Christ and Santa Claus! Sample dialogue: "Holy [expletive], it's Jesus!"

DOJ_NMG_0015385

Radio! "The Tom Joyner Morning Show," which features comedian J. Anthony Brown and his "biblical sayings" from the Last Supper, in which disciples make outrageous quips.

Big hits, one and all. America's fascinations with comedy, narrative drama, religious fervor and free speech routinely produce the edgy and the heretical in culture both high and low. Sometimes it's protested, sometimes it's boycotted, but the right to be religiously offended is the right to be a modern American -- most particularly for Christians, as we will see.

"Before World War I, all the interesting 'free speech' cases were about blasphemy," says Sarah Barringer Gordon, professor of law and history at the University of Pennsylvania, who has written often on the subject. "There were all sorts of bloody laws on the books. In 17th-century Maryland, you could have your tongue nailed to a tree for it."

Blasphemy -- "denying the being or providence of God . . . profane scoffing at the holy scripture" according to Blackstone's Commentaries -- had been an offense in Western society since the Greeks, and it was no joke in Colonial America. There were the Salem witch trials, of course, and it was a capital offense in Connecticut.

Even if such penalties were rarely if ever carried out (there's no record of a Marylander actually having his tongue nailed to a tree), the law was still stern. In 1811, a New Yorker named John Ruggles was convicted of blasphemy for shouting "Jesus Christ was a bastard and his mother must be a whore!" An appellate judge upheld the verdict, seconding the jury's reasoning that Ruggles had "openly and wantonly" reviled Jesus and Mary, with no purpose.

Such convictions came to an end in the 20th century. Civil libertarians in this country began to regard blasphemy as a strictly religious issue, and the courts agreed. The new American way was a sharp cultural break from the underlying bodies of legal thought in Europe and the United Kingdom, which had state-sanctioned churches. The position was cemented by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1952, in a case called Burstyn v. Wilson . New York had banned Italian filmmaker's Roberto Rossellini's film, "The Miracle," about a peasant woman who believed she was the Virgin Mary. It was legally imported into the country, but the Catholic Church lambasted it as sacrilegious. It was banned, a decision upheld by the state appellate court.

But the Supreme Court overturned the case, ruling: "It is not the business of government in our nation to suppress real or imagined attacks upon a particular religious doctrine."

Since then, the image and topic of Christ has been subjected to almost every indignity imaginable.

John Lennon notoriously opined in 1966 that the Beatles were "more popular than Jesus." There was Monty Python's "Life of Brian," the "Piss Christ" photo exhibit (with an image of a crucified Jesus, soaking in urine), Martin Scorsese's "The Last Temptation of Christ," and Kevin Smith's "Dogma."

Attempts to ban these things simply didn't work, or backfired. In 1999, record crowds showed when then-New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani tried to shut down a museum for featuring a painting of the Virgin Mary besmirched with elephant dung.

Want to see a movie crowd this summer? Try to get into "The Da Vinci Code" on opening day.

To Mark Galli, managing editor of Christianity Today, the American willingness to offend Christianity, but extend deference to Islam regarding the current batch of Muhammad cartoons, can be understood through a series of cultural and political differences.

First, he notes, Christians worship a man who was persecuted, beaten and killed. The sense that people might persecute Christ's followers is an inherent part of the Christian ethos, he says, so Christians are inherently likely to tolerate offense. Muhammad, a prophet who died after an illness, did not leave behind a religion with that mindset, he says.

The second factor, he theorizes, is that American society assigns different rules of social conduct for majority and minority cultures, in which the dominant culture isn't supposed to ridicule smaller ones. It's done, of course, but it's seen as bad form.

"Christianity is fair game for mocking because it's an established presence here, it's always been a majority, and there's no sense of followers being a persecuted minority," he says. "When people can be publicly mocked in this country, it means you're a player, and you're going to take your lumps with everyone else. There's not that sense with Muslims. People are more cautious."

Cautious, yes, but not unwilling to offend religious minorities.

Last year, Mel Gibson's "The Passion of the Christ" drew protests that it was anti-Semitic -- and yet was a blockbuster. When Ayatollah Khomeini issued a 1989 fatwa calling for the murder of Indian-born British novelist Salman Rushdie for alleged blasphemies in "The Satanic Verses," the book became an American bestseller and Rushdie an icon of free speech.

Defiance of a Muslim edict was behind the publication of Muhammad cartoons in the Denmark newspaper and subsequent reprintings in newspapers across Europe, says Sayyid M. Syeed, secretary general of the Islamic Society of North America.

Syeed, who was born in Kashmir and immigrated to the United States as an adult, says that while millions of Muslims may think of America as a pro-Israeli invader of Iraq, it is still true that much of that knowledge is not based on personal experience. European affronts, through a long history of colonialism and exploitation, are more visceral. They've left scars. They've created a different psychological relationship.

DOJ_NMG_0015386

"European countries were colonial masters of several Muslim lands, and the psychological aspects of that relationship have lived on and on," Syeed says. "It's difficult for the Belgians, the Danes, the French -- it's difficult for them to believe that these former colonies have a religion that is of consequence. They get a kick out of insulting them."

Yvonne Haddad, professor of the history of Islam and of Christian-Muslim relations at Georgetown University, continues the theme:

"Of the 57 nations that belong to the Organization of the Islamic Conference, 54 have been colonized by Europe," she says. "That history is well known in Islamic countries, you've got the current war in Iraq. . . . Those things form the context for this sort of response. Devout Muslims are offended by the cartoons, but this is not just a religious affront. It's also political."

Karachi, Pakistan

OF course this isn't about freedom of speech."

I've heard that line countless times in Karachi lately about the Danish cartoon controversy, including from journalists who fiercely guard their own right to work without censorship. There is nothing but condemnation here for European newspapers' publication of the cartoons.

But there are two separate threads to this condemnation. The first relates to the extreme religious offense caused by the cartoons, which has prompted an increasing number of protests, with a worrying trend towards violence. The small rallies a week ago were heartening in their peacefulness, but yesterday the protests claimed two deaths in Lahore and significant destruction. Though the numbers taking to the streets are still not vast by Pakistani standards they are growing.

The second thread to the condemnation concentrates not on the offense itself, but on the motive behind it. The idea that the cartoons were a deliberate provocation to get us to behave badly is being encouraged by officialdom: various political groups have condemned "the planned conspiracy by the West to instigate the Muslims"; the Foreign Office has said the cartoons are part of "sinister agendas"; the chief minister of the country's most religiously conservative province, himself a leading member of the religious alliance that gains much of its popularity from its anti-Western stance, has said the cartoons are aimed at bringing about "the clash of civilizations."

"Do you think people buy this line?" I asked a businessman whose political opinion I've always respected.

"Yes," he said. "But there are two ways in which that can be played out. One is that your 'fringe element,' who often turn to violence, mute their responses in order to defeat this alleged agenda of provocation. And the other is that they say, 'You want a fight, O.K., we'll give you a fight.' It all depends on how the religious leaders direct them for their own political ends."

But to what extent do people away from the fringe buy into this notion of a conspiracy? At a coffee bar in Karachi with four of my female friends — two schoolteachers, a lawyer and an interior designer — I asked, "Were the cartoons meant to be provocative?"

"Yes!" The response was unanimous.

"So is there a conspiracy to provoke Muslims into reacting violently?"

Here, everyone's certainty diminished. "No, not a conspiracy," one of the schoolteachers said, and the others signaled agreement.

I couldn't quite work out if the distancing from the word "conspiracy" had to do with the whiff of paranoia that has attached to it since the term "conspiracy theorist" came into vogue. "What is the point of the provocation?" I pressed on.

"Who ever knows what's going on?" one of the schoolteachers said. "It's something internal going on in those places. Or something to do with their own politics about, who knows, Iran, Israel. It could be anything."

"It's not the publication in Denmark I find most objectionable," said the other schoolteacher. "It's the re-publication in France after all the riots that happened there. This is their way of telling the Muslims: 'You are second-class citizens. We don't care about your sensitivities.' "

Later, over dinner, a member of my family said: "It's just racism. You act in ways that you know will provoke the extremists to start ranting and then you get bearded men frothing at the mouth, and — because those are the only images that get significant news coverage — you can then turn around and say, 'You see, all Muslims are fanatics.' "

"And that plays straight into the hand of the right wing in Europe whose greatest strength comes from racist polemic?" I finished. That really didn't seem a million miles away from suggestions of a conspiracy.

"Listen," said my father. "The most important thing here is not to confuse a group within an entity for the entity itself. Europeans, Muslims, European Muslims — most people just want to live in peace. For us to start believing Europe is represented by its right-wing fanatics would be as wrong as for them to believe Islam is represented by our right-wing fanatics."

DOJ_NMG_0015387

But until someone finds a way to turn "Muslims don't riot" and "Europeans don't conspire" into news stories, there doesn't seem any easy way to avoid precisely such confusion.

The Islam Gap (NYT)

By Karim Raslan

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

Jakarta, Indonesia

SOUTHEAST Asian Muslims have not been roiled by a clash of civilizations. Rather, people like me — Western-trained, English-speaking and constantly traveling — have begun to see the subtle differences that fracture our civilizations from within.

Whether we are conservative or liberal, many of us are appalled and angered by the stupidity and insensitivity of the Danish newspaper cartoons. But that doesn't mean we've taken leave of our senses. I, for one, won't be throwing out my Lego set or my Bang & Olufsen sound system, let alone plotting to unveil a Zionist conspiracy. I may be a Muslim, but I can tell the difference between a newspaper and a people, a country and a principle.

Even Din Syamsuddin, the head of Indonesia's 30 million strong Muhammadiyah Muslim association (and a firebrand by most accounts), told his followers to remain calm: "I urge Muslims not to overreact and act in a violent and anarchist way because those things are completely against Islamic teachings."

We generally believe that anger and violence are self-defeating. The region's moderate leaders, like Malaysia's prime minister, Abdullah Badawi, and Indonesia's president, Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, exemplify this belief. Both men have criticized the cartoons. "The rights of press freedom are not absolute; whatever the faith, we must respect it," President Yudhoyono said. Still, neither he nor Mr. Abdullah has advocated boycotting Danish products or ending relations, although hotheads in both countries have called for such radical steps.

To be sure, there have been some copycat demonstrations in Kuala Lumpur and Jakarta, as well as attacks on the Danish and American consulates in Indonesia's second-largest city, Surabaya. But the extensive violence and ugly rhetoric we are seeing broadcast from elsewhere in the Muslim world point to differences between the Arab-Muslim heartland and the Indo-Malay periphery.

Yes, we are part of the extended family of believers, the ummah. We cannot help but feel some sense of solidarity with our co-religionists in Damascus, Tehran or Cairo. But the explosiveness of the Arab street doesn't translate, somehow, to the tropics. Many of us have a growing suspicion that we are culturally different from our Arabic- and Urdu-speaking brethren, perhaps more tolerant and less emotional.

I am reminded of how uncomfortable I felt last year when traveling through Saudi Arabia, surrounded by a people I found disquietingly alien. For all we share as Muslims, we Southeast Asians don't really know what it's like to inhabit the cultures or politics of the Middle East.

Nor is the West a unitary culture. Europe's fervent secularism reminds me that the nation of the Great Satan, with its crowded churches and Sunday preachers who fill sports stadiums, is actually more like my world than Europe is.

Since Sept. 11, I've accepted certain verities that now I have come to question. Europe was supposed to be the neutral bastion of moderation in the face of a belligerent America. But in fact that Europe is godless and alone.

Lebanon Remembers Hariri (CSM)

By Nicholas Blanford

The Christian Science Monitor, February 15, 2006

BEIRUT - Lebanon's Cedar revolutionaries returned to the streets here Tuesday, transforming the city center into a swaying sea of red and white national flags as the country marked the anniversary of the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

The rally, which drew as many as 1 million, echoed last spring's huge anti-Syrian protests spurred by Mr. Hariri's murder that compelled Damascus to withdraw its troops from Lebanon. The Syrian disengagement was supposed to usher in a new era of independence from Damascus's embrace.

Yet a year on, Lebanon is deeply divided, split by a resurgent sectarianism, threatened by a growing Al Qaeda presence, and torn by competing political visions over the future direction of the country.

This country is once more becoming a battleground in a broader struggle for control of the Middle East, pitting the axis of Iran, Syria, and Lebanon's powerful Hizbullah organization against the influence of the West, chiefly the US, Britain, and France.

"Lebanon will be engulfed again in a huge power game that will last quite a long time. This is the tragic destiny of Lebanon," says Walid Jumblatt, the leader of Lebanon's Druze community.

DOJ_NMG_0015388

Twelve months after his death, the shadow of the billionaire construction tycoon and politician continues to loom over a country that saw the heady optimism of last spring's Independence Uprising, often called the Cedar Revolution, turn into disillusion, political turmoil, and bloodshed.

From dozens of newly erected billboards, Hariri's face gazes benevolently out over a city that he helped rebuild from the ruins of the 1975-1990 civil war. "They feared you and killed you," reads one sign. At one junction, an electronic counter ticks away the number of days in red numerals since Hariri died along with 22 others when a van packed with nearly a ton of TNT exploded beside his motorcade in central Beirut.

In Martyrs' Square where the flag waving demonstrators gathered Tuesday, organizers hoped to revive the spirit of the Independence Uprising, focusing this time on ousting Emile Lahoud, the pro-Syrian president.

"There is one person who is playing with Lebanon's security and that's Emile Lahoud," says Tarek Balad, carrying a portrait of Hariri. "All Lebanese want him to go."

In an address to the crowd from behind a bulletproof glass screen, Saad Hariri, Rafik's son and political heir, called for Mr. Lahoud's ouster, describing him as "the symbol of [Syrian] domination."

Chibli Mallat, a democracy campaigner who advocates replacing Lahoud, says that the rally marked a "new phase" in the struggle for full independence. "The extraordinary momentum we have gathered again today will have been lost if we don't succeed in translating this very massive demand for him to leave into his ousting," he says.

Yet, like the mass rallies of last year, the participants were mainly Christians, Sunni Muslims, and Druze. Other than formal delegations, Lebanon's Shiites, the largest of the country's sects, were absent, underlining Lebanon's deep political and sectarian divisions.

The US is urging the Lebanese government to disarm the powerful Shiite Hizbullah organization in compliance with UN Resolution 1559. However, Hizbullah and its allies represent a third of the government, and the party refuses to disarm. The political dispute is paralyzing the government's ability to tackle the moribund economy and improve the fraught security climate.

Sensing the government's weakness, Syria's former allies are gaining confidence and mobilizing their supporters. "There's a new order in Lebanon that is getting ready to change the situation," says Wiam Wahhab, a staunch pro- Syrian former minister.

The political turmoil is aggravated by a heightened sectarianism that is further complicated by the emergence of a militant Islamist trend that has taken hold in the poorer Sunni regions of north Lebanon. "The political differences have assumed very sharp cultural dimensions which is very disturbing," says Samir Khalaf, professor of political science at the American University of Beirut.

Last month, Lebanese authorities arrested 13 members of an Islamist cell, the latest evidence, the government says, of Al Qaeda-style militancy establishing a foothold in Lebanon.

Earlier this month, thousands of mainly Sunni demonstrators, including Islamist militants and pro-Syrian activists, rampaged through a Christian quarter of Beirut when a protest against the publication in Europe of cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad turned into a sectarian riot.

The Lebanese government accuses Syria of seeking to destabilize Lebanon by inciting this kind of violence. Of the rioters arrested, almost half were Syrians or Palestinians.

Damascus is also blamed for a sporadic campaign of bombings and assassinations that has forced some prominent critics of Syria to stay overseas.

Many Lebanese say the tensions will continue until a UN investigation into Hariri's death is concluded and the culprits are known. But the commission has warned that it could take months, maybe years, before the identity of the killers is finally revealed. Lebanon's turbulent year

· Feb. 14, 2005: Former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri is assassinated in Beirut with 22 others
· Feb. 16: About 200,000 Lebanese protest Syria at Hariri's funeral
· March 8: Hizbullah organizes a large "pro-Syrian" march in Beirut
· March 14: About 1 million Lebanese rally to call for Syrian withdrawal
· April 26: The last Syrian troops leave Lebanon ending a 29-year military presence

Audiences Cheer Film's Anti-U.S. Message (WT)

By Nicholas Birch

The Washington Times, February 15, 2006

ISTANBUL -- A new film riding on a wave of anti-Americanism is attracting record audiences in Turkey and has drawn approving comments from the wife of Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan.

DOJ_NMG_0015389

Gum-chewing U.S. soldiers shoot Iraqis in cold blood at a wedding in one scene from the movie. In another scene, set at that the Abu Ghraib prison near Baghdad, a Jewish-American doctor harvests Iraqi prisoners' kidneys for sale to Israel and the West.

"What this film shows is that the Americans won't always have it their way," said Serdar Yagci, a student outside a theater in central Istanbul.

Minutes earlier, he had been one of many in the audience who stood up and cheered when the film's dour hero, Turkish agent Polat Alemdar, tracked down and killed a villainous U.S. Army officer who said he was guided by God.

"Valley of the Wolves: Iraq" fictionalizes the arrests of members of a Turkish military mission in Iraqi Kurdistan in 2003. Suspected of plotting to assassinate a Kurdish politician, the 11 men had sacks placed over their heads by U.S. soldiers before being taken to Baghdad for questioning.

In real life, Turks could do nothing but fume at what they perceived as a grave insult to their country's most respected institution: the army. In the film, Alemdar takes single-handed revenge on the perpetrators of the slight before bringing peace to Iraq.

"It sounds laughable -- an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, a sack for sack," wrote Alin Tasciyan, one of several critics to pan the film for its "clunky, didactic dialogue" and bad acting.

"Valley of the Wolves" is not the work of independents or amateurs. With a budget of $10 million, it's the biggest-spending Turkish film in history. The international cast includes Hollywood actor Billy Zane of "Titanic."

Within three days of its release, the movie had been seen by 1.2 million people, a 40 percent increase on the previous viewing record.

At a gala performance earlier this month, the actors rubbed shoulders with Turkey's elite.

"I feel so proud of them all," said Emine Erdogan, wife of the prime minister, comfortably ensconced in a seat next to the actor playing Alemdar.

Although Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul insisted that the film was no worse than some of the productions of Hollywood studios, Turkish parliament leader Bulent Arinc praised its "realism."

U.S. officials in Turkey laugh off the significance of the film, but a senior Washington official interviewed by the Turkish daily Milliyet last week expressed concern about its success in a secular Muslim country with a U.S. alliance since the early 1950s.

"Can you imagine the first lady or the head of the House of Representatives going to the gala performance of a film that could incite anti-Turkish feeling among Americans?" the official asked.

U.S. Cuts Funds For Family Planning Overseas, Stirring Opposition (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 — President Bush, who acted on his first full day in office five years ago to deny federal aid to overseas groups that help women obtain abortions, is for the first time proposing sharp cuts in financing for international family planning programs that the White House had described as one of the best ways to prevent abortion.

Since 2001, the administration had adhered to Mr. Bush's commitment to maintain the financing of such programs at $425 million, the same level as in the last year of the Clinton administration.

But in the president's new budget proposal, financing would fall 18 percent, from $436 million this year to $357 million.

The cuts are stirring strong opposition from nonprofit groups and Democrats on the House and Senate appropriations subcommittees responsible for foreign aid. They say the reductions would mean more unintended pregnancies for the world's poorest women, and more dangerous abortions in countries where the procedure is outlawed.

"It's ironic that an administration outwardly committed to reducing the incidence of abortion would take away valuable tools for preventing unwanted pregnancies," said Representative Nita M. Lowey, Democrat of New York.

Ed Fox, an assistant administrator at the United States Agency for International Development, said the budget cuts for family planning should be viewed in the broader context of large proposed increases for presidential initiatives to combat AIDS and malaria that will greatly benefit women.

He also pointed to a $21 million program to help African women combat sexual violence.

"This is a much better budget than we've had in the past for women's health," he said.

The extent of the reductions for family planning became apparent only this week when Mr. Fox provided an overall estimate of financing from "all spigots" in both the State Department and A.I.D. budgets — a figure requested Wednesday. The budget released Feb. 6 contained clues to the decline in financing but not the total number.

DOJ_NMG_0015390

The disagreement over Mr. Bush's approach to family planning services in developing countries dates back to one of his first acts as president. On Jan. 22, 2001, he reinstated a Reagan-era rule that prohibited the financing of groups that provided abortion services, counseled women about abortion or advocated for the legalization of abortion.

Critics of this policy called it the "gag rule" because it penalized groups that pushed for changes in laws.

The International Planned Parenthood Federation, with membership associations in 151 countries, lost an estimated $15 million a year in federal financing because it refused to comply, said its director general, Dr. Steven W. Sinding.

Just last week, on the same day the president's budget was introduced, the British development agency announced a global program for safe abortion, pledging about $4.5 million to Planned Parenthood to carry it out.

In a news release, the agency said the funds were intended to "support work on abortion that has suffered or been neglected as a result of the Global Gag Rule."

Even as the abortion debate raged, the administration had stuck to a commitment the president made the same day he reinstated the Reagan-era rule.

A White House news release said President Bush would maintain the $425 million financing level because he knew family planning services were "one of the best ways to prevent abortion."

Top Vote-getter Alleges Fraud In Haitian Elections (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, February 15, 2006

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti — Leading presidential candidate Rene Preval claimed Tuesday that “gross errors” and likely fraud marred the vote that saw him fall just short of a first-round victory.

He also urged supporters to protest peacefully, a day after at least one pro-Preval demonstrator was killed.

“We are convinced that either massive fraud or gross errors stain the (electoral) process,” Preval said.

United Nations spokesman David Wimhurst said no evidence of fraud was detected in the vote. Haitian officials haven't said when they will release final results.

White U.N. armored vehicles shoved aside roadblocks of junked cars, old refrigerators and other debris in the capital Tuesday. Most streets were clear by midafternoon. Businesses remained shuttered, but street markets bustled with shoppers.

Preval, a former protégé of ousted president Jean-Bertrand Aristide who enjoys support among the poor, called on followers to remove all roadblocks so people can get to work.

“I ask the Haitian people … to be mature, to be responsible, to be non-violent,” Preval told reporters on the lawn of his gated home in the Petionville suburb.

The most recent election results, posted on the electoral council's website Monday, showed Preval had 48.76% of the vote with 90% of ballots counted. He needs 50% plus one vote from the Feb. 7 election to avoid a March runoff.

The constitution indicates a challenge would go to the Supreme Court, but the interim government recently decreed that complaints should go to the electoral commission — the same body issuing results.

The U.N. Security Council urged Haitians to respect election results and extended the U.N. peacekeeping mission for six months, until Aug. 15. About 7,300 U.N. troops and 1,750 international police are in Haiti.

A runoff election would pit Preval against Leslie Manigat, also a former president, who got 11.8% of the vote, according to preliminary results.

Haitian Front-Runner Breaks Silence; Charges Fraud (NYT)

By Ginger Thompson And Amy Bracken

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti, Feb. 14 — René Préval, whose support among the poor masses has made him the favorite to become Haiti's next president, stepped out of the silence he began after the election last week to charge Tuesday that "massive fraud and gross errors had stained the process."

Still, he urged the throngs of people who had paralyzed cities with flaming barricades and protests to end the violence and continue demonstrating peacefully.

"The Haitian people are frustrated," Mr. Préval said. "They have a right to be frustrated. And they have the right to protest. But we must respect private property. We must respect the law. We must respect the rights of others.

"Do not give in to anger. Today, let's conduct politics intelligently, without violence."

At a news conference at his sister's house in Peguy-Ville, a hillside suburb, Mr. Préval rejected election results released so far that showed him with a wide margin against his nearest opponent, but slightly short of the 50 percent plus one vote that he needs to avoid a runoff. He said the tabulations had been rigged against him, but he and his supporters offered little in the way of evidence.

In the name of his coalition, Lespwa, the Creole word for hope, Mr. Préval demanded that electoral authorities withhold announcing the final results, which had been expected Tuesday but were delayed until Wednesday, for a transparent recount.

"If you publish the results the way they are now," Mr. Préval said, "Lespwa will contest, and the people will contest."

The warnings and calls for calm, live on radio and television stations, seemed to have almost immediate effects. Leaders of the interim government and foreign diplomats worked on plans for a review of the tabulations. United Nations troops began clearing away junked cars, heavy boulders and burning tires blocking the main thoroughfares here. Traffic began crawling where angry protesters had roamed. Markets began bustling with shoppers. And small demonstrations felt more like parties than protests.

"Now I feel happy," said Denis Constant, one of a few hundred people who danced through Canapé Vert on Tuesday afternoon. "I don't know whether he will be president. But I think things will all work out."

It was unclear to most people how the saga surrounding the elections on Feb. 7 would end. The contests, organized by an interim government, installed by the United States and backed by 9,000 United Nations troops, were widely considered crucial to restore a semblance of democracy to a country whose institutions have been wrecked by a long history of dictators and whose people were sucked into a new cycle of upheaval two years ago when an armed uprising ousted President Jean-Bertrand Aristide.

The elections had seemed to pull Haiti back from the brink of civil war. After a tumultuous start, large numbers of people waited for hours to cast their ballots without a serious incident of violence. But the tabulation and accusations from political camps that tally sheets were manipulated have re-ignited old fights.

Political analysts close to the negotiations that started after violence flared Monday indicated that a special commission could be formed by foreign diplomats, the interim government and the United Nations Stabilization Mission in Haiti to review the tabulations. Michel Brunache, director of the cabinet of the interim president, said in an interview that the commission would not include foreigners, but representatives of the Provisional Electoral Council, from Mr. Préval's Lespwa party and from the government's executive branch..

To prevent violence, Mr. Brunache said, the government made an agreement with Mr. Préval to withhold the final results until the commission had finished its review.

"During these elections, Haitian people showed their desire to advance democracy," Mr. Préval said, referring to a turnout estimated at more than 60 percent. "The people are convinced I won in the first round. But when they saw the votes for me begin to decline, it was like a cruel hoax. Their hope turned to anger."

His camp offered no numbers or documents to refute conclusively the results so far, which show him with 48.7 percent of an estimated 90 percent of the ballots. Suspicions seemed to focus on an estimated 85,000 blank votes and 120,000 voided ballots, of about 2.2 million votes that election officials said had been cast.

Advisers to Mr. Préval suggested that tens of thousands of Haitians would not have walked hours or stood in line to cast blank votes.

Those ballots, by law, have been included in the net totals. Without them, Mr. Préval would have, so far, won more than 51 percent of the vote.

Some people, however, see the large number of blanks as reflecting broad contempt for their government — which has done little to lift this country out of extreme poverty — or of people's disfavor for all 33 presidential candidates.

Mr. Préval's advisers also expressed concerns about an estimated 8 percent of the ballots that are missing, at least half believed lost or stolen. The advisers pointed out the wide discrepancies between the results announced by the government and those predicted by independent international organizations.

A slow-count sample of the results by the National Democratic Institute showed that Mr. Préval would win in the first round, with 52 to 54 percent of the votes. A ballot survey by the Organization of American States showed that Mr. Préval would win an estimated 55 percent of the votes.

"We have solid arguments that the results by the government do not reflect reality," said Bob Manuel, an adviser to Mr. Préval who was loosely translating the candidate's words for the Spanish-speaking news media. "We are asking them to wait so we can present evidence."

Residents from a violent slum, Cité Soleil, near Titanyen, 20 miles north of the capital, said they found mounds of ballots dumped there, most supporting Mr. Préval.

Cité Soleil is a Préval stronghold. A spokesman for the United Nations mission here, David Wimhurst, said the ballots could have come from one of the nine voting centers trashed on Election Day. But he could not confirm that. Other than the images of thousands of pages of documents, the discovery had not been confirmed. After the scenes of the discovery were broadcast on television, there were reports of barricades going back up in scattered parts of the capital and of gangs of young men on motorcycles screaming threats.

As for Tuesday, all tabulations stopped. A high O.A.S. official said work at the central tabulation center stopped because barricades kept technicians from reporting in.

Haiti's Preval Claims Fraud Spoiled His Win (WP)

By Manuel Roig-franzia

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti, Feb. 14 -- Haiti's fractured electoral process, already disrupted by street protests Monday, stalled further on Tuesday as the leading presidential candidate, Rene Preval, said "gigantic fraud" had kept him from a first-round victory and official vote-counters refused to report for work because they feared attacks by protesters.

Preval's return to the capital after nearly a week at his remote mountain home had a soothing effect on demonstrators, who responded to his plea for calm Tuesday by taking down most of the fiery roadblocks they had set up since early morning. But the lull appeared to be only temporary as the country anxiously awaited final results a full week after the Feb. 7 election.

"If they publish the results as they are now, we will oppose them, the Haitian people will also oppose them, and there will be protests," Preval said, addressing reporters as he sat on a striped couch beneath a flame tree in the back yard of his sister's gated home in suburban Pegguyville.

Preval, a former president and agronomist who is popular with Haiti's poor, railed about "gross errors" in vote counting, but he declined to discuss specifics or present evidence to support his claims.

With about 90 percent of ballots counted, officials said Preval had won 48.6 percent of the vote. That total is short of the simple majority required to avert a runoff with Leslie Manigat, another former president, who won 11 percent of the vote.

Liszt Quitel, an adviser to Preval, said the campaign had been told that the remaining ballots are missing. "People on the inside are saying they don't know where they are," Quitel said.

David Winhurst, a spokesman for the United Nations, said that "we have no evidence of fraud." The United Nations supplied 9,000 troops to safeguard the election.

Preval asked demonstrators to allow truck drivers to take food to markets and students to get to school. But he also encouraged his supporters to continue demonstrating to show their displeasure with the vote counting.

"Continue to protest, but respect the rights of others," he said at the news conference, which was broadcast live on national radio stations.

The capital, brought to a standstill by Monday's violent protests and left with eerily empty streets that night, lurched back to life Tuesday after Preval's remarks. In Pegguyville, the calls of street hawkers filled the market air and women balancing bowls of grapefruit on their heads navigated the steep streets.

Parades of Preval supporters -- the same groups who burned tires and erected roadblocks the day before -- turned celebratory and hopeful. They marched through the streets, banging drums and waving posters with the emblem of Preval's party, Lespwa (the Haitian Creole word for "hope").

Preval supporters were furious late Tuesday, and said their fraud allegations had been proved when a local television station in Port-au-Prince repeatedly broadcast footage of ballots with Preval's name checked that were found discarded and, in some cases, partially burned at a dump in Port-au-Prince and two other locations.

"We knew that there was a massive fraud, but we could not put our fingers on it," said Fritz Longchamp, a Preval adviser and former Haitian ambassador to the United Nations. "Now we have the proof."

Interior Minister Paul Magloire told the Associated Press late Tuesday that the interim government had ordered a review of election results, in what would be a first formal step to investigate possible irregularities.

Four presidential candidates have already conceded Preval's victory after receiving small percentages of the vote, but businessman Charles Baker, who was in third place, said he would demand a spot in a runoff. Manigat's wife told the Associated Press that her husband would not cede the election to Preval.

Quitel said the Preval campaign was suspicious about the high percentage of blank ballots, more than 7 percent, and discrepancies on the electoral commission Web site.

Preval has spent the past two days in intensive meetings with U.S. and other international diplomats, as well as leaders of Haiti's interim government, which was set up two years ago after the ouster of President Jean-Bertrand Aristide. Preval, Haiti's president from 1996 to 2001, was a protege of Aristide's but has distanced himself in recent years, leaving Aristide's Lavalas party and forming Lespwa.

Winhurst said U.N. officials hoped a renewed sense of calm in Port-au-Prince would hold through the night, enabling ballot counters to resume working on Wednesday morning.

"They were uneasy with the big crowds," he said. "The crowds on the street who want a result are actually impeding results being completed."

Preval accused "provocateurs" in the opposition of trying to stir up his loyalists in an attempt to isolate and discredit them in the eyes of international observers. Preval's supporters, however, appeared largely responsible for the chaos that gripped this impoverished nation of 8.1 million Monday, when hundreds of roadblocks paralyzed cities and towns across the nation.

"The president told us to do this," demonstrator Maxim Detouche said Tuesday as he walked away from a dismantled roadblock in Petionville, a wealthy neighborhood in the hills above Port-au-Prince. "Now they are trying to bluff him; the election commission is trying to trick him."

Hundreds of people streamed past Detouche, blowing horns and chanting Preval's name. A dozen young women sang, "Oh yeah, Preval. I have been waiting for you."

China Task Force To Wield Trade Rules (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith

USA Today, February 15, 2006

The Bush administration proposed Tuesday to establish a China Enforcement Task Force under the U.S. Trade Representative as a legal counterweight to Chinese exports that the government says benefit from illegal state subsidies and lax controls on counterfeiters.

U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman accused China of failing to respect intellectual property rights, environmental concerns and labor standards, and for failing to fully open its markets to foreign competitors.

Last year, the U.S. trade deficit with China was nearly $202 billion.

Moving to head off congressional criticism of the relationship, Portman outlined a policy of more muscular U.S. negotiations with China bolstered by the administration's willingness to seek legal sanctions against China at the World Trade Organization.

“U.S. policy must now shift to treating China as a mature trading partner that should be held accountable for its actions and required to live up to its responsibilities,” Portman said in a letter to U.S. Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., that accompanied the report to the House Ways and Means Committee.

China's government had no immediate comment. Several congressional Democrats and Republicans welcomed the administration's tough talk. But the report outlined no new legal authority or doctrine to pursue sanctions already available through the WTO.

“If you've got complaints that China is not meeting its WTO obligations, go to the WTO,” said David Wall, a China trade expert at Chatham House in London. He added, “It's an enormous country, and growing fast, but it still has to be taken as a poor country.”

Harvard University economist Kenneth Rogoff said China's export of inexpensive goods to the USA combined with its large holdings of U.S. dollars and government securities have been largely beneficial, holding down domestic inflation and interest rates.

However, Rogoff said the administration should challenge unfair trade practices. “Going forward, as China grows, it has to start behaving like one of the big boys. It has to behave by the rules,” he says.

The U.S. Trade Representative said the U.S. market accounted for 22% of China's “phenomenal export growth” over the last 20 years, at a time when exports came to represent 40% of that country's economy and lifted nearly 400 million people out of poverty. But, Portman warned, “The relationship today lacks equity, durability and balance in opportunities it provides.”

U.S. Trade Chief Pledges To Get Tougher On China (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt And Murray Hiebert

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2006

In a wide-ranging U.S. appraisal of policy toward China, U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman is promising much tougher enforcement of trade laws but isn't asking Congress for expanded authority to sanction Beijing.

In a report released Tuesday, Mr. Portman voices concern about China's failure to curb the piracy of U.S. intellectual property and enforce international labor standards.

Warning of a "corrosive effect on political support" in the U.S. for trade with China, Mr. Portman flags concern with Beijing's "unreported and extensive" industry subsidies, and a network of trade barriers that he says keep out U.S. exports and helped fuel a record U.S. trade deficit. That deficit reached $725.75 billion in 2005.

U.S. Trade Representative2 Rob Portman discusses U.S.-China trade relations.

On trade with China alone, the U.S. deficit stood at $201.62 billion last year, more than 20% wider than 2004, by far the largest U.S. gap with any single country.

DOJ_NMG_0015394

Mr. Portman concedes American consumers and businesses have reaped benefits from closer economic ties with China, which began nearly three decades ago and accelerated rapidly after China joined the Geneva-based World Trade Organization in 2001. But absent "tangible evidence" that China is moving to address U.S. concerns, Mr. Portman says, "Popular support for a 25-year-old trade policy of constructive economic engagement with China could be in danger, with potentially damaging consequences for both countries."

The report outlines steps that will be taken to address U.S. concerns and protect U.S. business interests. Among other things, Mr. Portman will establish a task force that "will focus on the preparation and handling of potential WTO cases with China." The task force will be headed by a new chief counsel for China trade enforcement.

In addition, Mr. Portman announced that priorities within his 225-employee office will shift to focus more attention on China. Mr. Portman anticipates posting a senior trade official in Beijing to help coordinate U.S. policy in China as part of an effort to beef up the agency's negotiating capacity.

The report comes amid rising tensions in the U.S. Congress over U.S.-Sino trade relations. With the U.S. trade deficit soaring, several pieces of legislation have been introduced in recent days that would toughen U.S. policy toward Beijing, including a proposal to create a trade "prosecutor" outside the U.S. Trade Representative's office.

Officials from China's Ministry of Commerce said they wouldn't have any comment until they have had a chance to read the report.

But a Chinese academic said he doesn't think the review will have much effect in Beijing. Mei Xinyu, a researcher at the Commerce Ministry's Academy of International Trade and Economic Cooperation, called the report a "show to please Congress," whose members have become increasingly critical of the growing U.S. trade deficit with China.

Mr. Mei said China's export boom to the U.S. is caused by U.S. domestic demand and not by any sinister schemes by Beijing. "It is American companies [that] are transferring manufacturing to China, and American consumers are buying Chinese stuff on their own accord," he said.

Still, senior Chinese officials went on the offensive Tuesday against U.S. critics. Vice Commerce Minister Yi Xiaozhun insisted that inexpensive Chinese exports, far from undermining the U.S. economy, are in fact a blessing. Without them, U.S. inflation would be two percentage points higher than it is now, Mr. Yi told a China-U.S. business forum in Beijing. Mr. Yi also said that by using its export earnings to buy U.S. Treasury bonds, China is helping plug the U.S. fiscal deficit.

Mr. Yi said China seeks balanced trade with the U.S. But he criticized U.S. companies as not doing more to help. He said a sharp drop in U.S. foreign direct investment into China last year was "not very satisfactory" given the healthy profits U.S. companies make in the country. U.S. investment last year fell 22.3% to $3 billion from $3.9 billion in 2004.

Separately, the vice chairman of the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress, or parliament, also took U.S. companies to task for not selling more aggressively to China. Cheng Siwei, speaking at the same conference, said high-tech exports from the U.S. account for just 10% of China's total high-tech imports and should be higher.

In Congress, Mr. Portman is leery of efforts to create a trade "prosecutor" outside of his office, and prefers instead to work within the existing framework.

Mr. Portman and others in the administration of President George W. Bush "aren't asking for new authority, they're indicating a new seriousness," said Michael Wessel, a member of the U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission, a congressionally mandated panel that monitors ties with China.

Mr. Wessel said he expects the administration to try to file more trade-remedy cases in the coming months, and administration officials themselves cite a recent case that resulted in Beijing lifting special duties that had been slapped on certain U.S.-made paper products, as a model for further enforcement actions.

"This is laying out what's to come, but it is not the final step," one administration official said of the "top-to-bottom" review. "It is a refocusing and redirecting of resources. We'll work with Congress on additional steps that need to be taken."

In Beijing, the U.S. business community has been watching the review with some anxiety as U.S.-China trade relations have become testier in recent months.

"We are hopeful that the recommendations reflected in the USTR's report will move U.S.-China relations forward in a positive ... and constructive manner," said James Zimmerman, a Beijing-based trade lawyer with Squire Sanders & Dempsey and chairman of the legal committee of the American Chamber of Commerce in China.

But Mr. Zimmerman added that China "must continue to open its markets" beyond its agreements when it joined the WTO in 2001. He called on Beijing to "improve its intellectual-property enforcement system [and] improve transparency and corporate governance" to make it easier for U.S. companies to do business in China.

The policy review has been more than six months in the making and involved input from across the Bush administration, encompassing the departments of Commerce, State and Treasury and the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0015395

The review suggests the administration can do a better job of promoting exports to China, especially for small and midsize companies. Mr. Portman promised in the spring to conduct the review after he was confronted with a raft of complaints about China during his Senate confirmation hearings.

The document doesn't call for a radical shift in U.S. policy as some members of Congress have sought. Rather, the 30-plus-page report tries to respond to congressional critics who contend the administration has no coherent policy toward China, according to business and government officials. The report describes a dual-track policy approach, one that stresses the need to engage in a dialogue while suggesting there is a limit to how much can be accomplished by just talk.

"The administration is trying to send a signal," said Myron Brilliant, the vice president for Asia at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in Washington, who has been briefed on the document. "We want engagement. But we want results."

Bush To Exert More Pressure On China Over Trade Rules (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

Using stern language, the Bush administration said yesterday that it would exert more pressure on China to adhere to global free trade rules.

But in a report, the United States trade representative, Rob Portman, did not ask for or threaten any specific sanctions against the Chinese, an omission that will not escape the notice of both Democratic and Republican lawmakers who have been calling for the administration to take a far tougher line with China.

The report came just four days after the United States announced a record trade deficit of $201.6 billion with China for 2005. That report stoked what was already a heated debate about the role that free trade has played in the loss of American jobs caused by a shift in production to lower-cost countries like China.

At a news conference yesterday, Mr. Portman registered concern about China's enforcement of intellectual property rights and the lack of openness of its markets to American goods and services, a reference to Chinese restrictions on certain foreign investments and trade in financial and other professional services.

Noting that American trade with China "lacks equity, durability and balance in the opportunities it provides," Mr. Portman said: "This disparity is due in part to China's failure to honor certain commitments, including its failure to enforce intellectual property rights, its protection and support for certain domestic industries, and its refusal to fulfill certain market opening commitments."

The report said that Mr. Portman's office would establish a chief counsel for China trade enforcement who will lead a task force to ensure better compliance by China with rules of the World Trade Organization. The report, which was first disclosed in The Wall Street Journal yesterday, also called for coordinating China trade policy with other countries and working with Chinese officials on improving financial, antitrust and agricultural regulations.

The steps are far milder than what many lawmakers have asked for. In the Senate, Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, and Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, have proposed imposing a 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese goods until Beijing allows its currency to float more freely against the dollar. The senators say they may bring their bill up for a vote as early as March.

Last summer, the Chinese government allowed the yuan to appreciate against the dollar and float in a narrow band, giving in to pressure by its Western trading partners who have said China's artificially cheap currency gives its goods an unfair advantage on the world market.

In a statement released yesterday, the Chinese Embassy in Washington said that the yuan had risen to a new high since last summer. It said that further appreciation would be gradual, given that the Chinese government "places priority on promoting balanced international payments this year." One dollar currently buys about 8.0472 yuan.

Mr. Portman's office does not have jurisdiction over currency matters. Treasury Secretary John W. Snow, who has taken the lead role for the administration on the yuan, has repeatedly called on China to further relax the yuan's peg to the dollar but has resisted calls for sanctions.

Most economists say protectionist measures could cause harm by distorting global trade and raising the price of imported goods that Americans rely on. They also note that many financial institutions in China are not structurally sound enough to survive the instability that would come with a fully convertible yuan.

U.S. Pledges To Be Tough On China Trade (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0015396

The Bush administration vowed yesterday to bolster its enforcement against China's alleged unfair trading practices -- a pledge that drew praise from big business but scorn from congressional Democrats, who complained it was nothing more than rhetoric.

The vow came in a "top-to-bottom review" of U.S. trade policy toward China that Rob Portman, the U.S. trade representative, promised in April at his Senate confirmation hearing. The review did not propose any changes in policy or law; rather, it called for the establishment of special China-focused task forces and enforcement officers to pursue allegations that Beijing is violating trade rules.

The report was aimed largely at assuring congressional, industry and labor union critics of China that the administration is closely scrutinizing Beijing's trade practices and is prepared to aggressively counter the most objectionable ones. The White House is anxious to head off a number of bills targeting China that administration officials view as overly protectionist.

While emphasizing that both sides have benefited greatly from U.S.-China trade, the 29-page report cited a litany of problems, including China's maintenance of barriers against certain imports, its failure to halt the piracy of patents and copyrights, and its provision of "extensive" government subsidies to industries. It also contended that "important gaps remain in China's implementation" of the commitments it made to open its markets when it joined the World Trade Organization in 2001.

Portman said at a news conference that "we will use all options available" to remedy those problems, including filing more complaints against Beijing at the WTO. He specifically referred to two festering disputes as potential grounds for WTO cases -- China's "inadequate protection of intellectual-property rights" and "its rules that discriminate against imported auto parts."

But the only concrete measures proposed in the report involved procedural and personnel matters. The report said the trade representative's office would establish a China Enforcement Task Force to be headed by a new chief counsel -- the first such posts to be aimed at an individual country, according to Portman. The trade representative's office also plans to post a "senior trade official" at the U.S. embassy in Beijing, the report said.

Defending the report as "objective as well as hard-hitting," Portman said he hopes lawmakers "will find it an objective and helpful piece of information as Congress designs trade policy vis-a-vis China."

Major business groups greeted the report warmly. Problems in U.S.-China ties "can be resolved through the path of constructive engagements that Ambassador Portman has outlined," said John Frisbie, president of the U.S.-China Business Council, in a statement.

Among Republicans, even some of Beijing's fiercest critics had kind words for the report, including Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.). "I appreciate USTR and the Bush administration's willingness to aggressively engage China on a variety of issues that are creating tension," he said in a statement.

But Democrats were harsh on the report, especially because it barely touched on China's currency policy. By keeping the value of the Chinese yuan at a little over 8 yuan per dollar, Beijing allegedly gives its industries an unfair advantage in global markets. The currency issue is the purview of the U.S. Treasury, which released a separate report on the matter late last year, but Democrats attacked the USTR report anyway, on a variety of grounds.

"After reading the report, I have to ask -- where's the beef?" said Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D-Md.), ranking minority member on the trade subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee, in a statement. "The administration promises no new enforcement of trade laws, no new action in the WTO, and no further steps to combat China's unfair practices. The time for monitoring and bureaucracy has passed."

The report "doesn't have a whole lot of direct action to deal with what are widely perceived as immediate trade problems," agreed C. Fred Bergsten, director of the Institute for International Economics.

Still, he said, the report contained intriguing hints of measures that the administration is likely to take, including filing WTO complaints and launching more negotiations for free-trade agreements with China's neighbors. Talks with South Korea and Thailand are already underway.

"I think that's a not-so-veiled threat that unless China is willing to step up in [global trade negotiations] and liberalize its own barriers, the U.S. may proceed with alternative courses in the region," Bergsten said. "That's probably the most important leverage we have against the Chinese."

One issue that Portman dismissed as relatively unimportant was the U.S. trade deficit with China, which reached a record $201.6 billion last year -- more than a quarter of the total trade gap. The overall U.S. trade deficit is mainly attributable to factors such as the low U.S. savings rate, Portman said. And China's huge contribution to it, he said, can be ascribed to the rapidly increasing amount of goods that, though partly designed and manufactured elsewhere, are assembled in China before being shipped to the United States.

Internet Firms To Defend Policies (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi

DOJ_NMG_0015397

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

Yahoo Inc., Google Inc. and Microsoft Corp. will go on Capitol Hill today to defend corporate policies for dealing with China that they say balance business interests with human-rights concerns.

In testimony before the House subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations and the subcommittee on Asia and the Pacific, Yahoo plans to argue that the presence of the Internet does good for closed societies even when censored or restricted.

But some human rights advocates plan to testify that corporate America is abnegating its ethical responsibilities by complying with Chinese law. Others expected to testify include network-equipment maker Cisco Systems Inc. and representatives from the State Department.

The hearing comes after several incidents highlighted the privacy and censorship concerns of doing Internet-related business in China. Indeed, trafficking in information raises issues that complicate the free-speech spirit of many Internet companies. Last month, Google said it would censor certain results on the Chinese version of its search engine. Last year, Yahoo provided e-mail information to the Chinese government that led to the identification and incarceration of a dissident Chinese reporter. In December, Microsoft's MSN shut down the blog of another reporter.

Many other companies have struck similar compromises with the Chinese government to do business in China, which is one of the fastest-growing markets in the world.

Separately, the State Department yesterday said that it had established a Global Internet Freedom Task Force to monitor other governments' policies on censorship and restriction of access to information. The task force will make policy recommendations on how to maximize access to the Internet while minimizing government attempts to block information, State Department officials said.

"If you're on the ground in China, you have to comply with the [local] law," said Michael J. Callahan, Yahoo's general counsel, who plans to testify today. "Fundamentally, being there transforms lives, society and economies," he said.

Callahan said that when any government requests information, the company is often unaware how that information will be used. In the case of the jailing of journalist Shi Tao -- who had used a Yahoo e-mail account to post pro-democracy materials online -- Yahoo was unaware of the government's intentions, he said.

Google and Microsoft have used similar arguments to defend their entry into the Chinese market.

"We overridingly believe that it is better to provide this technology than to refrain from doing so," because on the whole it promotes the sharing of ideas, Microsoft general counsel Brad Smith said in a speech in Europe last month. "No technology is perfect; but it is fundamentally a technology that does good that we want to provide to our users in China and throughout the world."

But Mila Rosenthal, director of Amnesty International USA's business and human rights program, said such corporations haven't really tried to use their global brand names to take a stand for openness. "I don't think the U.S. companies have stood up to China," she said.

Global human rights subcommittee Chairman Christopher H. Smith (R-N.J.) said he has been fighting suppression of free speech for 26 years.

"It's reached a new level, with U.S. companies' complicity with tracking down dissidents," said Smith, who has drafted but not yet introduced a bill that among other things would create oversight at the Commerce Department and the Justice Department before any private information about a user could get handed over to repressive governments.

Lucie Morillon, the Washington representative of Reporters Without Borders, said the companies should both self-regulate and be overseen by the U.S. government to prevent future crackdowns against dissident journalists.

"[The companies] are helping to create a country-specific access to multiple versions of the Internet," she said. The group will ask Internet companies not to host network infrastructure in politically repressive countries, and it also will ask the U.S. Commerce Department to approve a company's entry into those markets, Morillon said. According to the group, 25 journalists and 62 cyber-dissidents are imprisoned in China.

Online Firms Facing Questions About Censoring Internet Searches In China (NYT)

By Tom Zeller Jr.

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

For Internet companies doing business in China, a piece of a booming market has not come without compromises.

A series of episodes showing that the companies were bending to the restrictive demands of Beijing — filtering words like "democracy" or "human rights" from Chinese versions of a blog product, or censoring certain concepts from their China-based search engines — has leaked out from users inside China.

DOJ_NMG_0015398

And as questions were raised after each new revelation, companies like Yahoo, Google, Microsoft and Cisco Systems invariably offered a variation on a common chorus.

"Just like any other global company," as Mary Osako, a Yahoo spokeswoman, put it in September, "Yahoo must ensure that its local country sites operate within the laws, regulations and customs of the country in which they are based."

Now the companies are being pressed in Washington for fuller answers about their business practices in China and the implications for human rights. That pressure will escalate today when the House Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations questions officials of the four technology companies, along with other witnesses critical of their activities.

The subcommittee's chairman, Representative Christopher H. Smith, Republican of New Jersey, plans to introduce legislation by week's end that would restrict an Internet company's ability to censor or filter basic political or religious terms — even if that puts the company at odds with local laws in the countries where it now operates.

Although some advocates have argued that the companies may actually be violating existing trade laws, most experts concede that does not appear to be the case.

Mr. Smith's legislation, called the Global Online Freedom Act, however, would render much of what the Internet companies are currently doing in China illegal.

Among the act's provisions is the establishment of an Office of Global Internet Freedom, which would establish standards for Internet companies operating abroad. In addition to prohibiting companies from filtering out certain political or religious terms, it would require them to disclose to users any sort of filtering they undertake.

Separately, the State Department announced the formation of a new Global Internet Freedom Task Force yesterday, charged with examining efforts by foreign governments "to restrict access to political content and the impact of such censorship efforts on U.S. companies."

Recent statements issued by Microsoft and Yahoo suggest that it is really the government's role to promote human rights abroad.

Still, the Internet titans are finding it harder to avoid some tough questions and a new note of contrition is likely to be heard.

"We always reserve the right to get better," said Michael J. Callahan, Yahoo's general counsel, in a phone call last weekend. Mr. Callahan is scheduled to testify before the House panel today.

Of the companies, whose activities in the Chinese market differ, Yahoo may face the toughest grilling.

The company, which has been providing Web services in China since 1999, has been criticized for filtering the results of its China-based search engine. But its bigger problems began last fall when human rights advocates revealed that in 2004, a Chinese division of the company had turned over to Chinese authorities information on a journalist, Shi Tao, using an anonymous Yahoo e-mail account. Mr. Shi, who had sent a government missive on Tiananmen Square anniversary rites to foreign colleagues, was sentenced to 10 years in prison.

Last week, Reporters Without Borders, a group based in Paris, revealed that a Chinese division of Yahoo had provided information to authorities that contributed to the conviction in 2003 of Li Zhi, a former civil servant who had criticized local officials online. Mr. Li is serving eight years in prison.

The recent absorption of Yahoo's Chinese operations into Alibaba, a Chinese e-commerce company in which Yahoo now holds a 40 percent stake, also worries some critics. They fear that the move allows Yahoo to reap the benefits of China's booming market while escaping responsibility for what happens there.

For its part, Cisco, which has won annual contracts from China Telecom since 2000 to provide the hardware for the country's growing Internet backbone, has been criticized for selling its routers and equipment, which the Chinese government has in turn manipulated to monitor and censor communications.

Microsoft hit snags almost immediately after beginning its MSN China portal last spring, when users discovered that the accompanying MSN Spaces service, which provides tools for building personal Web sites and blogs, forbade blog titles containing what were deemed inappropriate concepts, like "human rights." Then last year, the company came under fire for shutting a Beijing blogger's MSN Web site at the request of the Chinese authorities.

It was amid the fallout from that incident that Google stepped gingerly into the China fray three weeks ago. The company tried a different tack, announcing that search results would be filtered according to Chinese government specifications.

That sort of transparency was a welcome change, said Jonathan Zittrain, a professor of Internet governance at Oxford University and a co-founder of the Berkman Center for Internet and Society at Harvard Law School. But the larger questions that have led the companies to Capitol Hill remain.

"I think this is a very ripe time to take on some of the hardest questions," Mr. Zittrain said. "It's not a crazy position to say that these companies should not be there at all, but that's not my view, and I think there are ways to begin drawing lines so that there are ways that the companies can make the world better by being there."

Just what those lines might look like is difficult to say.

The Commerce Department, under the Export Administration Act, does restrict the sale of "crime control" equipment to repressive regimes, but Internet technologies have not been considered under that rubric. The activist Harry Wu, who spent 19 years in Chinese labor camps before coming to the United States and who is scheduled to testify at the hearings, plans to ask why not.

"We never wanted to do any business with Soviet 'evil empire,' " Mr. Wu said. "We embargo Cuba, we don't trade with North Korea, but with China it's O.K. I just always argue, why is it? Why do we single out China?"

Microsoft and Yahoo issued a joint statement two weeks ago acknowledging a responsibility to identify "appropriate practices in each market" where they operate, but they also urged the State Department and other agencies to pursue "government-to-government engagement."

Mr. Smith, the subcommittee chairman, says he thinks more than engagement is necessary. "The bottom line is no one is being compelled to sell to China," Mr. Smith said.

Beijing Censors Taken To Task In Party Circles (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

BEIJING, Feb. 14 — A dozen former Communist Party officials and senior scholars, including a onetime secretary to Mao, a party propaganda chief and the retired bosses of some of the country's most powerful newspapers, have denounced the recent closing of a prominent news journal, helping to fuel a growing backlash against censorship.

A public letter issued by the prominent figures, dated Feb. 2 but circulated to journalists in Beijing on Tuesday, appeared to add momentum to a campaign by a few outspoken editors against micromanagement, personnel shuffles and an ever-expanding blacklist of banned topics imposed on China's newspapers, magazines, television stations and Web sites by the party's secretive Propaganda Department.

The letter criticized the department's order on Jan. 24 to shut down Freezing Point, a popular journal of news and opinion, as an example of "malignant management" and an "abuse of power" that violates China's constitutional guarantee of free speech.

The letter did not address Beijing's pressure on Web portals and search engines. [Page A6.]

That issue gained attention abroad after Microsoft and Google acknowledged helping the government filter information and Yahoo was accused of providing information from its e-mail accounts that was used to jail dissident writers. The issue will be the subject of Congressional hearings in Washington on Wednesday.

In addition to shutting down Freezing Point, a weekly supplement to China Youth Daily, since late last year, officials responsible for managing the news media have replaced editors of three other publications that developed reputations for breaking news or exploring sensitive political and social issues.

The interventions amounted to the most extensive exertion of press control since President Hu Jintao assumed power three years ago.

But propaganda officials are also facing rare public challenges to their legal authority to take such actions, including a short strike and string of resignations at one newspaper and defiant open letters from two editors elsewhere who had been singled out for censure. Those protests have suggested that some people in China's increasingly market-driven media industry no longer fear the consequences of violating the party line.

The authors of the letter predicted that the country would have difficulty countering the recent surge of social unrest in the countryside unless it allowed the news media more leeway to expose problems that lead to violent protests.

"At the turning point in our history from a totalitarian to a constitutional system, depriving the public of freedom of speech will bring disaster for our social and political transition and give rise to group confrontation and social unrest," the letter said. "Experience has proved that allowing a free flow of ideas can improve stability and alleviate social problems."

Some of the signers held high official posts during the 1980's, when the political environment in China was becoming more open. Although they have long since retired or been eased from power, a collective letter from respected elder statesmen can often help mobilize opinion within the ruling party.

One of those people who signed the petition is Li Rui, Mao's secretary and biographer. Others include Hu Jiwei, a former editor of People's Daily, the party's leading official newspaper; Zhu Houze, who once ran the party's propaganda office; and Li Pu, a former deputy head of the New China News Agency, the main official press agency.

Party officials and political experts say President Hu, who was groomed to take over China's top posts for more than a decade, has often attended closely to the opinions of the party's elder statesmen.

DOJ_NMG_0015400

Mr. Hu is widely thought to favor tighter media controls. Party officials said he referred approvingly to media management in Cuba and North Korea in a speech in late 2004.

But he has also solicited support from more liberal elements. Last year Mr. Hu organized high-profile official ceremonies to mark the 90th anniversary of the birth of Hu Yaobang, the reform-oriented party leader who lost his posts in a power struggle and whose death in 1989 was the initial cause of the student-led democracy demonstrations that year. Some of the officials who signed the petition were close associates of Hu Yaobang.

The reaction against the shutdown of Freezing Point was organized by its longtime editor, Li Datong, 53, a party member and senior official of the party-run China Youth Daily. Mr. Li broadcast news of the secret order on his personal blog moments after he received it and has since mobilized supporters to put pressure on the Propaganda Department to retract the decision.

Under his stewardship, Freezing Point became one of the most consistently provocative journals of news and public opinion. It published investigative articles on sensitive topics like the party's version of historical events, nationalism and the party-run education system. Freezing Point ran opinion articles on politics in Taiwan and rural unrest in mainland China that caused a stir in media circles in recent months.

The cause cited for closing Freezing Point was an opinion piece by a historian named Yuan Weishi. He argued that Chinese history textbooks tended to ignore mistakes and provocations by leaders of the Qing Dynasty that may have incited attacks by foreign powers in the late 19th century.

Mr. Li often tussled with his bosses at China Youth Daily and officials at the Propaganda Department. But he has also cultivated support among the party elite. He often speaks supportively of President Hu and quotes extensively from the writings of Marx, who he says favored a robust free press.

He has maintained that the Propaganda Department had overstepped its authority by ordering Freezing Point closed, and he filed a formal complaint to the party's disciplinary arm.

"The propaganda office is an illegal organization that has no power to shut down a publication," Mr. Li said in an interview. "Its power is informal, and it can only exercise it if people are afraid."

He added, "I am not afraid."

Mr. Li scored an initial victory last week, when propaganda officials told China Youth Daily to draft a plan to revive Freezing Point, which had been formally closed for "rectification," Mr. Li and another editor at the newspaper said. Some media experts had predicted that the authorities would not allow Freezing Point to reopen, and the new order was treated as a signal that officials had misjudged the reaction to its closing.

Shortly after the contretemps at China Youth Daily broke out, the former editor of another national publication attacked the bosses who had replaced him, saying they had exercised self-censorship in the face of pressure from propaganda officials.

Chen Jieren, who lost his position last week as the editor of Public Interest Times, posted a letter online entitled "Ridiculous Game, Despicable Intrigue." The letter disputed his bosses' statement that he had been dismissed for "bad management skills" and said he had a struggled constantly against senior officials for the right "to report the truth with a conscience."

One recent issue of Public Interest Times mocked the poor quality of English translations on official government Web sites.

In a separate incident earlier this year, a group of editors and reporters at the party-run Beijing News declined to report for work after the editor of the paper, known for breaking news stories on subjects the Propaganda Department has ruled off limits, was replaced. Many of the protesters have since resigned, reporters at the newspaper said.

The resistance against censorship could signal a decisive shift in China's news media controls, already under assault from the proliferation of e-mail, text messaging, Web sites, blogs and other new forums for news and opinion that the authorities have struggled to bring under their supervision.

Even most of the major party-run national publications in China, including China Youth Daily, no longer receive government subsidies and must depend mainly on income from circulation and advertising to survive.

That means providing more news or features that people want to pay for, including exclusive stories and provocative views that go well beyond the propaganda fare carried by the New China News Agency or People's Daily. Few serious publications survive for long without subsidies if they do not have popular content, editors say.

"Every serious publication in China faces tough choices," said Mr. Li of Freezing Point. "You can publish stories people want to read and risk offending the censors. Or you can publish only stories that the party wants published and risk going out of business."

China Says Web Controls Follow The West's Lead (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, February 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0015401

BEIJING, Feb. 14 — Chinese authorities are determined to stop "harmful information" from spreading through the Web, but the controls it places on Web sites and Internet service providers do not differ much from those employed by the United States and European countries, a senior official responsible for managing China's Internet said Tuesday.

The official, Liu Zhengrong, who supervises Internet affairs for the information office of China's State Council, or cabinet, did not directly dispute the contention of many critics that China operates a vast and technologically sophisticated firewall to protect the ruling Communist Party against what it views as Web-based threats to its authority.

But he sought to put the country's Web-policing operation in the best possible light, emphasizing that China's Internet minders abided strictly by laws and regulations that in some cases have been modeled on American and European statutes. "If you study the main international practices in this regard you will find that China is basically in compliance with the international norm," he said. "The main purposes and methods of implementing our laws are basically the same."

The briefing about Internet controls was one of the few times any senior Chinese official has spoken in detail about the matter. Officials assigned to enforce the Communist Party's controls on the news media operate behind closed doors and rarely make public statements about their work.

Beijing's Internet policies have come under close scrutiny abroad since Google and Microsoft acknowledged helping China censor information available through Web searches and blogs, and Yahoo was accused of providing data that helped convict dissidents who had used its e-mail accounts.

Mr. Liu said China's effort to regulate content on the Web was aimed primarily at preventing the spread of pornography or other content harmful to teenagers and children. He said its concerns in this area differed minimally from those in developed countries.

Human rights and media watchdog groups maintain that China's Web censorship puts greater emphasis on helping the Communist Party maintain political control over the increasingly restive society. Such groups have shown that many hundreds of Web sites cannot be easily accessed in China mainly because they are run by governments, religious groups or political organizations critical of Beijing's policies or its political leaders.

Mr. Liu said Chinese Internet users were free to discuss many politically sensitive topics and denied that the Chinese police have arrested or prosecuted people for using the Web to circulate views.

Rights groups maintain — and court documents show, however — that legal authorities have cited e-mail messages and postings on domestic and foreign Web sites as evidence against Chinese dissidents accused of "incitement to overthrow the state" and "leaking state secrets."

The official objected to what he suggested were biased criticisms of China's Internet controls that ignored similar restrictions by foreign governments and private companies on their Web sites.

He cited, for example, statements on Web sites run by The New York Times and The Washington Post that reserve the right to delete or block content in reader discussion groups that editors determine to be illegal, harmful or in bad taste. Chinese news media Web sites are also monitored in that way, he said.

"Major U.S. companies do this and it is regarded as normal," Mr. Liu said. "So why should China not be entitled to do so?"

Editors, journalists and Web site operators in China say domestic news and discussion sites must ban a long list of topics deemed off limits by party officials or face penalties.

Such controls appear to have only superficial similarities to attempts by private companies in the United States and Europe to monitor content on the Web sites they operate.

Mr. Liu also said powers the Bush administration gained under the Patriot Act to monitor Web sites and e-mail communications, and the deployment of technology called Carnivore by the F.B.I. to let the agency scrutinize huge volumes of e-mail traffic, were examples of how the United States has taken legal steps to guard against the spread of "harmful information" online. "It is clear that any country's legal authorities closely monitor the spread of illegal information," he said. "We have noted that the U.S. is doing a good job on this front."

The Bush administration says its efforts to police online communications pertain mainly to preventing terrorist attacks.

Mr. Liu said there were now 111 million Web users in China and in the last five years China had expanded the bandwidth available to connect with overseas Web sites nearly 50-fold to 136,000 megabits per second, underscoring its commitment to let citizens gather information and interact with people around the world.

The number of Web sites Chinese users cannot access amounts to a "tiny percentage" of those available abroad, he said.

China's Responsibilities (WP)

The Washington Post, February 15, 2006

SINCE JOINING the World Trade Organization in 2001, China has proved serious about honoring its commitments. It has rewritten laws and regulations to comply with WTO rules, so much so that the United States and the European Union, which bring high-profile cases against each other before WTO tribunals, have a hard time identifying cases to bring against China. But China is treating its WTO commitments as a ceiling, not a floor. It appears unwilling to modify its behavior in other areas, and this may strain its relations with the United States.

China's currency policy is a case in point. Last summer China allowed its currency to appreciate by 2 percent against the dollar, and it hinted that more steps would follow. Since then, the Chinese yuan has barely risen, and its continuing undervaluation has fueled an enormous trade surplus. This invites a protectionist backlash in the United States. Sens. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) and Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) have proposed legislation that would impose punitive tariffs on China until it fixes its currency policy, and a majority of senators appear to back the idea. Last year the Bush administration persuaded the Senate to hold off while it talked the Chinese into revaluing for their own good: A flexible exchange rate would help China avoid boom-and-bust cycles. But China's refusal to take more than baby steps is undermining the administration's efforts to restrain Congress. Mr. Schumer plans to return to the currency issue in upcoming Senate hearings.

China also could do more to abide by the spirit as well as the letter of WTO rules. Intellectual property protections illustrate the point: Chinese laws comply with WTO requirements, and music or film studios that file complaints about copyright violations tend to have their complaints upheld. But this barely dents the rampant piracy in China because the pirates build the modest fines into their cost of doing business. Yesterday Rob Portman, the U.S. trade representative, issued a "top-to-bottom review" of U.S.-China trade relations that spotlighted other areas of concern. China's government procurement should be more transparent. It should quit smuggling subsidies to domestic firms through WTO loopholes.

China also needs to rethink its sinister policy of turning U.S. Internet firms into police auxiliaries. It has recruited Cisco Systems to build a system of Internet routers that blocks Chinese users from foreign Web sites deemed unsuitable by Beijing's censors. It has ordered Yahoo to surrender the names of e-mail users who subsequently were imprisoned. It has allowed Google and Microsoft to offer services in China provided that they bow to censorship. China needs to understand that neither Congress nor U.S. public opinion is likely to allow American companies to carry on this collaboration forever. House hearings today featuring all four firms signal that China's Internet policy has joined the list of flash points in bilateral relations.

China's emergence as a global economic power over the past quarter-century has been a wonderful thing, lifting hundreds of millions of people out of poverty. But China is now too big to get away with a minimalist definition of its obligations to the outside world. Its currency policies affect global trade imbalances. Its intellectual property protections affect the value of copyrights worldwide. Its 100 million Internet users are bound to attract the attention of Western advocates of free speech and their allies in Congress. Riches and power bring broad responsibilities.

Canada's New PM Worries Gay Couples (USAT)

By Rebecca Cook Dube Special For

USA Today, February 15, 2006

TORONTO — As the winter sky darkened over City Hall, Michele Schultz and Christina Chora held hands and read their vows.

Standing before them in a long blue robe, Toronto wedding director Lois Code declared, “I do now, by the virtue of the authority vested in me by the province of Ontario, pronounce you legally married.”

Schultz, 37, and Chora, 39, have been together 20 years. Same-sex marriage has been legal in Toronto for almost three years and throughout Canada since July. Why tie the knot now? Schultz has a two-word answer: “Stephen Harper.”

Harper, sworn in this month as prime minister, is the first Conservative to lead Canada in 13 years. He has pledged to hold a vote in Parliament on overturning Canada's same-sex marriage law, which was approved last year and made Canada the fourth country in the world to legalize gay and lesbian marriage nationwide.

Gay and lesbian couples have been hurrying to wed ever since Harper started gaining momentum before last month's elections. The rush to marry has continued since Harper and the Conservatives defeated Prime Minister Paul Martin and his Liberal Party on Jan. 23.

“We were just worried that now he's in power, he would take away our legal right to get married,” Schultz said after the ceremony. “We always planned to do it, and we thought we'd better do it now.”

The law gives same-sex married couples the same rights and benefits as their heterosexual counterparts. If Parliament tosses out the legislation, gay and lesbian couples who haven't wed will lose the opportunity to get those benefits. Harper has said if the law is overturned, he will not try to invalidate same-sex marriages that already have taken place.

Code said her office has been busy marrying other same-sex couples who have the same concern. “A lot of people were going to wait for the summer and decided not to wait,” she said. “They refer to it as their shotgun weddings.”

DOJ_NMG_0015403

Toronto city spokesman Brad Ross said 90 same-sex couples got marriage licenses in January, up from 60 in January 2005. Toronto has issued 3,058 same-sex licenses, including 1,172 for U.S. residents, since Ontario legalized gay marriage in June 2003.

Harper won as a moderate, but he promised social conservatives he would reopen the same-sex marriage debate. As opposition leader last year, Harper proposed civil unions for same-sex couples rather than marriage — a compromise he called "the real Canadian way."

January's election gave Harper's Conservatives a plurality, but his party does not have a majority of seats in the House of Commons. It's unclear whether he has the votes to overturn same-sex marriage legislation. "It could go either way," said Laurie Arron, director of advocacy for Egale Canada, a national gay and lesbian rights organization.

A survey of lawmakers conducted this month by The Globe and Mail newspaper predicted same-sex marriage would narrowly survive a new vote.

Canada's public has given pollsters contradictory opinions. In December, a Leger Marketing Poll conducted for the Canadian Press found 55% of 2,013 Canadians polled said they wanted a new vote in Parliament. A poll of 2,034 Canadians conducted by Environics for the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. before the election found 66% didn't want the government to reopen the issue.

Both sides agree that if Parliament overturns the law, the courts will decide the matter. Arron said he believes the Supreme Court will protect same-sex marriage rights. Lower courts have said the constitution guarantees gay marriage. Harper has vowed not to override the Supreme Court (permitted under Canadian law) if it rules same-sex marriage is a fundamental human right.

Reopening the same-sex marriage debate has done damage, Arron said. "A lot of LGBT (lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender) people felt included and felt like first-class citizens" when the law passed last summer. Harper's victory, he said, "already has taken away that sense of security."

Some business people worry the debate could tarnish Canada's image as a same-sex marriage haven. Ric Tremaine, president of the Gay Toronto Tourism Guild, runs an inn that specializes in gay and lesbian weddings and caters to Americans. "For small businesses and Toronto, it's an economic issue," Tremaine said. He's been telling potential customers, "If you've been thinking about doing it, maybe you ought to do it now."

Canadian same-sex marriages are not legally valid in the USA, although some American employers recognize them for purposes of benefits.

The first gay couple to be legally wed in Canada, Kevin Bourassa and Joe Varnell of Toronto, caution against a rush to the altar. "The biggest squabble about your wedding should be where you're going to put your aunt who's coming from Scotland, it shouldn't be about a political party," Varnell said.

Bourassa said he believes the law will survive: "We are confident that Canada will remain a beacon of equality and justice around the world."

Maybe so, but gay and lesbian couples continue to accelerate their wedding plans. Susan Green and Tiffany Veinot of Toronto are ready to dash to City Hall if their marriage rights look shaky. "There's a real political calculus for us," said Green, 41. "We want a big ceremony with friends, but we have to keep one eye on Stephen Harper."

The Economy's Momentum: "The role of government is to put in place the foundations for American innovators and workers to do the real work that propels the economy forward. A pillar of that foundation is the low tax rates on capital gains and dividends that ultimately translate into higher living standards for all Americans.
Congress owes it not just to the 91 million Americans who own equities, but to all Americans who benefit from a strong and growing economy to keep this pillar of growth in place and extend the 15% rate on capital gains and dividends.

"Republicans took a step toward extending lower tax rates on investments when a majority of senators for the first time in this session of Congress signaled that they support the idea. By the same margin, senators said the final tax bill should both lower tax rates on capital gains and dividends and exempt millions of middle-income Americans from the alternative minimum tax. The Morning Update

Today, President Bush will travel to Dublin, Ohio, to discuss his agenda to make health care more affordable and available for all Americans through common-sense, innovative reforms to expand choice, lower cost, and improve the quality of care. The President will hold a meeting on Health Savings Accounts (HSAs) with employees at Wendy's International Corporate Headquarters. Today, nearly 9,000 Wendy's employees and their families are covered by HSAs. Following this meeting, President Bush will make remarks on health care, government's responsibility to make sure the elderly and poor receive care, and his initiatives to make health care affordable and accessible.

From Today's Morning Headlines

Secretary Snow Writes About The Importance Of The President's Pro-Growth Tax Cuts To Maintaining The Economy's Momentum. "The role of government is to put in place the foundations for American innovators and workers to do the real work that propels the economy forward. A pillar of that foundation is the low tax rates on capital gains and dividends that ultimately translate into higher living standards for all Americans. Congress owes it not just to the 91 million Americans who own equities, but to all Americans who benefit from a strong and growing economy to keep this pillar of growth in place and extend the 15% rate on capital gains and dividends." (Sec. John W. Snow, Op-Ed, "The Heart Of The Economy," The Wall Street Journal, 2/15/06)

Senate Goes On Record In Support Of The President's Tax Cuts. "Republicans took a step toward extending lower tax rates on investments when a majority of senators for the first time in this session of Congress signaled that they support the idea. Senators yesterday voted 53-47 in support of a two-year extension of President Bush's 15% rates on capital gains and dividends. By the same margin, senators said the final tax bill should both lower tax rates on capital gains and dividends and exempt millions of middle-income Americans from the alternative minimum tax. While yesterday's votes were on a procedural motion and won't have any effect over the final tax bill, they put a majority of senators on the record as supporting an extension of lower tax rates on capital gains and dividends." (Brody Mullins, "Extension Of Bush Tax Rates Wins Support Of Republican Senators," The Wall Street Journal, 2/15/06)

Retail Sales "Surging At The Fastest Pace In Six Years." "Consumers, lured to malls by unusually warm weather and eager to spend their Christmas gift cards, boosted retail sales by a much larger than expected amount in January, with sales outside of autos surging at the fastest pace in six years. The Commerce Department said Tuesday that retail sales excluding autos were up 2.2 percent in January, the best showing in this category since late 1999. With autos included, retail sales rose by 2.3 percent, the best showing in 20 months. Overall retail sales had risen by a tiny 0.4 percent in December. The overall increase was more than double what economists had been forecasting." (Martin Crutsinger, "Retail Sales Post Strong Gains In January," The Associated Press, 2/14/06)

Tulane University Hospital In New Orleans Reopens. "Tulane University Hospital, which sustained more than $90 million in damage from Hurricane Katrina, reopened its emergency room, several operating rooms and some beds Tuesday at an exuberant, pep rally-style ceremony. More than 100 nurses and doctors in lab coats and scrubs performed the wave in celebration, prompting Mayor Ray Nagin to ask them what was in their coffee. 'I don't know what you're taking at Tulane, but I want some of that,' he said." (Rukmini Callimachi, "New Orleans' Tulane Hospital Reopens," The Associated Press, 2/14/06)

Under Secretary Of State Nicholas Burns Says The International Community Is United In Calling For Iran To Turn Back On Its Nuclear Program. CBS' DAVID MARTIN: "Iran announced to the world today it has begun small-scale enrichment of uranium. That's still a long way from having enough material to build a bomb, but Nicholas Burns, the State Department's number three official, says that tiny step has large consequences." UNDER SECRETARY BURNS: "That is a bright red line that the international community has laid before the Iranians. Countries all over the world have voted to say that Iran should turn back from the step they took today." Martin: "They're not exactly making a secret that they've begun this research on enriching." Burns: "No, they're not. In fact, they're crowing about it. They've made a public announcement about it." (CBS' "Evening News," 2/14/06)

U.S. Trade Ambassador Rob Portman Highlights Efforts To Hold China Accountable In Trade Relations. "The Bush administration proposed Tuesday to establish a China Enforcement Task Force under the U.S. Trade Representative as a legal counterweight to Chinese exports that the government says benefit from illegal state subsidies and lax controls on counterfeiters. U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman accused China of failing to respect intellectual property rights, environmental concerns and labor standards, and for failing to fully open its markets to foreign competitors. ... 'U.S. policy must now shift to treating China as a mature trading partner that should be held accountable for its actions and required to live up to its responsibilities,' Portman said in a letter to U.S. Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., that accompanied the report to the House Ways and Means Committee." (Elliot Blair Smith, "China Task Force To Wield Trade Rules," USA Today, 2/14/06)

The President And Mrs. Bush Celebrate Valentine's Day With A Social Dinner At The White House. "Some women get flowers, others jewelry. This year, first lady Laura Bush got a formal dinner and an intimate concert by a well-known crooner from her valentine. For the second year in a row, President Bush and his wife spent the lovers' holiday formally entertaining about 100 friends and associates at the White House. Singer Michael Feinstein capped the romantic evening by serenading the crowd, which included new Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito, actor Chuck Norris – wearing black cowboy boots with his tux, of course – singer Wayne Newton and Sens. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., and Joe Lieberman, D-Conn." ("Bushes, Friends Celebrate Valentine's Day," The Associated Press, 2/14/06)

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Opens Internal Probe Of NSA Surveillance Program. The Washington Post (2/16, A4, Eggen, 744K) reports, "The Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility has opened an internal investigation into the department's role in approving the Bush administration's warrantless domestic eavesdropping program, officials said yesterday. … In a letter to Rep. Maurice D. Hinchey (D-N.Y.), Office of Professional Responsibility counsel H. Marshall Jarrett said that his office has 'initiated an investigation' into the Justice Department's role in the NSA surveillance program. The letter, dated Feb. 2 but not received by Hinchey until yesterday, indicates that the probe will include 'whether such activities are permissible under existing law.' But Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said the inquiry will be more limited: 'They will not be making a determination on the lawfulness of the NSA program but rather will determine whether the department lawyers complied with their professional obligations in connection with that program.' … Scolinos also said that 'OPR routinely looks into issues of this kind.'"

The AP (2/16, Barrett) reports, "Marshall Jarrett, the office's counsel, acknowledged the investigation in a letter to Rep. Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y. Jarrett's letter did not specify which of the agency's actions or employees are being examined. … 'You asked this office to investigate the Department of Justice's role in authorizing, approving and auditing certain surveillance activities of the National Security Agency, and whether such activities are permissible under existing law. For your information, we have initiated an investigation,' Jarrett wrote." The AP notes, "Hinchey is one of a few dozen Democratic lawmakers who have been highly critical of the eavesdropping program first revealed in December. … 'We're very happy that the OPR is doing it, because it seems on the surface certain illegal actions may have taken place,' said Hinchey, one of Congress' most outspoken critics of President Bush." The AP notes, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the office routinely looks into issues of this kind. … 'They will not be making a determination on the lawfulness on the NSA program, but rather will determine whether the department's lawyers complied with their professional obligations in connection with examining this program,' Roehrkasse said."The New York Times (2/16, Shane, Lichtblau, 1.19M) reports that the review "is the first formal government inquiry into the surveillance program since its existence was reported by The New York Times in December. … The Justice Department review was begun despite public assurances by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and President Bush that the program is legal and closely monitored by government lawyers."

Gonzales Says Ashcroft, Comey Testimony Will Be Limited. The Washington Post (2/16, A4, Eggen, 744K) reports, "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales signaled in an interview with The Washington Post yesterday that the administration will sharply limit the testimony of former attorney general John D. Ashcroft and former deputy attorney general James B. Comey, both of whom have been asked to appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee regarding the program. 'Clearly, there are privilege issues that have to be considered,' Gonzales said. 'As a general matter, we would not be disclosing internal deliberations, internal recommendations. That's not something we'd do as a general matter, whether or not you're a current member of the administration or a former member of the administration.' 'You have to wonder what could Messrs. Comey and Ashcroft add to the discussion,' Gonzales added."

Specter Challenges Roberts To Offer Legislation On NSA Surveillance. Roll Call (2/16, Pierce) reports, "Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) challenged Senate Intelligence Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) to put his money where his mouth is on the issue of how Congress should act on revelations that President Bush authorized warrantless eavesdropping on domestic electronic communications. Prompted by a reporter to respond to Roberts' recent comments that the Intelligence panel is better suited to deal with any legislation regarding the National Security Agency program, Specter replied, 'I would agree with him, and I would defer to him. Where's the legislation?' Specter is expected this week to rollout his own legislation to allow the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to look into the legality of the program, and he has been holding hearings, most recently with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, to try to determine the scope of the program and whether Congress needs to act more forcefully." Specter

"indicated that he is not inclined to delay his own bill while Roberts decides what, if anything, to do."

WPost Praises Efforts To Draft Legislation. An editorial in the Washington Post (2/16, A26, 744K) editorializes, "Congress is feeling its way gingerly as it contemplates the Bush administration's extralegal program of domestic surveillance. That's not surprising. The administration, which kept the program secret from all but eight members of Congress until recently, insists that any congressional inquiry could help the terrorists who are the ostensible targets of the surveillance. Moreover, given changes in technology, it may not be easy to write a law that both permits surveillance activities that make the country safer and protects civil liberties and congressional oversight. Nonetheless, those twin goals must be served, and the Republicans and Democrats looking for ways to do so are on the right track." The Post concludes, "As much as the administration would prefer otherwise, it is not acceptable simply to have this program continue in the existing legal and regulatory vacuum."

Will Laments Lack Of Checks On NSA Program, Calls For Congress To Authorize Surveillance. George Will writes in the Washington Post (2/16, A27, "The next time a president asks Congress to pass something akin to what Congress passed on Sept. 14, 2001 -- the Authorization for Use of Military Force (AUMF) -- the resulting legislation might be longer than Proust's 'Remembrance of Things Past.' Congress, remembering what is happening today, might stipulate all the statutes and constitutional understandings that it does not intend the act to repeal or supersede. But, then, perhaps no future president will ask for such congressional involvement in the gravest decision government makes -- going to war. … Administration supporters incoherently argue that the AUMF also authorized the NSA surveillance -- and that if the administration had asked, Congress would have refused to authorize it." The argument "that the AUMF contained a completely unexpressed congressional intent to empower the president to disregard the FISA regime is risible coming from this administration. It famously opposes those who discover unstated meanings in the Constitution's text and do not strictly construe the language of statutes." Will adds, that immediately after 9/11, Bush "should have begun surveillance of domestic-to-domestic calls -- the kind the Sept. 11 terrorists made. But 53 months later, Congress should make all necessary actions lawful by authorizing the president to take those actions, with suitable supervision. It should do so with language that does not stigmatize what he has been doing, but that implicitly refutes the doctrine that the authorization is superfluous."

Kondracke Says Administration Should Help Draft Legislation. Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (2/16), "Congress seems to be moving toward a sensible consensus on President Bush's secret National Security Agency surveillance program: Make it legal. Now, Bush should take 'Yes' for an answer. So far, the administration seems stuck on using the president's 'inherent' constitutional authority to tap suspected terrorists, but Bush would be on stronger ground if he agreed with Congress on a plan to establish its legality. Some Democrats still want to investigate Bush for what they see as his breaking the law with the program. But most now seem to accept that it's a valuable anti-terrorism tool that ought to be continued." Kondracke adds that Gonzales "indicated to the Senate Judiciary Committee that he'd listen to suggestions from Congress on legal changes. He ought to sit down with Congressional leaders and help write them."

US Seeks Extradition Of al-Qaeda Suspect From Canada. Reuters (2/16) reports, "The United States has formally requested the extradition of a Canadian man accused of supplying weapons to al Qaeda, but the process could take years, officials said on Wednesday." Reuters continues, "U.S. authorities say Abdullah Khadr, 24, also conspired to kill Americans abroad. Khadr was arrested in Toronto in December two weeks after returning to Canada from Pakistan." Reuters adds, "Khadr is the eldest son of Ahmed Said Khadr, who was an alleged al Qaeda financier and close friend of Osama bin Laden. He was killed in a 2003 gun battle in Pakistan. … Brother Omar Ahmed Khadr is the only Canadian held at the U.S. prison camp at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. … Canada's Justice Department now has 30 days to approve the U.S. request and if it says yes, a court hearing will be held to consider the extradition. Khadr can appeal that decision all the way to the Supreme Court, and it could be a long time before a final ruling is made."

Judge Allows Moussaoui Back Into Courtroom For Juror Questioning. The New York Times (2/16, Lewis, 1.19M) reports, "Zacarias Moussaoui resumed his place in a federal courtroom here on Wednesday and sat quietly as lawyers questioned potential jurors after he apparently reversed course and agreed not to disrupt the proceedings." This after Moussauoi was eject from the courtroom a day earlier after he refused to heed the judge's warnings "to defer to his court-appointed lawyers and stop making speeches about his case."\

The Washington Times (2/16, Seper, 90K) reports, "U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema, who Tuesday barred Moussaoui from ongoing jury selection in the trial's sentencing phase, offered no explanation for her change of mind -- and made no mention of his prior behavior to potential jurors in the death-penalty case."

The AP (2/16, Sniffen) reports that Judge Brinkema "had barred Moussaoui from jury selection Tuesday because he wouldn't promise to stop giving insult-laden speeches. … Brinkema did not explain her change of mind in court, but she had said the day before that she might reconsider if Moussaoui decided to alter his behavior. Even Moussaoui's court-appointed defense lawyers did not know why she changed her mind." The AP adds, "Fifteen of the 24 prospective jurors interviewed Wednesday were qualified for service - three over defense objections and one over government protest. Identified only by number, they were ordered to return March 6 when lawyers will exercise peremptory - or unexplained - strikes to whittle the pool to 12 jurors and six alternates. More potential jurors will be selected between now and March 6."

The Richmond Times-Dispatch (2/16, Bradley) reports, "Moussaoui exhibited none of the disruptive behavior that has characterized earlier courtroom appearances. Clad in a jail-issued green jumpsuit and white skullcap, he sat alone at a table behind his court-appointed defense team. … But in a continued show of defiance, he remained seated when the court clerk called out 'all rise' as Brinkema left the bench. He muttered 'God curse America' to spectators as federal marshals led him out of the courtroom at the lunchtime break. … He never spoke to his lawyers, with whom he has refused to cooperate. He once asked marshals for a drink of water and peered into the cup as if the drink had been tainted before taking a sip."

Pentagon Probe Found No Pre-9/11Information On Atta. The Washington Times (2/16, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "The Pentagon's top intelligence official told Congress yesterday that his investigation turned up no chart or photo depicting hijacker Mohamed Atta before the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, but a Republican lawmaker accused the Bush administration of ignoring evidence." The testimony from Stephen Cambone, undersecretary of defense for intelligence, "did not appear to answer the question about whether Able Danger singled out Atta as an al Qaeda-connected operative more than a year before the attacks." Rep. Curt Weldon "has been on a campaign to prove that such an identification was made. 'There has been no investigation,' Mr. Weldon said during a hearing in which several members deferred their 10-minute allotment to him. 'There has been no analysis by the 9/11 commission or anyone else.'"

Documents Reveal Internal Al Qaeda Struggles. USA Today (2/16, Diamond, 2.31M) reports, "Recently captured al-Qaeda documents portray terrorist leaders struggling over strategy, facing challenges by subordinates and issuing guidelines listing minimum qualifications for terrorism training camp supervisors. Drawn from a classified database called 'Harmony' compiled by the U.S. Special Operations Command, the documents were disclosed in a report released this week by West Point's Combating Terrorism Center." The documents "show al-Qaeda is committed to waging a holy war against 'dictators of the Earth and secular groups' that will end only when 'everyone believes in Allah.'"

Holy Land Foundation Prosecutors Mistakenly Disclosed Classified Records. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Krikorian, 958K) reports, "Federal officials in Dallas mistakenly disclosed classified counter-terrorism information in a breach of national security that could also threaten one of the country's biggest terrorism prosecution cases, newly unsealed court records show. The blunder exposed secret wiretap requests that commonly include classified information from U.S. agencies, foreign intelligence reports and confidential sources. The criminal case involves officials of the Texas-based Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, a now-defunct Islamic charity with alleged ties to terrorists. Its assets were frozen by the Treasury Department three months after the Sept. 11 attacks." The Times adds, "Disclosure that the government erred in sharing secret intelligence on the case came to light when court files were unsealed this week. The mistake occurred nearly a year ago but was not previously disclosed. KTVT-TV in Dallas first reported the security breach late Tuesday."

CIA Operative Says He Could Have Captured Bin Laden. The Washington Post (2/16, C1, Leiby, 744K) reports on Gary Berntsen, a CIA field operative who was dispatched to Afghanistan in October 2001. By Berntsen's telling, "he could have gotten Osama bin Laden -- if only they'd given him the troops and the time to get the job done." In his book "Jawbreaker" Berntsen provides a "score-settling insider's account of how bin Laden eluded capture at Tora Bora that December."

Guantanamo Prison Said To Be "At A Crossroads." The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Richey, 61K) reports that the US prison camp at Guantanamo Bay "is at a crossroads. Will it return to its roots: a kind of rights-free zone where Al Qaeda suspects are interrogated with little judicial oversight? Or will it become an ever stronger magnet for vigorous legal challenges, based on alleged violations of international human rights, the Geneva accords, American law, and US constitutional protections?" The matter "is before two key courts, whose rulings will help define not just the scope of judicial oversight at Guantánamo, but perhaps also the role of America's system of divided government in wartime." The Monitor adds, "The first indication of how the courts may view Guantánamo's future role will probably come from the Supreme Court. On Friday, the justices are scheduled to consider at their closed-door conference a Bush administration motion that the high court dismiss the case of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a former driver for Osama bin Laden. Mr. Hamdan's case is one of the most important of the high court's current term. It is a test of the legality of President Bush's military commission process."

Al Qaeda Training Camp Photos To Be Key US Evidence At Hayat Trials. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/16, Thompson) reports, "The government has satellite images of a suspected al-Qaida training camp that federal prosecutors say was attended by" Hamid Hayat, and the photos are "expected to be a key part of the government's case" against Hayat and his father, Umer. The AP notes, "A jury was seated Wednesday for the trial of Hamid Hayat," and "opening statements were expected to begin Thursday." Umer Hayat's "portion of the trial is to begin next week before a separate jury that was seated Tuesday."

Al Arian Retrial Will Begin In April If US Decides To Proceed. The AP (2/16, Stacy) reports, "Sami Al-Arian's second trial -- if there is one -- will begin sometime in April, according to a federal court filing Wednesday. Federal prosecutors haven't announced definitively whether they will retry the former University of South Florida professor on remaining charges of aiding Palestinian terrorists," and "also still at issue is who would represent Al-Arian if there is a second trial. His attorneys, William Moffitt and Linda Moreno, asked the court last month to allow them to withdraw from the case. A U.S. magistrate has not yet ruled on the request."

Blair Wins Parliamentary Vote On Anti-Terror Law. The New York Times (2/16, Cowell, 1.19M) reports that British Prime Minister Tony Blair "secured victory in the House of Commons on Wednesday in a vote to expand counterterrorism laws by making 'glorification' of terrorism a criminal offense. Legislators voted 315 to 277 in a ballot that pitted Mr. Blair's Labor Party against the Conservative and Liberal Democratic opposition. Seventeen Labor dissidents voted against the measure.'

The Washington Post (2/16, A14, Sullivan, 744K) reports, "The measure, called the terrorism bill, still must be approved by the House of Lords, which voted last month to strip the 'glorification' clause out of it. It was unclear whether the Lords would continue to object to the proposal on grounds that it infringes on civil liberties or back down in the face of Wednesday's clear margin of victory."

The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Daniszewski, 958K) reports, "Despite its earlier opposition, the House of Lords is expected to defer to the more powerful House of Commons when it takes up the measure again. The two chambers must reach agreement for it to become law."

German Court Overturns Law On Shoot-Down Of Hijacked Planes. The Washington Post (2/16, A15, Whitlock, 744K) reports, "Germany's highest court overturned a law Wednesday that had authorized the government to shoot down hijacked civilian airliners, ruling that it was unconstitutional to sacrifice the lives of passengers to protect potential targets of a terrorist attack. … The law was challenged by opponents who argued that the constitution forbids the military from endangering the lives of German citizens or exercising domestic police powers." The Post adds, "German lawmakers from the ruling party, the Christian Democratic Union, said they would try to amend the constitution to revive the law, but many other members of Germany's coalition government are opposed to that. Changing the constitution would require a two-thirds vote by Parliament."

Escaped Al Qaeda Prisoners Becoming Folk Heroes In Yemen. The New York Times (2/16, Fattah, 1.19M) reports, "Almost two weeks after 23 prisoners suspected of terrorist ties broke out of a maximum-security prison here, the fugitives are emerging as unlikely folk heroes: the men who thumbed their noses at the Yemeni government and, more significantly, at America. … A nationwide manhunt continued Wednesday as the Yemeni government offered a $25,000 reward for information leading to the arrest of the 13 people suspected of being operatives of Al Qaeda among the escapees. Side streets leading to the prison remained blocked off, while security men patrolled in and around the mosque where the men emerged."

PATRIOT ACT:

Feingold May Try To Amend Patriot Act. The AP (2/16, Kellman) reports, "Faced with losing his bid to block the USA Patriot Act, Sen. Russell Feingold is preparing a last-ditch strategy to amend the legislation with stronger safeguards against government intrusion and more frequent congressional oversight." The AP continues, "The effort is unlikely to succeed. Most senators, including the leaders of his party, are expected to vote for the White House-brokered deal that supporters say makes the most changes possible without jeopardizing passage before the terrorism-fighting law expires March 10. … 'The outcome here is absolutely predetermined,' said Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., expressing frustration with the Feingold-led delay. 'It's going to pass with overwhelming support.' … Still, Feingold, D-Wis., stuck to his objections, saying protracted talks with the White House over the law's protections for civil liberties had produced only a 'fig leaf' to cover weaknesses that leave people vulnerable to government intrusion. … 'What we are seeing is quite simply a capitulation to the intransigent and misleading rhetoric of a White House that sees any effort to protect civil liberties as a sign of weakness,' Feingold said during a floor speech Wednesday." The AP notes, "Without any apparent supporters for his filibuster, Feingold agreed to Frist's insistence on holding a procedural test vote Thursday that would clear the way for Senate debate on the legislation. Frist said the Senate would hold its final votes at the end of the month, when Congress returns from a weeklong recess. … During the process, Feingold will try to introduce several amendments that would strengthen protections for civil liberties. One would set a four-year expiration date on the use of so-called national security letters under the Patriot Act - secret government requests for information, according to Feingold's office. … Another would require the government to notify the subject of a secret search within seven days or obtain court permission to maintain the secrecy for a longer period, rather than the 30-day requirement in the legislation being considered."

Knight Ridder distributes a Milwaukee Journal Sentinel story (2/16, Gilbert) that reports, "Feingold was the only senator to vote against the act in 2001. But other lawmakers later joined him in criticizing the law and calling for curbs on the government's new police powers. Late last year, four Republicans joined Feingold and every other Democrat in the Senate in blocking renewal of the bill, saying it didn't do enough to protect civil liberties. … But in recent weeks, the White House agreed to some relatively small changes in the measure. As a result, Feingold's four Republican allies and a number of Democrats dropped their opposition, making its passage inevitable. … Feingold, however, has vowed to use every parliamentary move against the proposal. After he began his filibuster Wednesday, an agreement was struck to put off reauthorization of the Patriot Act until March."

CQ (2/15, Sandler) notes Feingold "drew a frustrated response from Majority Leader Bill Frist," who "referred to Feingold's filibuster…as one of several 'insufferable attempts to put off the nation's business.' … Feingold expressed a similar sense of frustration. He said he had tried all day long, to no avail, to get Frist to agree to let him offer a few amendments," which he hopes to bring to a vote today. However, "it does not appear that will happen. The Senate will vote Thursday morning on limiting debate on the motion to proceed to the bill changing the conference report," and "after that, a cloture vote on the bill would come Feb. 28, and then a vote on final passage March 1."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush To Seek Additional $4.2 Billion For Louisiana Recovery. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Gaouette, 958K) reports, "In an unexpected breakthrough in negotiations with Louisiana officials, the Bush administration announced Wednesday that President Bush would ask Congress for an additional $4.2 billion to help the state repair and rebuild homes battered by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. Federal support for housing reconstruction, which has been the subject of protracted negotiations between Washington and local officials, is considered a prerequisite for wider recovery because it opens the way for thousands of displaced people to return to New Orleans and surrounding areas. … Louisiana officials had complained that the administration wasn't providing enough housing help to allow the region to recover fully. On Wednesday, there was nothing but praise for the president." In thanking President Bush Wednesday, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco "pledged…to use the money to build a 'safer and smarter Louisiana.'"

The New York Times (2/16, Dao, Drew, 1.19M) reports, "The $4.2 billion request was a turnabout for the administration, which three weeks ago rejected legislation proposed by Representative Richard H. Baker, a Louisiana Republican, to create a nonprofit group to buy out flooded homes, the plan favored by Ms. Blanco. … Last week, Ms. Blanco threatened to try to block a federal sale of oil and gas leases off the Gulf Coast, saying it was 'time to play hardball.' But in the past week, state officials said, Donald E. Powell, the president's coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding, became convinced that the federal government should do more to help homeowners in the flood plain who did not have flood insurance."

More Funding, Property Buyout Plan Sought By State Lawmakers. CQ (2/15, Higa) reported, "Blanco praised Bush for requesting the additional money. But she also urged the administration to drop its opposition to legislation (HR 4100) offered by Rep. Richard H. Baker, R-La., that would create a government program to buy and redevelop hurricane-damaged properties. Baker, who along with Louisiana Sens. Mary L. Landrieu, a Democrat, and David Vitter, a Republican, testified Wednesday to the Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee on his plan and Louisiana's needs, released a statement reiterating 'the need for a comprehensive plan that includes property buyouts and federal resources to make it work.'" Meanwhile, Landrieu said, "The Bush administration…previously promised an additional $18 billion in relief. 'The $4.2 billion proposed today represents about 23 percent of that sum,' Landrieu said. 'I look forward to seeing the administration's plans for the remaining 77 percent.'"

Blanco Puts Aside Plan To Shrink New Orleans Government. Meanwhile, the AP (2/16, Deslatte) reports Blanco "abandoned for now her push to shrink New Orleans' government after the proposal ran into strong opposition during a special legislative session on hurricane relief. … The measure by House Speaker Joe Salter would have consolidated the city's century-old network of two elected sheriffs, two elected clerks of court and two court systems. It passed the House overwhelmingly and was scheduled for a hearing Wednesday in a Senate committee." The AP notes, "Blanco is continuing to press other proposals, including a measure to consolidate Louisiana's levee boards under state control."

Some Democrats Question Blanco's Viability, Push For Breaux To Enter Race. Roll Call (2/16, Whittington) reports, "As a House committee marked up the final version of the Hurricane Katrina report Wednesday on Capitol Hill, there was growing concern among Louisiana Democrats over the viability of Gov. Kathleen Blanco's (D) political future and whether the party can find another candidate to coalesce behind before the 2007 gubernatorial election. The first evidence of that movement became public this week, as pressure began to mount on former Sen. John Breaux (D) to consider re-entering political life and running for governor next year. There is little question that Breaux, who retired from the Senate in 2004 and remains widely popular back home, would be difficult to beat if he runs. However, many veteran Bayou State politicos remain doubtful that he has the desire to get back in the game." Roll Call adds, 'Some of the pressure for Democrats to find a consensus alternative to Blanco is being fueled by the behind-the-scenes machinations of Rep. Bobby Jindal (R-La.), who narrowly lost to Blanco in a 2003 runoff and is preparing for another run next year."

Chertoff, Rumsfeld Reportedly Don't Use E-Mail. Newsweek (2/16, Hosenball) reports in a web exclusive, that "congressional investigations of government responses to Hurricane Katrina have revealed that two of the nation's key crisis managers, the secretaries of Defense and Homeland Security, do not use e-mail." Newsweek continues, "The House committee established to investigate Katrina was 'informed that neither Secretary Chertoff nor Secretary Rumsfeld use e-mail,' reported Reps. Charlie Melancon and William Jefferson, two Louisiana Democrats who participated in the inquiry despite a boycott by other House Democrats who felt that the inquiry was too partisan. … Spokesmen for the two officials maintain that Rumsfeld and Chertoff were kept informed during Katrina the same way as they keep in touch during other crises: through aides and a variety of other communications methods. 'This is a large organization with a very competent staff that that kept the secretary well informed on Defense Department operations throughout Katrina,' Bryan Whitman, a Defense spokesman, told NEWSWEEK. Brian Besanceney, Chertoff's top spokesman, said: 'Every senior DHS official knows that, if they have important information to convey to the secretary, they go to his office or pick up the phone.'"

Senate Panel Blasts Chertoff's Handling Of Hurricane Katrina Disaster. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff faced harsh criticism yesterday before a Senate panel for his department's performance during and after Hurricane Katrina. CBS also interviewed Chertoff, who did not respond directly when asked if he had offered to resign over the Katrina disaster. Meanwhile, a House panel released a report that criticized all levels of government, calling the response to the storm "a national failure, where leaders failed to lead."

ABC World News Tonight (2/15, story 4, 2:20, Sawyer) reported House and Senate Committees "blasted the Federal Government's response to Hurricane Katrina, calling it a monumental failure. They aimed their anger at the Bush Administration's senior emergency management official, the head of Homeland Security, Michael Chertoff, charging that faster action, better planning and better communication could have spared lives." ABC (Thomas) added, "There was a stunning revelation that the top two officials in charge of responding to Katrina, former FEMA Director Michael Brown and Secretary Chertoff, were at odds at the moment of crisis." Sen. Collins: "I have an e-mail in which your staff is complaining to Michael Brown's staff that you have lost all contact with Michael Brown for two days. And this is a critical two days. Michael Brown testified before this committee that he found your phone calls to be annoying, disruptive." Thomas: "Lack of communication and coordination was a constant theme. Chertoff says he found out the levees broke in New Orleans, a full day after FEMA officials knew." House Republicans also "issued a 600-page report that can be summed up in one word -- failure, and at every level."

The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 5, 1:55, Schieffer) reported, "Chertoff was getting beaten up by senators from both parties, one of them saying the disaster workers ran around like Keystone cops." CBS (Attkisson) added the senators were "methodically challenging Chertoff on his mindset before, during, and after Katrina's landfall, like why he went to a bird flu conference the day after Katrina hit." Chertoff was "also criticized in a scathing report issued on the House side today and it was Republican Tom Davis who lambasted the White House." Rep. Tom Davis, Virginia: "I think the White House attitude is that they were monitoring this and they were disengaged and this was Homeland Security's responsibility. And I think that's a copout to a great extent."

NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 3, 2:15, Reid) reported, "On day one of Hurricane Katrina, as water poured into New Orleans, Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff testified today he was unaware the levies had breached, even though dozens of emails show many other government officials did know." Chertoff "told frustrated senators he didn't learn of the breeches until the next morning but still decided to stick to his schedule and fly to Atlanta for a conference on avian flu."

The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 7, 1:55, Schieffer) interviewed Chertoff following his senate hearing. CBS (Schieffer) reported Chertoff discussed "what he conceded was a very rough day. Well, Mr. Secretary, you took quite a pounding up there today. Was it deserved?" Michael Chertoff, Secretary of Homeland Security: "This terrible disaster occurred on the first six months of my watch, and I've got to take responsibility for it. And I'm interested in hearing the criticism, but what I'm really interested in is using that criticism as a basis to get ourselves prepared for what is around the corner this next hurricane season or some other natural or manmade disaster." Schieffer: "Well, let me just put it to you this way: There are a lot of rumors that your job is on the line here. Have you actually offered your resignation to the President?" Secretary Chertoff: "You know, the President understands, of course, and I understand, that I serve at his pleasure. As long as he thinks that I make a contribution, I am happy to serve him."

The New York Times (2/16, Lipton, 1.19M) reports Chertoff "endured two and a half hours of intense personal criticism Wednesday by Senate Republicans and Democrats investigating the response to Hurricane Katrina, several of whom said he bore responsibility for a multitude of errors that prolonged the suffering of Gulf Coast residents. The rebuke was a painful turnabout for Mr. Chertoff, a former federal judge who was unanimously confirmed a year ago to take over the department and until recently had largely escaped blame for the government's flawed response to the storm." Chertoff "acknowledged that he and his department had failed to respond adequately to the disaster, citing management lapses, improper deployment of staff and the unreliable delivery of disaster relief supplies. He said that his department had moved far too slowly to evacuate the refugees who packed the New Orleans Superdome and, later, the city's convention center." The Times notes, "Both Democrats and Republicans on the committee told him they appreciated his candor and willingness to accept blame, contrasting it with the testimony on Friday by Mr. Brown."

The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Neuman, Chen, 958K) reports while fielding "a withering barrage of congressional criticism," Chertoff "vowed to do better, referring to an array of reforms that he has initiated. Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Me.), chairwoman of the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs, said in her opening remarks that her panel's latest hearing was intended not only to learn why Chertoff's vast agency was 'plagued by indecision and delay,' but also to avoid a repeat of the fiasco." While "he accepted responsibility for his department's shortcomings," Chertoff "also pointed out the extraordinary nature of the hurricane and urged lawmakers to not overlook 'things that succeeded.'" Chertoff added "that within months of taking over the newly created department, he set out to streamline its operations, targeting Oct. 1 as a deadline. 'Unfortunately, Katrina didn't wait until Oct. 1,' he said." The Times adds, 'Today's hearing served as the latest reminder of how his department's response to Katrina has tarnished Chertoff's reputation just a year after he took office. … Now some question whether he can survive in the job."

Under the headline "Homeland Security Misled Before Storm, Chertoff Says," the Washington Times (2/16, Hudson, 90K) reports Chertoff "said key officials were informed of the possible devastation of Hurricane Katrina days before the storm hit but were misled on emergency precautions in place." He "described his conversations with ousted Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) director Michael D. Brown as 'heated' more than a day after the storm struck and the New Orleans levee system failed. In those discussions, Mr. Chertoff said he was 'nudging, prodding, poking and ultimately raising my voice about buses on Wednesday, [which] led to a decision by the deputy and me on Thursday that we needed to simply take this away and get it done ourselves.' … Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican and chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Government Oversight Committee, said the biggest mistake was in keeping Mr. Brown on the job despite his objections to his agency's restructuring and its role in emergency planning."

USA Today (2/16, Hall, 2.31M) reports, "Chertoff told senators he accepts responsibility for 'many lapses' during the catastrophe," but "deflected some blame to former Federal Emergency Management Agency director Michael Brown. He said he would not have named Brown to lead the response if he had known then 'what I know now about Mr. Brown's agenda.'" Chertoff also "defended his decision to fly to Atlanta for an avian flu meeting the day after the storm. He insisted it wasn't proof he was disengaged from the crisis."

Reuters (2/16, Smith) reports, "The report released by a US House of Representatives panel was a rare criticism of the administration by congressional Republicans. It said the response to the hurricane, which killed 1,200 people and destroyed about 300,000 homes, was 'a failure of initiative. It was a failure of leadership.'" The report added that the President "did not receive adequate advice and counsel from senior staff during the crisis. 'Federal agencies, including (the Department of Homeland Security), had varying degrees of unfamiliarity with their roles and responsibilities,' the report concluded." In testimony before the Senate, "Chertoff noted Bush declared the Gulf coastal region a disaster area before the storm hit landfall and said that action was unprecedented. Despite preparations for the storm, he said the agency was quickly overtaken by events. 'We now know our capabilities were simply overwhelmed by the magnitude of this storm,' Chertoff said."

Report Finds DHS Suffered From Staffing Shortages. In its "Federal Diary" column, the Washington Post (2/16, B2, Barr, 744K) reports that one of the "biggest" ways "Katrina overwhelmed the Department of Homeland Security…involved staffing. When the monster storm hit, the department was short-handed. That's one of the key findings in a report released yesterday by the House committee that investigated preparations for and the response to Katrina, which hit New Orleans and much of the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29. … The staffing woes were particularly evident at the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which has about 2,500 full-time employees." Meanwhile, "FEMA scored second to last among government agencies in a 2005 survey of job satisfaction, the report notes. The report also says Homeland Security officials 'were unable to maintain their ranks of disaster professionals, through employee retention, development or recruitment, and this failure hindered the response to Hurricane Katrina.'"

House Report Prompts Legislative Initiatives. CQ (2/15, Starks) reported, "The report's release triggered legislative initiatives that touch on nearly every aspect of the response to the disaster. The House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee will soon begin moving legislation expected to call for the Department of Homeland Security to relinquish control of FEMA. The House Appropriations Subcommittee on Homeland Security will likely look to boost funding for the embattled agency." Meanwhile, "House Democratic leaders commended the work of the GOP-dominated panel whose five-month investigation they had boycotted, fearing a partisan whitewash. But they renewed their calls Wednesday for an independent panel, arguing that the committee failed to press the White House hard enough for documents."

Report's Findings "Swept Up In…Election-Year Politics." The Washington Post (2/16, A3, Hsu, 744K) reports that the House panel report's "findings were quickly swept up in divisive election-year politics and the complex task of rebuilding the devastated Gulf Coast. Rep. Thomas M. Davis III "said that Congress and the White House are ready to debate proposals to restructure national emergency plans, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the federal flood insurance program, and laws that spawned a bungled $2 billion-plus effort to temporarily house evacuees. But Democrats from hard-hit Louisiana and Mississippi, backed by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), said such changes, while needed, would do nothing to hold Bush administration officials accountable or speed help to 2 million victims of the Aug. 29 storm. Democrats renewed calls for an independent investigation, and accused the GOP of corruption, citing FEMA and US Army Corps of Engineers relief contracts with firms tied to associates of President Bush." The Post adds, "The partisan political maneuvering underscored the limitations of yesterday's House report."

Columnist Says Chertoff Demonstrated "Qualified Personal Responsibility." Dana Milbank, in his column for the Washington Post (2/16, A2,, 744K) writes, "President Bush in 2000 ushered in the Era of Personal Responsibility. Yesterday ushered in the Era of Qualified Personal Responsibility. In hours-long testimony before a Senate committee, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said he took the blame for the department's failures responding to Hurricane Katrina. 'I am responsible for the Department of Homeland Security,' came the inevitable claim. 'I'm accountable and accept responsibility for the performance of the entire department.'" However, Chertoff could not "come up with much in the way of what he had done wrong." Milbank continues that "from the start of his appearance before the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee yesterday, Chertoff interspersed claims of responsibility with assignments of blame elsewhere. He blamed the weather. 'This was a storm of unprecedented magnitude,' he said, rattling off statistics. He blamed the department he inherited, which, 'barely two years old, had a lot of work to do.' He added: 'Frankly, FEMA was strained in past emergencies.' Mostly, though, he blamed subordinates. 'I was conscious of the fact that although I'm the secretary, I'm not a hurricane operator,' Chertoff explained. 'I do not have 30 years of experience managing hurricanes, and I do not see myself in a position to contradict or second-guess operational decisions.' Chertoff did blame himself for one thing: trusting then-FEMA director Mike 'Brownie' Brown."

Chertoff's Job Said To Be Safe. Bloomberg (2/16, Bliss) reports, "Senators were uniformly critical of the Homeland Security Department's response to the storm, and most said Chertoff should have done more in its aftermath to ease the suffering of Americans who lacked basic necessities. Still, none went so far as Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, who said early last month that Chertoff should step down. Thomas Mann, a political analyst at the Brookings Institution in Washington, said Chertoff's job is safe. President George W. Bush 'likens forced resignations to an admission of culpability on his part,' Mann said. The president probably has gone as far as he's willing with the resignation of FEMA's former director, Michael Brown, Mann said."

More Commentary. Under the headline "A Deadly Vacuum," the New York Times (2/16, 1.19M) editorializes, "In the Bush administration, there is no such thing as failure at the top. When something goes wrong because of bad leadership, punishment is meted out to the foot soldiers and middle management, while the people in charge remain unscathed. Now we'll see whether the rule holds true in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina." Following the House panel's report, "one thing is clear. While there is no shortage of incompetent public officials involved in this tragedy, one stands out above the rest. That person is Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. According to the panel's report, Mr. Chertoff has 'primary responsibility for managing the national response to a catastrophic disaster,' yet he handled his decision-making responsibilities 'late, ineffectively, or not at all.'" The Times continues, "Now Mr. Chertoff and his opposite number inside the White House are proposing changes to FEMA, including a new professional response force. While this is a good idea in and of itself, big organizational solutions will not help if there is a leadership vacuum. It would be nice for the administration to finally send a message that if important people do a bad job, they go away."

Senator Places Hold On Increase In Flood Insurance Program Borrowing. The Hill (2/16, Schor) reports, "The House yesterday sliced about $400 million from a bill increasing the National Flood Insurance Program's borrowing authority, sending the bill back to the Senate for final approval, but an anonymous senator immediately placed a hold on the bill. The program has estimated that it will no longer be able to pay claims for policyholders hit by Hurricane Katrina if borrowing authority is not increased within the next few weeks, but the Senate hold could forestall final passage of the flood-insurance bill until March, requiring insurance companies to stop paying flood claims underwritten by the government. One lobbyist working for a swift increase in borrowing authority pointed to Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) as the likely source of the hold, saying Snowe is seeking recourse against a hold placed by Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) on extra home heating aid to the Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Program (LIHEAP)."

New Orleans Attorneys Feels Effects Of Katrina. The National Law Journal (2/16, Jones) reports, "Walk along the main streets of New Orleans' French Quarter and you will find restaurants and bars ready for business, with music spilling out of their open doors. Tables are set, ceiling fans are churning and servers stand poised for customers. … A few blocks away, in the business district, the town's streetcars have begun again to lumber past upscale shops, the Aquarium of the Americas and Harrah's casino. … But the streetcars roll along eerily empty for the most part, and many of the retail businesses remain boarded up. … 'What's worse than the devastation is that all of the people are gone,' said attorney William Rittenberg during a recent drive through the French Quarter. A small-firm practitioner who has worked in New Orleans for 35 years, he said he had not taken a paycheck from his six-attorney firm since Hurricane Katrina struck. … 'I worry about whether I can remain here,' he said." The Journal adds, "Rittenberg, a partner with Rittenberg & Samuel, is just one of thousands of New Orleans lawyers whose jobs took a drastic turn in September. As a small-firm lawyer, he is struggling to make a living in a town where much of his client base has disappeared. Other attorneys, such as Gary Elkins, who runs a midsize practice in the business district, and Richard Dicharry, chairman of 248-attorney Phelps Dunbar, have found, at least for now, former work replaced with rebuilding efforts and disputes arising from the destruction. … Whatever the size of the firm these New Orleans lawyers come from -- whether it is a solo practice, a large operation or somewhere in between -- the path their lives have taken five months after the storm-like-no-other has been marked with despondency and with hope."

NYTimes Opposes Use Of UAE Company For Port Security Operations. An editorial in the New York Times (2/16, 1.19M) says, "The Bush administration has done far too little to protect the nation's ports against terrorists. But it has taken that laxness to a new level by allowing a company from the United Arab Emirates to run significant operations at six American ports, including the Port of New York. The administration should reverse this decision." The Times adds, "Much remains to be done to protect the nation's ports against terrorism. Putting port management in the hands of a country with such a mixed record in the war on terror is a step in the wrong direction."

WAR NEWS:

Australian TV Airs New Pictures Of Abu Ghraib Prison Abuse. The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 9, 1:50, Schieffer) reported additional pictures of abuse of Iraqi prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison "have surfaced and some of them turn out to be worse than what we saw before." CBS (Martin) added, "Perhaps the most disturbing shows a deranged prisoner slamming his head into a cell door while someone takes pictures, but no one tries to stop him. Many of the pictures show the same kinds of abuse seen in the original photos which triggered the Abu Ghraib scandal. Iraqis subjected to sexual humiliation and shackled in positions tantamount to torture. The Pentagon has about 200 photos from inside Abu Ghraib, and it has steadfastly refused to release them, even going to court to stop some of them from getting out, arguing they would ignite anti-American violence. With Muslims still demonstrating and rioting over the publication of a cartoon making fun of the Prophet Muhammad, and with new revelations of a video showing British troops abusing Iraqi teenagers, these photos, in the words of a senior American official in Iraq, 'could not have come at a worse time.'"

The Financial Times (2/16, Tucker, Sevastopulo) reports an Australian television station yesterday broadcast these "previously unpublished images said to show physical abuse of Iraqi prisoners at the US-run prison near Baghdad. Bryan Whitman, deputy Pentagon spokesman, said the images would 'further inflame and possibly incite unnecessary violence in the world.'"

The New York Times (2/16, Stout, 1.19M) reports "the State Department legal adviser, John B. Bellinger III, said the latest pictures 'show once again just the reprehensible conduct that was going on in Abu Ghraib.'" He "noted that after the instances of abuse in late 2003 and their disclosure early in 2004 there had been public investigations, prosecutions and internal reviews. 'And it's unfortunate, in fact, that these photographs are coming out further and fanning the flames,' he said. Images from the Australian broadcast were shown in the Middle East."

The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Dreazen, 2.11M) says "the images also appeared to raise new questions about the extent of the abuse at the prison. One of the photos aired by the Australian network showed a prisoner lying dead on the ground in a pool of blood, while another sequence showed a corpse in a blood-smeared room that the network said had been used by the Central Intelligence Agency for interrogations. All told, the segment showed images of six corpses, though it was not clear how each had died. Other photos showed prisoners with wounds that appear to have been caused by shotgun pellets."

The Washington Post (2/16, A20, White, 744K) reports "Pentagon officials emphasized that the photographs had been part of investigations that led to the punishment of several military police soldiers who worked at the prison. 'We can confirm that 13 of the 14 images released by the Australian television outlet are authentic,' said Col. Joseph Curtin, an Army spokesman at the Pentagon. 'The Army condemns the abusive behavior depicted in these photos and has taken aggressive action to prosecute those held accountable. Nonetheless, these are not new images and are included in the Abu Ghraib criminal case files.'"

Tapes Reveal Saddam, Top Iraqi Leadership Discussing Terrorism, WMD. Tapes from the mid-1990s recovered by the CIA in Baghdad reveal former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and members of his cabinet discussing the possibility of terrorist attacks – conducted by others – using weapons of mass destruction in the US. The tapes show the top Iraqi leadership discussing WMD and how they used deception in dealing with UN inspectors.

ABC World News Tonight (2/15, story 7, 3:45, Ross) reported, "'Terrorism is coming,' says Saddam Hussein in one of the most dramatic moments on the tapes as he talks, or muses, with his cabinet, including Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz. Saddam says he warned the Americans 'that in the future, there will be terrorism with weapons of mass destruction.' He continues, 'What would prevent a booby-trapped car causing a nuclear explosion in Washington, or a germ, or a chemical one?' But he says Iraq would not be involved. 'This is coming,' says Saddam. 'This story is coming, but not from Iraq.' Tariq Aziz then adds, 'Sir, the biological is very easy to make. It's so simple that any biologist can make a bottle of germs, and drop it into a water tower and kill 100,000. An American in the house near the White House could do it,' Aziz says." Rep. Pete Hoekstra: "It appears they are authentic. From reading some of the transcripts, you would think that it is pretty likely there were WMD that were hidden or that were moved out of the country." Ross: "The tapes reveal in their own words Iraqi efforts to hide information about weapons of mass destruction, from the UN inspectors in the 1990s." Charles Duelfer, who "led the official US search for weapons of mass destruction after the war, says the tapes show extensive deception, but don't prove there are weapons still hidden in Iraq." Duelfer: "What they do is support the conclusion that the regime had the intention of building and rebuilding weapons of mass destruction." Ross: "In fact, Saddam's aides can be heard on the tape telling him they stand ready to resume work."

The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 10, 0:40, Martin) reported there are "about two CDs worth of audio recordings of Saddam meeting with his senior advisers in the 1990s. They're just now surfacing publicly, but intelligence officials say they've had them for some time and they contain no revelations about weapons of mass destruction. On the recording, Saddam seems obsessed with hiding his weapons programs from UN inspectors, but we now know what he was really hiding was that he didn't have any weapons of mass destruction, a fact he was trying to hide because he thought it made him more vulnerable to invasion."

NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 4, 0:40, Williams) reported, "On another tape, Saddam says, 'It is possible in the future to see a booby trap and the explosion turns out to be nuclear, germ or chemical.' US intelligence analysts tell NBC News do not prove Saddam had any weapons of mass destruction when the US invaded Iraq back in 2003."

ABC News Nightline (2/15, Ross) reported, "Most revealing on the tapes are the ongoing discussions about hiding details of Iraq's missiles and weapons of mass destruction programs from U.N. Inspectors during the 1990s." Hussein's son-in-law "briefs Saddam on the Iraqi campaign of deceit, aimed at fooling U.N. inspectors." Translator: "We did not reveal all that we have. Not the type of weapons. Not the volume of the materials we imported. Not the volume of the production that we told them about. Not the volume of use. None of this was correct." Regarding Iraq's nuclear weapons program, the translation reads: "As for the nuclear, sir, we say we have disclosed everything. But no. We have undeclared problems in nuclear, as well." Former US weapons inspector Charles Duelfer "says the tapes show Saddam's fascination with such weapons and his extensive deceit. But offer no new proof of whether such weapons are still hidden in Iraq." Duelfer: "No, they do not. What they do is support the conclusion and report which we made in the last couple years, that the regime had the intention of building and rebuilding weapons of mass destruction, when circumstances permitted." Rep. Peter Hoektsra, chairman of the House Intelligence Committee: "You would think that it's pretty likely there were WMD that were hidden or moved out of the country." ABC News concluded, "And these tapes only serve to fuel the continuing debate about Saddam's true intentions. And whether he, in fact, did hide weapons of mass destruction. There's enough in these tapes to help both sides bolster their arguments."

Defense Intelligence Reexamining Iraq WMD Evidence. The New York Sun (2/16, Lake) reports, "The CIA, FBI, and directorate of national intelligence have resisted calls from Congress to reopen the hunt" for WMD in Iraq. Yet "an interagency outfit known as the Media Exploitation Center, administered by the Defense Intelligence Agency, last month started its own search of these materials to attempt to discover the location of the weapons of mass destruction." One congressional aide said, "There are elements in NSA and DIA that believe there is enough evidence to warrant further re-examination and a relook at all the material. … This includes the imagery, documents, and human sources. They also think a more extensive debriefing of knowledgeable human sources and third party nationals is in order." Rep. Peter Hoekstra "has also been pestering the directorate of national intelligence to translate and make public what he claims are nearly 36,000 boxes of captured documents and materials from Iraq that may shed clues on the WMD front." The Pentagon "now appears to be working on the directorate to make other Iraq files public as well. A February 6 letter from Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld to Senator Santorum…said Mr. Rumsfeld is working with the director of national intelligence, John Negroponte, to release Iraqi files sought from the Harmony database, which catalogs material on terrorism secured since September 11, 2001." But a DNI spokeswoman said, "Intelligence community analysts from the CIA and the DIA reviewed the translations and found that while fascinating from a historical perspective, the tapes do not reveal anything that changes their postwar analysis of Iraq's weapons programs, nor do they change the findings contained in the comprehensive Iraq Survey Group report."

In 2000, Experts Agreed That Saddam Wanted WMD. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (2/16, 90K) excerpts the February 3, 2000 edition of Voice of America's "On the Line," on which Roscoe Suddarth, president, Middle East Institute and former U.S. ambassador to Jordan, said, "I don't think [Saddam Hussein's] objectives have changed. I think he still wants to be the primary Arab power. And they have the resources to do it -- the second largest oil reserves. … He lacks the means, the military means, but he is dearly trying to reconstitute them. … He's trying to reconstitute, obviously, his weapons of mass destruction." Patrick Clawson, director of research, Washington Institute for Near East Policy, agreed, saying, "There are no indications whatsoever that Saddam has backed off in the least. After all, this is a man who has forgone well over a hundred billion dollars in oil income in order to keep up with these clandestine programs of weapons of mass destruction."

Terror Attacks Kill 16 In Baghdad. The Washington Post (2/16, A19, Hernandez, 744K) reports, "As Iraqi politicians debated the formation of a government on Wednesday, a wave of gun and bomb attacks killed at least 16 people in the capital, including five children. Three children were killed and two wounded when a bomb exploded outside the Karama primary school in the Saydiyah neighborhood of southeastern Baghdad, said Gen. Salman Hassan Shammari of the Iraqi police. A second roadside bomb killed two children and wounded four more in the Fadhl neighborhood, he said. It was unclear who detonated the bombs or why." The New York Times (2/16, Wong, 1.19M) and Los Angeles Times (2/16, Moore, 958K) run similar reports.

Influence Of Radical Cleric Al Sadr Increasing In Iraq. The New York Times (2/16, Worth, Tavernise, 1.19M) reports radical Muslim Cleric Moktada al-Sadr was a key figure in the election of Ibrahim al-Jaafari as Iraq's next prime minister. The election "was a crowning moment for Mr. Sadr, whose sudden rise to political power poses a stark new set of challenges for Iraq's fledgling democracy. The man who led the Mahdi Army militia's two deadly uprisings against American troops in 2004 now controls 32 seats in Iraq's Parliament, enough to be a kingmaker. He has an Islamist vision of Iraq's future, and is implacably hostile to the Iraqis closest to the United States -- the mostly secular Kurds, and Ayad Allawi, the former prime minister." The Times notes, "In one sense, his participation represents the realization of a central American goal: to bring populist, violent figures -- whether Sunni or Shiite -- off the battlefield and into democratic politics." His "new influence and his populist roots may even help achieve the American goal of a broad-based government that includes all of Iraq's sects and ethnic groups."

Shiite Faction Urges Greater Outreach To Sunnis. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Moore, 958K) reports, "Only days after deciding to nominate incumbent Ibrahim Jafari to continue as Iraq's prime minister, his United Iraqi Alliance coalition on Wednesday was showing signs of fraying." Al Fadila al Islamiya party leaders, who are "associated with radical Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr…threatened Wednesday to break from the dominant alliance if the UIA did not make more overtures to Sunni Arabs, restrain Shiite paramilitary groups and rule in a more collaborative style." While "legislators prepare to form Iraq's first permanent government since Saddam Hussein's ouster…the Fadila ultimatum suggested that Jafari's nomination…was causing tension within the Shiite-led alliance." And one Western diplomat said, "I certainly see the political will in the different corners and the appreciation for a national unity government. … I hear more people talk about cross-sectarian cooperation than I have ever heard."

WPost Urges Administration To Utilize Coalitions To Broker Deal For National Unity Government. The Washington Post (2/16, A26, 744K) in an editorial writes that Ibrahim Jafari's election means the Bush administration's job "will be still harder." His election "will complicate the task of forming a 'national unity' government." US ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad "is doing his best to promote a national accord that addresses the legitimate concerns of the Sunnis. … But given Iraq's powerful centrifugal forces, the ambassador could use more help, from Washington and beyond. The Bush administration has capably organized international coalitions to address the threats of Iran and North Korea; it has brought formidable pressure to bear on the Palestinians through the 'quartet.' … Now is the time for President Bush to mobilize that alliance, and every other bit of leverage he can muster. Iraq may not have another chance."

US Cavalry Regiment Model For Counterinsurgent Tactics. The Washington Post (2/16, A14, Ricks, 744K) describes the success the US 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment has had in completing "clear and hold" operations in Iraq. Recently, "the regiment has focused on breaking the insurgents' hold on Tall Afar, a town of 290,000. Their operations here 'will serve as a case study in classic counterinsurgency, the way it is supposed to be done,' said Terry Daly, a retired intelligence officer specializing in the subject." US officials "conducting an internal review of the three dozen major U.S. brigades, battalions and similar units operating in Iraq in 2005 privately concluded that of all those units, the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment performed the best at counterinsurgency, according to a source familiar with the review's findings." But it is unclear whether the regiment's "example can be followed elsewhere by American commanders in the country. The biggest problem U.S. troops in Iraq face is Baghdad, a city about 30 times the size of Tall Afar. With the current number of American troops in Iraq, it would be impossible to copy the approach used here, with outposts every few blocks."

WSJournal Applauds Australia For Pursuing Oil-For-Food Probe. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.11M) editorializes, "The rot from the United Nations' Oil for Food scandal has now reached Australia. But the good news is that that democratic nation has had the nerve to sort the wheat from the chaff -- and do it publicly." The Journal notes, "It's striking how Australia has been one of the few countries to have pushed the Oil for Food investigations to the extent of examining its own role. An Indian official lost his job after the Volcker report, and French and American prosecutors are investigating the matter in their countries. But China, Russia and Vietnam, to name a few -- have reacted with studied nonchalance. Saddam knew what he was doing when he put foreigners with political connections on his payroll."

US Soldiers Prepare To Fight "Long War" In Afghanistan. The New York Times (2/16, Kifner, 1.19M) reports that the 10th Mountain Division has prepared to continue not only their military mission in Afghanistan but also "a political one: to bolster the American-supported government of President Hamid Karzai." They are "developing a military ethos that goes beyond the tactics of past conventional warfare to a new age of ideological war." In interviews the soldiers and officers "spoke of the heightened language and cultural training they had instituted to meet the new challenges in a conflict against militant Islam that Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld recently referred to as 'the long war.'" Soldiers typically study "basic Islam and local mores for the duty of nation-building," but "the program here is particularly sweeping." The key to "the Army's strategy is the cultural awareness program. … In Iraq, many officers now believe, insensitivity to local customs in house searches, for example, created resentment that helped foster the insurgency."

In a second article on the 10th Mountain Division, the New York Times (2/16, Kifner, 1.19M) describes its history and how its role has changed to adapt to counterinsurgent tactics noting, "The Afghanistan campaign is often fought by the smallest units." Lt. Col. Christopher Cavoli said, "In a counterinsurgency, the calibration of force is critical. … The sloppy application of force ruins the cultivation of the populace."

Clinton, Oxley To Unveil Program To Educate Military Families About Fraud. The New York Times (2/16, Henriques, 1.19M) reports, "NASD will unveil today a financial education program it has developed exclusively for members of the armed forces and their families. The effort is part of the financial regulator's response to published reports about military personnel being widely exposed to deceptive and misleading sales pitches for insurance and other financial products." The program will be unveiled "at a news conference in the Capitol building with several senior members of Congress in attendance, including Representative Michael G. Oxley…who heads the House Financial Services Committee, and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton."

DOJ:

Gonzales Outlines Top Priorities For DOJ. The Washington Times (2/16, Seper, 90K) reports, "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday outlined six major priorities for the Justice Department at the start of his second year on the job: terrorism, violent crime, drug trafficking, cybercrime, government and corporate corruption, and civil rights. 'My goal is simple: Secure the opportunities of the American dream for all Americans and for future generations,' Mr. Gonzales said during a speech to Justice personnel gathered in the department's Great Hall. 'Keeping this charge is no small task, and it will require no small effort. And I am well aware that I can't do it alone. I will need your help. So, today, I'm laying out a set of priorities and initiatives to guide our work for the coming year. This plan will allow us to continue the progress you've already achieved -- most notably, four years without another terrorist attack here at home and a violent-crime rate that is at its lowest level in more than three decades,' he said."

WICS-TV Champaign, IL (2/15, 5:12 p.m.) reported, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales outlined the top priorities for the Department of Justice this year. Gonzales says the department will work to defend the country against terrorism and that he hopes the Patriot Act will serve as an aid to their efforts." A number of other stations around the country simply noted that Gonzales would be announcing the priorities, including WJLA-TV Washington, DC (2/15, 6:14 a.m.) and KNVX-TV Phoenix (2/15, 5:38 a.m.).

Gonzales Asserts Independence. Knight Ridder distributes a Chicago Tribune article (2/16, Zajac) that reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, whose first year in office has been dominated by issues connected to his earlier job as White House counsel, said Wednesday that he regards himself as independent of the Oval Office, but that he nonetheless remains a policy advocate for President Bush. … 'Sure, I have to be independent as attorney general,' Gonzales said in an interview. 'But I think people lose sight of the fact that for purposes of policy, I'm still on the president's team, and I feel a responsibility and I'm expected to act as a member of the president's team in connection with pushing forward the president's agenda.'" The Tribune continues, "Still, Gonzales said, 'if I believe something is wrong, I will tell the president of the United States that something is wrong.' … Gonzales said proof of his autonomy will be seen in his department's performance, particularly in cases brought by the agency's career prosecutors. 'No matter who you are, no matter what party you may be affiliated with, if you've done something you shouldn't be doing, we're going to go after it,' he said."

DOJ's Sex Offender Registry Program Receives E-gov Award. Federal Computer Week (2/16, Weigelt) reports, "Five federal information sharing programs, from a searchable national sex offender registry to health information sharing between departments, received Excellence.gov awards today from the Industry Advisory Council at a luncheon in Washington, D.C." Among the programs cited was the National Sex Offender Public Registry, "a Justice Department program that makes state and territory public sex offender registries available online."

Government Computer News (2/16, Thormeyer) reports, "By making state and local sex-offender information available and searchable through a single portal, the Justice Department made it easier for the public to determine whether registered sex offenders live in their neighborhoods." GCN continues, "Justice's work on the National Sex Offender Public Registry Web site not only has empowered citizens, but it also won the department one of the five Excellence.gov awards handed out Wednesday by the American Council for Technology and the Industry Advisory Council of Fairfax, Va. … Because the Excellence.gov awards this year focused on information-sharing between agencies and different levels of government, the portal was chosen because it contained sex-offender information culled from federal, state and local governments. … Users can search federal and local sex-offender registries by name, state, county, city, town or ZIP code."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Witness Admits To Previous Misleading Testimony. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Emshwiller, McWilliams) reports, "An attorney for Jeffrey Skilling won some concessions in federal court here from a government witness concerning the former Enron Corp. president's conduct in connection with the criminal fraud and conspiracy charges against him. However, the witness continued to insist that he and Mr. Skilling were involved in misleading the public about a key Enron business unit." The Journal continues, "The witness, Kenneth Rice, headed Enron's high-profile telecommunications unit in 2000 and 2001. Under government questioning Tuesday, Mr. Rice laid out a number of areas where he and Mr. Skilling allegedly gave out false or overly rosy information about the unit." The Journal adds, "Allegedly false statements about the unit, known as Enron Broadband Services, or EBS, are part of the wide-ranging charges against Mr. Skilling, who is being tried here along with his co-defendant, former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay. Mr. Rice's testimony has, so far, hardly touched on Mr. Lay. … Under cross-examination by Mark Holscher, one of Mr. Skilling's attorneys, Mr. Rice softened some of his previous characterizations of the former Enron president's actions."

USA Today (2/16, Farrell) reports that Rice "admitted on the stand Wednesday that part of his testimony to the jury the day before was misleading." USA reports that Rice "testified Tuesday that an early 2001 budget forecast predicted that his unit would lose $489 million for the year. After some internal haggling, Rice agreed to present management with a more optimistic forecast of $110 million in losses for the start-up unit. … Rice then testified that his boss, Skilling, insisted that losses at EBS couldn't exceed $65 million for the year. The two presented that figure to analysts and investors in March of 2001, allowing jurors to conclude that Skilling was presenting pie-in-the-sky goals as realistic business forecasts. … But under cross-examination by Skilling defense attorney Mark Holscher, Rice admitted that the early prediction of $489 million in losses at EBS was in itself unrealistic. Rice conceded that at budget time, he and others at Enron often engaged in a practice known as 'sandbagging,' in which managers set artificially low goals when negotiating with their corporate bosses. … Speaking of the impression he left on the jury, Rice admitted to Holscher that, 'It isn't fair for them to think that that was a reliable budget.'"

Spitzer To Fight Request For Grasso Deposition. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Lucchetti, McDonald) reports, "New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer will fight a request to be deposed by attorneys representing former New York Stock Exchange Chief Executive Dick Grasso in the matter of Mr. Spitzer's civil lawsuit against Mr. Grasso." The Journal continues, "In a legal memo sent to Mr. Grasso's attorneys, Mr. Spitzer argued that he cannot be deposed because he is a high-ranking government official and counsel to the plaintiffs in the case. … 'Like any lawyer for a party, Attorney General Spitzer cannot be asked to provide deposition testimony or to reveal work product,' Mr. Spitzer and his lawyers argued in a 15-page motion that also calls Mr. Grasso's motion 'absurd.'" The Journal adds, "Mr. Spitzer is also contesting a request for internal documents filed by former AIG Chief Executive Maurice R. 'Hank' Greenberg, who faces civil fraud charges stemming from Mr. Spitzer's probe of AIG's accounting. Mr. Greenberg's attorneys had requested emails and other evidence, including testimony from Mr. Spitzer or the member of his staff with the most detailed knowledge of the AIG probe. A state court judge will hear arguments on whether Mr. Spitzer needs to provide documents in the Greenberg case in late February and whether he needs to be deposed and provide documents in the Grasso case in mid-March."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Patriot Act Author Urges Dismissal Of Charges Against AIPAC Officials. The Washington Times (2/16, Seper, 90K) reports that Viet D. Dinh, who headed the Justice Department's Office of Legal Policy, is now a professor at Georgetown University Law Center, and "who helped write the USA Patriot Act," has added his voice to "defense lawyers in seeking the dismissal of charges against two former American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) officials accused of unlawfully disclosing national security information." He joined a motion "condemning the charges as 'a dangerous attempt by prosecutors to over extend to private citizens a statute which was intended to apply solely to government officials with access to classified information.'"

Prosecuting Citizens For Repeating Leaks Said To Run Counter To Democracy. Gary Wasserman, an adjunct professor of government at Georgetown University, where he teaches lobbying, writes in an op-ed in the Washington Post (2/16, A27, 744K), "This is an administration more horrified by leaks than torture." It "is applying to private citizens a never-used part of the 1917 Espionage Act. Its expanding secrecy powers threaten to paralyze public participation in making foreign policy," as "information is the lifeblood of policymaking. Expanding restrictions on information adds greatly to the power of the executive; criminalizing citizens' contact with that information adds even greater uncertainty." Also, "one argument for why autocratic regimes such as pre-World War II Germany and Japan have engaged in risky foreign adventures is that these narrow elites are not subject to the kind of outside review by knowledgeable people that exists in democracies." Democratic governments do not, "in general, 'authorize' the information citizens are allowed. Given enough information, citizens authorize and control their government. Or at least we used to."

At RSA Conference, Mueller Calls For Innovative Cybercrime-Fighting Effort. Under the headline "FBI Chief Asks Valley For Help," The San Jose Mercury News (2/16, Kuruvila, 268K) reports, "Computer hacking has evolved from a sport for geeks into a moneymaking tool for organized crime -- a trend so disturbing to FBI Director Robert Mueller that he came to San Jose Wednesday to ask for help from tech security experts. It was the first time a director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation had addressed the annual RSA Security Conference, a 15-year-old confab where the companies that build protective technology mingle with customers and discuss threats. Mueller's presence at the McEnery Convention Center was testament to the fact that just as the Internet has become a global growth engine for business, it also has become a global target for savvy criminals. Making matters worse, 'most' businesses won't report that they were victimized, Mueller said, making it more difficult for investigators to keep up with online criminals. Some fear publicity. Others fear that competitors will exploit their vulnerabilities. 'Maintaining a code of silence will not benefit you or your company in the long run,' Mueller said. 'In this world of globalization, we continue to build on one central theme, and that is of partnership.'"

Under the headline "FBI Director: Cyberthreats 'Fluid and Far-reaching,'" IDG News Service (2/15, McMillan) adds Mueller said that "the FBI must work with corporations and international law enforcement to help combat online criminal acts that are seldom reported. … 'Increasingly our cyberthreats originate outside of the United States,' he said. 'The once-clear divisions of jurisdiction and responsibility between agencies [and nations]...have been rendered obsolete by the fluid and far-reaching nature of today's threats.' … The FBI now has more flexibility to work with international law enforcement and is helping build relationships with those foreign agencies by putting operatives 'on the ground' in countries that may be hotbeds for cybercrime," said "Steven Martinez, the deputy assistant director for the FBI's Cyber Division, who spoke after Mueller. While the United States works with other countries on formal and treaty-level arrangements to speed up cooperation, FBI agents are endeavoring to develop direct ties to their counterparts in other countries, Martinez said." IDG adds, "Mueller also cited an FBI-backed initiative called IntraGuard that enables 3000 members…to share information with law enforcement on the latest cyberthreats. … Still, most law enforcement experts agree that the vast majority of cybercrimes go unreported to law enforcement, with fears of reprisals or adverse publicity creating what Mueller called a 'code of silence.' … But companies need to take a wider view of the situation, he said."

Under the headline "Companies Still Not Reporting Attacks, FBI Director Says," SearchSecurity.com (2/15, Savage) reports Mueller "urged the audience of infosecurity professionals…to share cybercrime data, promising that his agency will take steps to ensure their privacy. 'We certainly do not want you to feel victimized a second time by our investigation. … We won't release confidential data. We'll take steps to protect intellectual property,' he said. … 'No person, no agency, no company, no country can prevent crime and terrorism alone. … While challenges are growing each day, together we won't be defeated,' he said. The FBI has had success in investigating cybercrimes with help from the private sector, Mueller said. Among the cases he cited included collaborating with Microsoft and officials overseas to track down the suspects involved with the Mytob and Zotob worms. The agency also worked with the Red Cross, eBay and others to investigate fraudulent Web sites that exploited the Hurricane Katrina disaster." SearchSecurity adds, "Other top law enforcement officials echoed Mueller's remarks in a panel discussion held after his keynote. 'The most important people in fighting cybercrime are those of you here today,' said Arif Alikhan, senior counsel at the U.S. Department of Justice," and Deputy Assistant Director Martinez "said the agency's partnerships with the academic community and private sector are key."

Businessman, Former Atlanta Official Testify About Alleged Campbell Bribes. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/16, Warren, Scott, 430K) reports businessman Howard Sole "testified Wednesday in the corruption trial of former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell that his company dropped efforts to land a lucrative city contract after he was urged to break the law by paying $100,000 to the mayor's re-election campaign." Sole "was the second witness of the day whose testimony seemed to indicate Campbell's involvement with illegal money matters. Joseph Reid, former deputy chief operating officer, testified he passed campaign contributions directly to the mayor — some in cash." The Journal-Constitution adds, "Under cross-examination by defense attorney Fred Orr, Sole acknowledged he did not know if Campbell told" contractor Ricky Rowe "to solicit the money. … Reid, who was later convicted of corruption and served time in prison," testified that "he gave Campbell an envelope containing illegal checks for the mayor's 1998 runoff election that were written in the names of five Campbell family members. Reid also testified that on more than one occasion he gave cash campaign contributions to Campbell."

WXIA-TV (2/15, Carnes, King) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Wednesday, "Reid told the jury he often delivered those contributions directly to the mayor, including about $5,000 in cash. When it came to cash contributions, Reid said, 'He told me to give them to him.' Campbell says that he did no such thing. 'Never,' Campbell said. 'In fact he never said that in all of his ten interviews with the FBI.'"

Undercover FBI Agent Testifies About Cotton Bribes. WDEF-TV Chattanooga (2/15, Bennett) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Wednesday, "FBI undercover agent John Mule spent most of today on the witness stand. He posed as the Chief Financial Officer of the FBI's fake company E-Cycle. Mule says he first met former Hamilton County school board member Charles Love in December 2004, and Hamilton County Commissioner, William Cotton one month later. Jurors listened to an audio tape of a conversation between the three from January, 2005. Mule' wanted Cotton's help getting a resolution passed through the county commission. The three met at Southside Grill in late January, where Mule gave Love $3,500 in cash. … Mule said after the meeting, the county commissioner called to say thank you, acknowledging he received his shard of the bribe money." Jurors also saw video of a February 2005 meeting in which Mule' gave "Love an envelope with $6,000. When Love accepted the money, Mule' made it clear the money was for Cotton."

WTVC-TV Chattanooga (2/15, Grant) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Wednesday, "Today, jurors saw for themselves what happened when William Cotton, Charles Love and an undercover agent met in Nashville." Cotton "is the first person to be tried in Operation Tennessee Waltz. … The defense says there there is no proof that Cotton received ANY money. But the FBI says their secretly recorded videos prove otherwise." WTVC then airs clips from the FBI surveillance video shown at trial yesterday. The AP (2/16, Poovey) also reports on Mule's testimony, adding, "FBI agent Brian Burns testified Wednesday about a recording of a Jan. 16, 2005, conversation between Love and Cotton. Jurors also heard the FBI's recording of the commissioner telling Love that he would be attending a meeting of county officials and wanted to also get his counterparts in Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina and South Carolina to consider E-Cycle's proposal to recycle government computers. … Burns told jurors it wasn't illegal for Cotton to push E-Cycle to officials in other states. He said other segments of the recording show Cotton and Love scheming to hide bribes from E-Cycle behind a front company that would be set up in a building the commissioner owns."

Ryan Will Not Take Stand Until Next Week, If At All. The AP (2/16, Robinson) reports, "George Ryan won't take the witness stand at his racketeering and fraud trial until at least Tuesday and the former governor may not testify at all, his chief defense counsel said Wednesday." Defense lawyer Dan Webb added that he will call "as many as 11 character witnesses, including MASH actor Mike Ferrell, a forensic accountant who has been studying years of Ryan family finances and Edward McNally, former Ryan lawyer and now chief federal prosecutor for Southern Illinois." The AP adds, "Also Wednesday, defense witness Mickey Brown, a Chicago real estate lawyer, testified that there was nothing extraordinary about" codefendant Lawrence Warner's "ownership of buildings in Joliet and suburban Bellwood through a series of holding companies that made it difficult to see who the owner was. George Ryan leased both buildings for use by the state."

Former Chicago Water Employee Charged With Lying To Hired Truck Investigators. The Chicago Sun-Times (2/15, Warmbir, Novak) reported yesterday, "A former city Water Department employee, Frank R. Cannatello…was charged Tuesday with lying to federal agents last year when he told them he had nothing to do with a trucking company in the Hired Truck Program that was in his mother's name but bore his initials, FRC Trucking. … Cannatello's attorney, Richard Jalovec, said Tuesday that he expects his client to plead guilty when he appears before a federal judge on March 2." The AP (2/15, Robinson) added, "Among other things, prosecutors said Cannatello asked another city worker, Randy Aderman, to help FRC get city hauling work and Aderman did so through the water department. Aderman already has been charged in the investigation along with former city Clerk James Laski. Aderman appeared for arraignment before U.S. District Judge Charles R. Norgle Sr. on Tuesday and pleaded not guilty."

Entertainment Attorney Indicted In Pellicano Probe. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Krikorian, Blankstein) reports, "A federal grand jury today indicted prominent Los Angeles entertainment attorney Terry Christensen on wire-tapping and conspiracy charges in connection with the ongoing investigation of former private investigator Anthony Pellicano." The Times continues, "The two-count indictment alleged that Christensen paid Pellicano at least $100,000 to wiretap the wife of billionaire investor Kirk Kerkorian during a bitter child support dispute in 2002. Authorities charge that Pellicano listened to the phone calls of Lisa Bonder Kerkorian and shared the information with Christensen. … Christensen, 65, of Beverly Hills, is the first lawyer to be indicted in the Pellicano investigation, which has roiled the Hollywood and legal communities. … 'Pellicano would discuss with defendant Christensen how long the illegal wiretap should remain in place and when the illegal wiretap should be brought to an end,' according to the indictment." The Times adds, "When Pellicano allegedly turned over wiretap data to Christensen, he told the lawyer 'to be very careful about this because there is only one way for me to know about this,' the indictment states. … Christensen spoke repeatedly with Pellicano about the wiretaps, according to the indictment, hearing the 'exact words' spoken, directing Pellicano to listen to particular conversations, and then instructing Pellicano to 'wrap up' the illegal wiretap."

The New York Times (2/16, Weiner) reports, "Damage from the investigation of the celebrity private eye Anthony Pellicano reached the top of Hollywood's business community on Wednesday, when a federal grand jury issued wiretapping and conspiracy charges against the lawyer who handled Kirk Kerkorian's 2002 legal battle with his former wife." The Times notes that "Christensen, and his Century City-based firm are a major presence in the entertainment industry, having represented Paramount Pictures, Sony Pictures Entertainment, the Walt Disney Company and MGM/UA, among others. The lawyer has represented Mr. Kerkorian for over 30 years, once served as president of the 88-year-old billionaire's private Tracinda Corporation, and has been involved with Mr. Kerkorian's recent investment in General Motors. … In the surprise indictment — Mr. Christiansen had not previously surfaced in the long-running wiretap case, and was first contacted by the government only four weeks ago, according to a person who was briefed on the situation — officials charged that the lawyer paid Mr. Pellicano at least $100,000 to tap the phone of Lisa Bonder Kerkorian. Ms. Kerkorian, the billionaire's former wife, was then involved in a bitter legal dispute over the paternity of her young daughter and child support."

Police Using Homing Device To Cut Down On Dangerous Chases. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (2/16, Kohler) reports, "Is there a solution to high-speed police chases? … A company in Virginia is proposing one: a sticky dart with a homing device that police can fire at a fleeing car and track electronically at a distance." The Post-Dispatch continues, "Instead of pursuing the getaway car at high speed, police can lay back and set a trap for the fleeing car up the road. … The company believes its product, called StarChase, will save lives and reduce police liability by slowing some hot pursuits and stopping others altogether." The Post-Dispatch adds, "U.S. police departments, often criticized for chases, are interested. How it works - whether it works at all - remains to be seen. Police will want to know if they can use the device to arrest suspects they would have pursued with lights and sirens. … They'll also want to know if a fleeing driver will slow down without those lights and sirens on his tail. … Many eyes are now on Los Angeles, whose police are testing the device this year at the suggestion of the U.S. Department of Justice." The Post-Dispatch notes, "All police forces who struggle with high-speed chases should be watching, said Gilbert Moore, a spokesman for the Justice Department's Office of Community Oriented Policing Services. … StarChase will also be tested this year in a major East Coast city, said Trevor Fischbach, a StarChase vice president. He said the company hopes to begin selling it to police departments this year."

Judge Rules Defendant Has Right To Choose Attorney With Alleged Mob Ties. The New York Law Journal (2/16, Perrotta) reports, "An attorney with alleged ties to the Mafia can continue to represent a man accused of racketeering, extortion and three murders on behalf of the Gambino organized crime family, a federal judge in Brooklyn has ruled." The Journal continues, "The judge, Eastern District of New York Judge Jack B. Weinstein, also denied a request by several news outlets to obtain a copy of a video recording that captures a meeting between the attorney, Joseph R. Corozzo, and John Gotti Sr., the deceased head of the Gambino family, inside a prison medical center in Missouri." The Journal adds, "Weinstein said reporters, who saw the video during a recent hearing, could review it inside the courthouse, but could not broadcast it on television out of fear that it would prejudice potential jurors in the upcoming trial of Corozzo's client, Dominick Pizzonia. The trial is scheduled for June. … Pizzonia is an alleged Gambino captain accused of the Dec. 24, 1992, murder of Thomas and Rosemarie Uva, who had robbed several Mafia social clubs. … Pizzonia has known Corozzo since childhood and has insisted, throughout several hearings, that he wants to keep Corozzo as his lawyer, no matter the prosecutor's allegations of conflicts. … Weinstein himself has called the potential conflicts 'serious' and has warned Pizzonia of the dangers of continuing to trial with Corozzo as his attorney." The Journal notes, "Eastern District prosecutors raised concerns not just over Corozzo's alleged ties to the Mafia but his relationship to Michael DiLeonardo, a key witness against Pizzonia. In 2001, when DiLeonardo was being prosecuted on extortion charges in Atlanta, he asked Corozzo to interview another Gambino family member, Craig DePalma, to see if DePalma would testify against DiLeonardo. DiLeonardo gave Corozzo a check for $1,000, but Corozzo never cashed it."

Former FBI Mob Investigator Dismissed From Gotti Jury Pool. The AP (2/16) reports, "It would have been hard to draw a prospective juror less likely to get picked for John 'Junior' Gotti's racketeering retrial. A former supervisor of the FBI's organized crime squad in New York was among the pool of 250 prospective jurors who filled out questionnaires -- and among those quickly disqualified from serving on the jury of the son of late Gambino crime family boss John Gotti."

Texas Executes Man For 1992 Shooting Of Cabdriver. The AP (2/16, Lozano) reports, "Convicted killer Clyde Smith was executed Wednesday for fatally shooting a Houston cabdriver during a robbery in 1992. … 'I want to thank you all for being here and for your love and support,' Smith, 32, told friends who watched from a window." The AP continues, "Relatives of another cabdriver Smith had confessed to killing were present, but he did not acknowledge them. Relatives of the man Smith was executed for killing were not there. … He was pronounced dead at 6:17 p.m., seven minutes after lethal drugs were administered. His execution was the fourth this year in Texas." The AP adds, "Smith had confessed to the Feb. 7, 1992, death of 45-year-old David Jacobs, and to a similar shooting and robbery of another cabdriver, Victor Bilton, six weeks later. He later said the confessions were made under duress. … He was convicted of shooting Jacobs four times in the head and robbing him of about $100."

Trial Begins Today For Florida Deputy Charged With Falsifying Crime Reports. The Miami Herald (2/16, DeMarzo, 323K) reports, "After almost two years, one of six Broward sheriff's deputies accused of falsifying crime reports goes on trial today, amid skepticism over whether any of the cases headed to court will result in convictions." Christian Zapata "is the first deputy to face trial in the scandal that already has cost more than a half million dollars in taxpayer money. The outcome likely will set the stage for future cases -- and if anyone ultimately will go to jail. The scandal involves deputies who allegedly took crime complaints, then cleared or downgraded them to make themselves and their agency look better. In some instances, the cases were cleared by pinning them on people who could not have committed the crime because they were in jail -- or dead." The Herald notes, "The FBI, the public corruption unit of the Broward State Attorney's Office, and a private attorney hired by BSO have conducted investigations into the case-fixing. … But experts say it will be hard to prove that deputies purposefully altered the reports."

New York Man Sues Prosecutors After Exoneration. The New York Times (2/16, Kilgannon) reports, "A man whose attempted murder conviction was overturned after he served 12 a dozen years in prison is planning on filing a lawsuit charging that Queens prosecutors have withheld evidence and misled juries in a broad pattern of misconduct that has led to dozens of wrongful convictions." The Times continues, "The suit, which a lawyer expects to file today in federal court in Brooklyn, details 84 instances in which criminal convictions obtained by Queens prosecutors were reversed by higher courts for prosecutorial wrongdoing. The lawsuit says that the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown, and his predecessor, John J. Santucci, have not punished prosecutors for their misbehavior." The Times adds, "The suit accuses prosecutors in some cases of presenting false testimony by witnesses about their deals for leniency in exchange for cooperation, according to a copy provided by the lawyer filing the suit. It says prosecutors withheld evidence that could be seen as motivating witnesses to give false testimony, and also accuses prosecutors of making false or misleading trial presentations to juries."

Former DC Contract Advisor Debarred. The Washington Times (2/16, Mcelhatton) reports, "The D.C. government has barred a former consultant to the city's technology office from doing business with the District because he pleaded guilty to a criminal conflict-of-interest charge nearly three years ago." The Times continues, "John Izzard III, a former program manager at the D.C. Office of the Chief Technology Officer, was charged in 2003 with seeking about $36,000 from a vendor in exchange for helping the firm win D.C. government contracts, authorities said. … Mr. Izzard's duties as a private consultant at the technology office included recommending contracting actions to city officials, authorities said." The Times adds, "The panel, in a letter to Mr. Izzard last month, wrote 'there is no public purpose to be served for the District to contract with a contractor that committed a serious violation.' … The ruling bans him from city contracts or subcontracts until next year. … An attorney for Mr. Izzard yesterday said his client is considering whether to appeal the panel's decision."

WPost Scoffs At Police Tactics In Virginia Prostitution Probe. The Washington Post (2/16, A26) editorializes, "No doubt… selfless devotion to duty inspired detectives in Spotsylvania County's sheriff's department, who lately have been having sex with prostitutes in order to make cases against them. In one instance an officer even left a $350 tip for services rendered, which presumably sweetened the sting for the suspect in question." The Post continues, "According to an account by The Post's Tom Jackman, a Spotsylvania massage parlor known as Moon Spa was the target of one recent investigation. Undercover detectives who visited the spa received baths, massages and sex. In all, detectives, painstakingly thorough, made three such trips in nine days to the Moon Spa, each time paying a fee to the establishment as well as a tip. … 'This has to be done' to guarantee a conviction, Sheriff Howard D. Smith declared grimly, instantly ensuring himself a place as a laughingstock among police and prosecutors across the nation, who manage to secure convictions without engaging in sex with their suspects." The Post concludes, "Virginia drug laws contain an exception that specifically enables undercover cops to possess (and therefore buy) narcotics in the course of an investigation; there's no similar provision allowing for sex with prostitutes. As for the cops, they should find other ways to think of Spotsylvania."

Attorney Files Constitutional Challenge To Deficit Reduction Bill Over Typo. The Washington Times (2/16, Dinan, 90K) reports Alabama attorney Jim Zeigler has "filed the first constitutional challenge to last week's budget-cuts law, which he said is invalid because the House and Senate never passed the identical bill." Zeigler "said his challenge comes from the right -- as a conservative who is worried that the bill will hurt charitable giving to churches." The measure in question "reduced entitlement spending by $39 billion over five years. Because of a clerical error, the version that passed the House had a different time period for reimbursing medical providers for some medical equipment than the version that passed the Senate."

CQ (2/15, Dennis) reports Zeigler is "a conservative Republican lawyer who specializes in Medicaid cases," and he "filed the suit in U.S. District Court in Mobile, Ala., Feb. 13, saying the measure (PL 109-171) is not a valid law because it was not passed in identical form by both chambers." No hearing date "has been set, and it is unclear if Zeigler will be granted standing to bring the case. Several constitutional law scholars have predicted that if given the chance, the courts would rule that the act violates the bicameral clause of the Constitution, which requires both chambers to pass identical legislation before the president signs it into law."

Administration Using Federal Agency Rules To "Limit Consumer Rights." The Washington Post (2/16, D1, Mayer, 744K) reports the Bush Administration is "using federal rulemaking to limit consumer rights to seek damages under state laws governing faulty products." The Consumer Product Safety Commission "will vote today on a rule that would restrict such suits in the case of mattresses that catch fire, the most recent rule changes undertaken by several agencies. Last month, the Food and Drug Administration limited consumers' ability to recover damages for injuries from agency-approved drugs." Meanwhile, the National Highway Traffic and Safety Administration is "seeking to give automakers similar legal immunity from lawsuits over defective roofs if their vehicles meet new roof-crush standards. It is also proposing to limit consumer lawsuits in a rule that would address seat-belt requirements." Administration officials "say they are simply writing into rules a long-standing policy previously voiced in many friend-of-the-court briefs filed in lawsuits."

DOJ Settles Charges Of Trade Violations With Corporate Express. The Denver Business Journal (2/16) reports, "Corporate Express Inc. paid $5.02 million to the U.S. Department of Justice to settle allegations that it sold products to U.S. government agencies that were manufactured in countries not permitted by the Trade Agreements Act." The Journal continues, "The settlement resolves allegations that the Broomfield-based office supply company sold products from countries without reciprocal trade agreements with the United States, such as China and Taiwan." The Journal adds, "Van Hindes, a spokesman for Corporate Express, confirmed the settlement with the following statement: … 'Like other major distributors in the office product industry, Corporate Express recently settled differences with the U.S. government without acknowledging liability,' Hindes said." The Journal notes, "In 2005, Office Max Inc. paid $9.8 million to settle the same allegations with the Department of Justice. The department also reached a $4.75 million settlement with Office Depot Inc., a $7.4 million settlement with Staples Contract and Commercial Inc. and a $100,000 settlement with Caddo Design. … The settlements resulted from an investigation by the Civil Division of the Department of Justice, the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia and the General Services Administration's Office of the Inspector General. … 'Federal contractors will be held accountable for their violations of procurement regulations,' said Peter D. Keisler, assistant attorney general for the Civil Division, in a released statement."

Specter Predicts Another Vote On Asbestos Bill. Reuters (2/16, Cornwell) reports Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter said "the asbestos compensation bill he is co-sponsoring is 'very much alive' and that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist told him there would be another vote on it." The bill "to create an industry-financed $140 billion fund to pay injury claims lost a close Senate procedural vote on Tuesday evening." Specter's legislation is "backed by W.R. Grace and Co., USG Corp. and some of the 70 other companies pushed into bankruptcy by tens of thousands of asbestos injury claims. However, some smaller companies oppose a compensation fund, fearing they could be forced to pay more into it than they would face in private lawsuits." Specter said he "spoke with Tennessee Republican Frist on Wednesday morning and 'He (Frist) said he'd have another vote. He said he's looking forward to another vote.'" Specter added, "I consider asbestos to be very much alive."

Roll Call (2/16, Pierce) reports that despite "proclamations to the contrary from Senate GOP leaders, a controversial asbestos trust fund bill appears dead for the year following a crippling setback Tuesday night." Even if Majority Leader Frist "decides to bring the measure back up again — which is considered doubtful — sources on both sides of the aisle said it is improbable that the bill could survive a bipartisan filibuster." Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) "said he expected the measure to reappear on the Senate floor sometime after next week's Presidents Day recess."

CQ (2/15, Stern) reports the Senate asbestos bill "stands in legislative limbo. Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., insisted Wednesday that the bill (S 852), which was pulled from the floor Feb. 14 after a procedural vote failed, could still succeed." But Specter "said he does not expect another vote on the asbestos trust fund legislation until after Congress returns from its recess Feb. 27." Even then, Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., "may opt against taking up the troubled legislation, which could require weeks of additional floor time. Frist has already fulfilled his pledge to Specter to seek to bring the measure to the floor and carved out two weeks for consideration."

Congress Mulls Changes To Wartime Whistleblower Rules. The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Chaddock) reports, "Dissent often carries a price in official Washington, especially in the war years of the Bush presidency." The Monitor continues, "Since the Sept. 11 attacks, the number of insiders alleging wrongdoing in government - either through whistle-blower channels or directly to the press - has surged, as have reprisals against them. … That's the message from this week's congressional hearing on protections for national security whistle-blowers - the first in more than a decade. 'he system is broken,' says Rep. Christopher Shays (R) of Connecticut, who chaired the House Government Affairs subcommittee hearing." The Monitor adds, "Disclosures of flawed prewar intelligence, secret prisons and prisoner abuse, and warrantless surveillance by the National Security Agency have launched a debate on the conduct of the war on terror within Congress and the American public. Critics say some of those disclosures also compromised national security. … The struggle over dissent in dangerous times is not confined to national security matters, however. It appears to be settling deeper into the federal bureaucracy, where government scientists and even analysts at the scholarly Congressional Research Service - who are not actually blowing any whistles but who are staking out positions that deviate from the administration's - report efforts to control their contact with the press and public. … If whistle-blowers and others 'do not see an option for dissent within the system, then the system is in bad shape,' says Steven Aftergood, director of the Project on Government Secrecy at the Federation of American Scientists. 'Secrecy has become a growth industry.... It makes it harder for ordinary citizens ... to ask questions ... and to hold officials accountable.'"

Gonzales Says DOJ Will Broaden Program To Combat Housing Bias. The AP (2/16, Sherman) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pledged Wednesday to reinvigorate a program, which has been used infrequently in the Bush administration, to combat housing discrimination." The AP continues, "Test visits by department employees posing as prospective renters or buyers to rental agents and property owners suspected of discrimination will reach an all-time high in the next two years, Gonzales said in an address to employees in the Justice Department's Great Hall. … 'We will investigate suspected offenders with testing visits designed to expose discriminatory practices,' Gonzales said." The AP adds, "Since they began in 1992, the visits have resulted in 79 complaints. No more than 16 of those, however, were filed since President Bush took office in January 2001, according to the department's Web site. … The Justice Department's civil rights division declined to provide the exact number of complaints filed by the current administration or to say how many visits to landlords suspected of discrimination take place now. Spokesman Eric Holland said revealing the number of visits could tip off landlords to the prevalence of the undercover visits." The AP notes, "Gonzales, the first Hispanic attorney general, said his heritage drives his views about civil rights. But Gonzales and his civil rights unit have been criticized for not being aggressive in pursuing discrimination cases and for letting partisan politics influence decisions in voting rights cases. … The attorney general has denied any political interference and praised the civil rights division for what he described as "record levels of enforcement.""

US, Canada Bust Human Smuggling Ring At Border. The Detroit Free Press (2/15, Ashenfelter) reports, "In a case law enforcement officials say underscores the security threat at metro Detroit's international border, U.S. and Canadian authorities announced Tuesday they had smashed a ring that smuggled scores of illegal immigrants between the two nations to work in restaurants, brothels and sweatshops." The Free Press continues, "Officials said the organization posed a national threat because it was willing to smuggle anyone across the border for a price. As far as authorities know, however, no terrorists were among the more than 100 people who illegally crossed the border since December 2004. … The illegal immigrants -- from China, Albania, Iraq and Syria -- paid thousands of dollars each to be smuggled in both directions across the border, U.S. and Canadian officials said at a news conference in Windsor. … They were transported in cars, trucks, boats and even freight trains, sometimes in deplorable conditions, including subfreezing temperatures, authorities alleged. Most were headed for work in New York City, officials said. They also said most entered Canada first, were taken to safe houses in the Toronto area and driven to Windsor for transport across the border." The Free Press notes, "U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy III of Detroit said the investigation shows the importance of securing the nation's borders. … 'This stuff goes on every day,' Murphy said."

The Detroit News (2/15) reports, "Officials say it was one of the largest smuggling rings along the northern border to be dismantled by law enforcement in recent memory. … 'Those who smuggle human beings across international borders should realize that they will be met with an international united front of law enforcement agencies dedicated to stopping them cold and putting them in jail,' U.S. Attorney Stephen J. Murphy said." The News adds, "Since December 2004, U.S. officials say they have caught at least 78 illegal immigrants -- most of them Chinese -- attempting to enter Michigan in connection with this ring, which includes a nurse at Henry Ford Hospital in Detroit, a Windsor truck driver and the Albion owner of a restaurant. … A federal grand jury in Detroit indicted 14 people, and two others were charged in criminal complaints. Canadian officials charged seven others -- along with four of those also charged by U.S. officials -- with breaking Canadian laws."

The Canadian Post (2/16) reports, "Investigators said the migrants came from China, Korea, Albania, and Eastern Europe. … Canadian officials said 24 migrants were stopped entering Canada, while U.S. authorities said they intercepted 74 people being smuggled into the United States from Canada." The Post adds, "Seventeen people were arrested Tuesday in Toronto, Windsor, Detroit and New York City, the culmination of a two-year investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the U.S. Department of Homeland Security and the Canada Border Services Agency. … More arrests are expected as a total of 23 people are charged, with some facing charges in both Canada and the United States."

The Canadian Press (2/16, ROSE) reports, "Despite the large sums of money collected in the operation, Ontario residents alleged to have helped transport the migrants in the high-risk operation were paid only a few hundred dollars, the RCMP say. … 'The leaders, the organizers had these migrants to move across and they were the ones getting the bigger bucks, but they didn't want to take the risk, so they were paying local people involved in the Windsor and Sarnia area a few hundred dollars,' said RCMP Insp. Glenn Hanna. … They 'were naive and gullible and decided it was worth taking the risk for a few hundred dollars, not realizing how much was going in at the beginning of the pipeline, how much they were getting at their end of it, and how much they were being used.'" CP adds, "Despite the revelation of the smuggling ring, border officials say it is business as usual and there are no plans for any significant changes or crackdowns along the Canadian side of the 49th parallel."

Local Television. There was extensive local TV coverage of the news involving the breakup of a human smuggling ring. Some examples: WDIV-TV Detroit (2/15, 6:31 a.m.) reported on a "major bust involving a human smuggling ring. 14 people were arrested, accused of being smuggled into and out of the US from Canada. The suspects were hidden in trucks and on small boats and paid thousands of dollars to be involved. Arrests were made in Toronto, Windsor, Detroit, and New York City."

KCAL-TV Los Angeles (2/15, 9:16 p.m.) reported, "American and Canadian police say they busted an international human smuggling ring. People from several countries in Asia and Eastern Europe were transported both ways across the border with Canada and into Detroit by freight train." WJBK-TV Detroit (2/15, 11:02 a.m.) was just one of many Michigan stations also covering this story. Other stations outside of Michigan airing reports on it included WJW-TV Cleveland (2/15, 7:18 a.m.) and KAKE-TV Wichita (2/15, 6:19 a.m.).

DOJ Asked To Probe Deaths At Florida Juvenile Facilities. The AP (2/16, Kallestad) reports, "The mother of a 14-year-old boy said Wednesday that her son was murdered by guards who beat him at a boot camp for juvenile offenders in Panama City (FL)." The AP continues, "Bay County sheriff's spokeswoman Ruth Sasser declined comment because of the ongoing investigation into the Jan. 6 death of Martin Lee Anderson. The sheriff's office, which runs the camp, has said the boy was restrained after he became uncooperative. … 'My baby was murdered,' his mother, Gina Jones, said at a news conference. 'Don't let my baby's death be in vain.'" The AP adds, "Also Wednesday, the Legislature's black caucus urged the head of the Florida Department of Law Enforcement to remove himself from the investigation because he previously had been Bay County sheriff. But Gov. Jeb Bush said he remained confident in FDLE Commissioner Guy Tunnell and didn't plan to make any decisions until the formal investigation was completed. … Some legislators, however, weren't as confident in the investigation that already has taken about six weeks. Law enforcement authorities have resisted legal efforts by news organizations and others to obtain a video tape that two lawmakers said showed the beating." The AP notes, "In other new developments, the Florida Southern Christian Leadership Conference asked the U.S. Justice Department to investigate all deaths in Florida's juvenile system the last five years, including Anderson's. … Lawmakers and the NAACP also asked for arrests in the Anderson beating and called on Bush to appoint a special prosecutor."

FBI Investigating Alleged Civil Rights Violation By Texas Police. The Jasper (TX) Newsboy (2/15, Ellis) reports Kirbyville pastor Ted Williams on Monday addressed the Jasper City Council "and asked for assistance in 'getting some answers' from Jasper Police Chief Todd Hunter, concerning an incident in January that resulted in the arrest of his son Jeremy. … Williams said he and his son had met with Robert E. King, special agent with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, to determine if Jeremy's civil rights had been violated," and Williams said "that an investigation would be conducted with the results sent to Washington. Problems started with discarded wooden pallets that some JHS students were planning to use as fuel for the senior bonfire." Jeremy Williams "approached the students claiming that he had a contract for 300 pallets through FEMA. A disagreement and altercation ensued during which Williams…called 911 for the Jasper Police Department. Williams claimed that upon their arrival, officers used excessive force and that he was the only one arrested, even though he was the one attacked by the other parties involved."

Idaho Legislature Approves Gay Union Ban. The New York Times/Reuters (2/16) reports, "Idaho's Legislature gave final approval Wednesday to a measure that would bar all forms of "domestic legal unions" except marriage between a man and a woman." The proposed amendment to the state constitution "will now go up for a popular vote. Gay rights groups say the law would effectively bar any form of union that would allow same-sex couples to share rights enjoyed by heterosexual couples, like shared custody or insurance benefits."

New Jersey Supreme Court Considers Gay Marriage Question. The New York Times (2/16, Chen, 1.19M) reports, "Plunging into a contentious case of national interest, the State Supreme Court on Wednesday began weighing arguments about whether New Jersey should become the second state in the nation to permit same-sex marriage." Five "of the seven justices peppered lawyers for" both sides "with pointed questions indicating curiosity and concern. Legal scholars say that "New Jersey's high court…is particularly interesting because it has been considered one of the most liberal, and has also been unafraid to recommend solutions in other controversial matters…that some people argue could have, or should have, been done by the Legislature."

US Leads Global Air Cargo Price-Fixing Probe. The AP (2/16, Weber) reports, "More than a dozen airlines have now been drawn into a widening investigation by United States and European Union officials of whether there has been collusion in the air cargo industry to fix prices on surcharges for fuel, security and insurance." The AP continues, "Spokespersons for the European Commission, the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Bureau of Investigation refused Wednesday to provide details about the probe. … But one of the foreign airline's targeted, SAS AB's SAS Cargo in Copenhagen, Denmark, said the EU has alleged that cooperation among airlines began in 2000 and involved agreements about surcharges imposed by airlines to offset certain external costs. … Among the costs, according to a statement from SAS, are surcharges on fuel, added security after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the U.S. and premiums for war-risk insurance after the start of the war in Iraq. SAS said in a statement it does not suspect any violations at its operations." The AP notes, "In Washington, FBI spokesman Bill Carter said records in the case have been sealed and he referred further questions to Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona, who would say only that the investigation was ongoing. She declined further comment. … EU antitrust spokesman Jonathan Todd in Brussels, Belgium, when asked if there was also an investigation into collusion in setting fuel surcharges for passenger flights, said: 'I cannot make any comment on any other investigation that may or may not be going on. At any one time, the commission has several hundreds of antitrust investigations going on, of which only a small proportion are in the public domain.'"

Reuters (2/16) reports, "The investigation started on Tuesday when the European Union's executive arm and the U.S. Justice Department raided a number of air cargo carriers on both sides of the Atlantic, while other airlines were asked for information related to the probe. … The case could threaten to put a brake on recent growth in the $50 billion (29 billion pound) global air cargo market, which U.S. aircraft maker Boeing Co. has estimated will expand at an average annual rate of 6.2 percent in the next two decades, exceeding the expected growth rates of passenger traffic and the world economy." Reuters adds, "The alleged activity, mainly involving various surcharges such as for fuel and for security measures imposed after the September 11, 2001, attacks on the United States using hijacked airliners, has supposedly been carried out since 2000, SAS said. … War-risk surcharges that were applied after the U.S-led invasion of Iraq in 2003 were also involved, it said."

Reuters (2/16) reports, "Air Canada parent ACE Aviation Holdings Inc. said on Wednesday that Canada's antitrust agency is investigating carriers that provide international air cargo services in a widening of the global investigation of suspected price-fixing. … 'We did receive yesterday a letter from the Competition Bureau of Canada stating that it has begun an investigation into the activities of carriers that are engaged in the provision of international air cargo services to and from Canada,' Isabelle Arthur, spokeswoman for ACE Aviation, told Reuters. … 'We will co-operate fully with the Competition Bureau. It is our policy to conduct our business in accordance with all applicable competition laws,' she added."

Yonhap News (2/16) reports, "South Korea's antitrust authority said Wednesday it has launched a probe into local airlines after allegations emerged of their involvement in an international air cargo price-fixing cartel. … 'Investigators have been sent to (the headquarters of) Korean Air and Asiana Airlines,' an official at the Fair Trade Commission (FTC) said. The regulator, who declined to be identified, said the branch offices of Air France and several other foreign airlines have been searched. He did not say when the probes began or reveal when investigators visited the airline offices. … 'In order to conduct an effective investigation, we are carrying out the probes in conjunction with European and U.S. antitrust regulators,' the official said."

Reuters (2/15) reports, "United Parcel Service Inc. said on Wednesday it has been contacted informally by the U.S. Justice Department over a transatlantic antitrust probe. … 'UPS understands it is not part of the probe,' UPS spokesman Norman Black said. 'As is its practice, UPS will cooperate with requests from government agencies.'"

Recalls, Litigation Make Guidant-BS Merger Problematic. USA Today (2/16, Iwata) reports, "Boston Scientific triumphed last month in the fierce merger war for Guidant, outlasting Johnson & Johnson with a $27 billion offer. … But now Boston Scientific and Guidant, leading heart-device makers in the growing $250 billion market for medical devices and supplies, must ride out a legal and regulatory storm that could slow their deal, delay products and lead to costly court judgments and government penalties. The companies face investigations, product-liability lawsuits and warnings from the Food and Drug Administration to correct problems at their manufacturing sites." USA continues, "At the same time, Boston Scientific and Guidant — with a combined $11 billion in revenue, 30,000 employees and a dozen plants in the USA and abroad — must smoothly blend their operations. … 'It's a pretty complex juggling act,' says analyst Thomas Gunderson at Piper Jaffray. 'It adds a level of risk we haven't seen before.'" USA adds, "The merger clock is ticking. If the deal does not close by March 31, Boston Scientific must pay Guidant shareholders $4 million a day, Gunderson estimates. … Boston Scientific hopes to win antitrust approval soon from the Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission. … Meanwhile, the U.S. Attorney's Office in Minneapolis and the FDA are investigating Guidant's pacemakers and defibrillators, according to court records, patients' attorneys and Guidant's filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission. … As of December, seven people have died worldwide in incidents involving Guidant's Contak Renewal, Renewal 2 and Ventak Prizm 2DR devices, the FDA says."

Microsoft Slams EU In Antitrust Filing. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Cohen) reports, "Microsoft Corp. met a deadline to respond to European antitrust charges by attacking regulators, making it likely the U.S. software giant will be hit with new fines over a compliance dispute." The Journal continues, "The European Commission has 'ignored critical evidence in its haste' to impose daily fines of as much as €2 million, or about $2.4 million, against the company, Microsoft said. The Redmond, Wash., company said it already 'complied fully' with orders to help open software markets it dominates to greater competition. … But regulators said Microsoft had failed to provide workable instructions to rivals that want to write and sell software that can operate smoothly with Microsoft products. 'It is of course the European Commission that will decide whether Microsoft is compliant ... and not Microsoft,' regulators said in a statement."

Reuters (2/16, Lawsky) reports, "Microsoft today formally denied European Commission charges that could lead to 2 million euro (US$2.4 million) daily fines in an antitrust case, saying critical evidence had been ignored. … But the European Commission, in an unusual statement, said Microsoft had filed the evidence 11 days after a deadline in December - once the Commission had already issued a Statement of Objections to fine the company. … The Commission also said it is market-testing Microsoft's plans to offer access to source code, the blueprint for Microsoft's software." Reuters adds, "The Commission had given the US software giant until today to explain why it should not be fined for failing to carry out sanctions imposed in March 2004 for using its Windows software monopoly to muscle out smaller competitors. … The company was supposed to provide rival makers of server software with directions to allow their products to interconnect with Windows desktop machines as easily as Microsoft's own server software, used for work-group printer and other tasks. … The Commission said the directions were not workable but the company disagreed in its formal response."

The New York Times (2/16, Meller) reports that Microsoft "submitted a 75-page response to the commission, Europe's top antitrust authority, just hours before a midnight deadline." The Times adds, "On Dec. 22, the commission said Microsoft had not yet complied with its ruling. The agency said that 'Microsoft had not yet provided complete and accurate specifications of the interoperability information which it is obliged to disclose.' … Microsoft, however, said it had filed the technical documents to the commission by the Dec. 15 deadline. Those documents answered the remaining questions the commission had on the company's compliance, Microsoft said. … The commission, however, said it received nothing from Microsoft until after its public statement on the company. 'This documentation was actually supplied on Dec. 26,' the commission said."

The Financial Times (2/16, Buck) reports, "Microsoft also sought to turn up the heat on the Commission's technical adviser, the British computer scientist Professor Neil Barrett, whose scathing assessment of Microsoft's compliance efforts to date formed the basis for the regulator's charges. Mr Barrett dismissed Microsoft's documentation as 'totally useless' … Microsoft on Wednesday handed in a rival assessment that concluded that 'the inter-operability information . . . current industry standards' and provides 'complete and accurate information'."

The AP (2/16, White) reports, "An independent monitor had found that the documents provided by Microsoft last autumn needed a drastic overhaul. … Computer science professor Neil Barrett wrote a critical report about the company's efforts to comply with the EU's ruling, saying he and a colleague had been unable to use Microsoft's instructions to make rival software work with Microsoft servers."

Bloomberg (2/16, Newman) reports, "Today's filing includes two experts' reports that Microsoft said are independent. Five computers science professors evaluated the company's technical documentation and concluded that 'the interoperability information as provided by Microsoft meets current industry standards.' … 'We believe that it has provided complete and accurate information, to the extent that this can be reasonably achieved, covering protocols, dependencies and implicit knowledge,' the experts said in a 49-page report, according to Microsoft. … The commission's own independent trustee, hired to monitor Microsoft's compliance, came to the opposite conclusion. In a Nov. 30 report, computer scientist Neil Barrett, said: 'Overall the process of using the documentation is an absolutely frustrating, time-consuming and ultimately fruitless task. The documentation needs quite drastic overhaul before it could be considered workable.'"

CNET News (2/16, Marson) reports, "Microsoft also claimed that is has not been given enough time to respond to the commission's concerns and has therefore been 'denied due process in defending itself.' … 'The commission waited many months before informing Microsoft that it believed changes were necessary to the technical documents and then gave Microsoft only a few weeks to make extensive revisions,' the Microsoft filing states."

Dow Jones (2/16) reports, "Microsoft and the European Commission have battled over antitrust issues since 1998. In March 2004, the Commission fined the company a record EUR497 million and ordered it to change some of its business practices. … Since then, Microsoft has produced a version of its ubiquitous Windows operating system without a built-in media player. Concerns about rivals' software programs working with Windows-based servers - an issue known as interoperability - remain unresolved and are the basis of the Commission's December complaint."

Italian Regulators Fine Eni $345 Million For Competition Violations. Italian Antitrust Regulators Fine Eni For The AP (2/16) reports, "Italian antitrust regulators are fining energy giant Eni SpA 290 million euros ($345 million) for abusing its dominant position by 'hindering the entrance of independent operators' on the national market for natural gas." The AP continues, "The authority also said Wednesday in a statement on its Web site that it had ordered Eni to end its "competition-distortion conduct" by turning over to third parties the capacity for the additional transport of 227.5 billion cubic feet of gas annually from Algeria through the Eni-controlled Trans Tunisian Pipeline Company by Oct. 1, 2008." The AP adds, "Eni, the nation's dominant oil and gas company, said it would study the authority's reasons for the fine in deciding whether to appeal. … In a statement, Eni said it had recently given the authority 'some pro-competition measures' consisting of 'gas pipeline development to be undertaken in the shortest technical time.' … The authority's decision comes amid the politically sensitive issue of higher natural gas prices for Italian consumers, as the country deals with recently reduced gas supplies from Russia."

Hospitals Resisting Bush Proposal To Disclose Prices. The Hill (2/16, Young) reports the Bush Administration's "seemingly straightforward proposal to ask hospitals, doctors and other medical providers to disclose their prices is encountering some early resistance." Lobbyists for the hospital industry "left a meeting with National Economic Council Director Allan Hubbard at the White House on Tuesday concerned that they would be muscled into participating in the program." In a memo to his board of directors, Federation of American Hospitals President Chip Kahn said, "It is too early to tell whether or not the Administration will stick to their guns on the agenda that Hubbard laid out, but at this point we have to take their apparent determination to enter the health policy arena seriously." The Hill adds the White House "wants the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) to implement and oversee a voluntary program that would publicize the prices healthcare providers charge for their services. HHS Secretary Mike Leavitt will take the lead on working out a deal to get providers on board." The White House "appears prepared to push its healthcare agenda aggressively."

Cerberus Group Leads Bidding For GMAC Stake. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Berman, Pulliam) reports, "A group led by Cerberus Capital Management and Citigroup's private-equity arm is the leading bidder for the majority stake in General Motors Acceptance Corp. that its parent, General Motors Corp., is shopping to prospective buyers, people familiar with the matter said." The Journal continues, "While a separate bidding group led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Wachovia Corp. hasn't fully dropped from the running, GM is spending the bulk of its time negotiating with the Cerberus group, these people noted." The Journal adds, "Financial details couldn't be learned last night. GMAC, which writes loans on cars, homes, college tuition and other things, has been valued by many analysts at roughly $11.5 billion, the unit's book value. A final price could nonetheless vary substantially, based on how a deal is structured. GM may still choose, for instance, to sell off parts of the GMAC business and keep the auto-finance business intact. … Completing a deal will be difficult for any buyer, given the legal and financial issues surrounding the separation between GM and the financing arm. The company originally announced a possible sale in October, but the response from potential buyers has been tepid largely because of the complexity and scale of a transaction. … Despite those concerns, Cerberus has emerged as the most eager potential buyer, say people familiar with the transaction. The New York investment fund, which prides itself on secrecy, has taken stakes or control in dozens of companies over the past decade. In recent months, it was part of a group that signed a deal to purchase supermarkets from grocery chain Albertson's Inc."

BlackRock-Merrill Merger Talks Examined. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Berman, Smith, Lauricella) reports, "Money manager BlackRock Inc. was in the midst of deal discussions with Morgan Stanley on Jan. 17, when the heads of BlackRock and Merrill Lynch & Co. met at the Three Guys coffee shop near their homes on Manhattan's Upper East Side. … Merrill had caught wind of the BlackRock-Morgan talks. And days before, a meeting was discreetly set up between Merrill Chief Executive Stan O'Neal and BlackRock Chief Executive Laurence Fink. Over canned grapefruit juice and a bowl of Raisin Bran, Mr. O'Neal explained his point of view." The Journal continues, "Unlike Morgan Stanley Chief Executive John Mack, Mr. O'Neal said he would be willing to combine the two companies' money-management operations in a way that would leave BlackRock with control of the new firm. … As long as Merrill still had a meaningful partnership role, Mr. O'Neal was willing to swap a business that produced 60% of the combine company's profits for just a 49% ownership stake. Now, with the Morgan Stanley talks stalling over control and price, Mr. Fink's plans began to change." The Journal adds, "That meeting kicked off what became known as 'Project Trident,' a $9.8 billion exchange that would transform BlackRock into one of the world's biggest money managers. It will also reshape how Merrill, which has the largest army of 15,160 brokers, sells the mutual funds that are the staples of household finances across the country. … For the deal-averse Mr. O'Neal, it represents the largest transaction in his four-year tenure, and the best chance to squeeze more growth from his $525 billion money-management unit, which offered its first mutual fund back in 1969."

Phone Company Control Of Internet Debated. USA Today (2/16) editorializes, "In the history of great ideas, the Internet will surely rank near the top. In a relatively short time, it has made vast amounts of information searchable, sortable and readily available with a few key strokes. … Much of the Internet's appeal is that no one controls it in the way that, say, a grocery store decides which brands to stock. Within its virtual walls, a start-up such as MySpace or Craigslist can surge to prominence entirely on the power of an idea." USA continues, "Now, some very old-school companies want to change all that. Using market dominance achieved through the relative scarcity of lines into people's homes, phone companies such as BellSouth, Verizon and AT&T are eyeing a system that would demand that operators of search engines, e-commerce sites and other Web applications pay them fees or be relegated to the slow lane." USA adds, "Competition might keep the phone companies from putting the squeeze on website operators. That would be the best outcome. But consumers in many parts of the country have little choice in broadband, so Congress is appropriately exploring legislation that would lay out a principle of "Net neutrality" that would require all websites to receive equal access. … Telecommunications companies say they are not altering the Internet, merely offering a new ultra-high-speed tier of service on top of it. Don't be fooled. Once they begin choosing search engines, auction sites and other applications for their premium service, they alter the entire competitive landscape. … In this new world, companies would have to spend more time kowtowing to the likes of AT&T and less time innovating. That doesn't sound like such a great idea."

In an op-ed in USA Today (2/16), Walter McCormick, president and CEO of the United States Telecom Association, writes, "Local telecommunications companies have a 150-year tradition of connecting people with each other. As we invest billions of dollars in new, advanced broadband networks, our commitment remains the same: We will connect you to whomever you choose, and we will not block, impair, or degrade any content, applications or services. The Internet freedom you have today, you will have tomorrow." McCormick continues, "Government has kept its hands off the Internet, and it has flourished. Telecom companies have not sought to hinder the Internet's growth — indeed, just the opposite: We have invested, grown and expanded the networks that make up this extraordinary resource. Today's DSL, cable, wireless and satellite companies vigorously compete to offer a faster, more robust Internet experience. … Consumers are in control via new pricing and service packages being made available everyday — witness AT&T's announcement of $12.99-per-month DSL access. Consumers expect and demand Internet freedom. If telecom companies don't provide it, they will do business with someone else." McCormick concludes, "No one in today's debate opposes Internet freedom. We differ only in this: We do not believe that now is the time to close the chapter on Internet innovation and progress by turning to government-managed competition and central planning, no matter how well-intentioned. … Those who invest in advanced fiber, wireline and wireless broadband networks should be free to offer new services, and new pricing and service options, in a marketplace characterized by robust competition and consumer choice."

Pombo Opens Probe Of Oil Company Leases. The New York Times (2/16, Andrews, 1.19M) reports that Rep. Richard Pombo has begun a broad investigation of an Interior Department program "that is expected to give billions of dollars in benefits over the next five years to companies that pump oil and gas on federal territory." In a letter on Wednesday to Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton, Pombo "demanded memos, correspondence and data on the program and on the negotiations over the law that created it in 1996." Pombo "said he was beginning the investigation in response to an article published on Tuesday in The New York Times." He "made it clear that a primary purpose of his investigation was to attribute much of the problem to decisions by the Clinton administration to sweeten the incentives in 1998 and 1999. But Jennifer Zuccarelli, a spokeswoman for Mr. Pombo, said the letter to Ms. Norton 'is only the beginning of what the chairman believes will be a broad investigation.'"

ATF Using Tested Strategies In Alabama Church Fire Probe. WHNT-TV, News 19, Huntsville, AL (2/16, Woodard) reports, "The ATF has set up phone lines, hoping to get information on the Alabama church fires. Early Tuesday morning, agents got a tip from Choctaw County about a suspicious vehicle near a Baptist church and another involved in an accident. Tom Crowley of the ATF says, 'Everything fit, it looked promising, it was something that needed to be checked out, and we'll continue to check out anything that comes in.' … That tip turned out to be a false alarm." WHNT-TV continues, "Law enforcement at all levels have been asking for help since the church fires began back on February third. Ten Baptist churches in five Alabama counties have been damaged or destroyed by arsonists. ATF Regional Director Jim Cavanaugh says, 'We're not magicians, we're policemen, we have to work through it as we go.' … ATF used tips and a suspect call-in number to help solve the D.C. sniper case. The agents used a command post, like the one at the Tuscaloosa airport, to help capture and convict Eric Rudolph. They hope old strategies and new tips will lead them to the two white males in the dark-colored sport utility vehicle. Cavanaugh says, 'We're getting good calls, suspicious activity, matches the description, people calling in saying who the team is.'"

Probers Demonstrate Investigative Techniques. WAFF-TV, Huntsville, AL (2/16) reports, "To better explain how the ATF is investigating the ten Alabama church fires, one investigator walked WAFF 48 News through the steps they're taking to solve the crimes." WAFF-TV continues, "Caesar is a specially trained black Labrador retriever and one of the first agents inside a burned building. … With guidance from his partner in crime, Tony Deversa, Caesar knows exactly what to do. … Caesar searches high and low while investigators like Deversa take inventory inside and out. … Searching seemingly for the impossible, where every piece of evidence is burned beyond recognition." WAFF-TV adds, "The goal in every fire investigation is to find an area of origin, which can often indicate a potential ignition source. … For the church arsons, authorities used those same methods and determined the fires started at the pulpit area. … From there, investigators scan for the burned area that's lowest to the ground."

San Diego City Employees Facing Drug Charges Linked To Local Gang. The AP (2/15) reports that officials say two San Diego city employees arrested last month on drug and weapons charges were leaders of a local street gang. Ralph Briggs, 43, and James Woods, 38, "were arrested Jan. 17 on state charges of selling and possessing cocaine and weapons allegations as part of a six-month undercover investigation, according to Misha Piastro, a spokesman for the federal Drug Enforcement Administration in San Diego. Briggs and Woods worked in the San Diego Parks and Recreation Department's ground and maintenance division. Woods also is accused of selling marijuana on the job, prosecutor Damon Mosler said. … Briggs and Woods were the leaders of a local cell of the Syndo Mob, short for Syndicate, and their arrests eliminated the cell, Piastro said. The Syndo mob is affiliated with the Bloods, a nationwide street gang. … The two men, who are half-brothers, have been suspended without pay." More than 30 news outlets published in newspapers and/or posted on their Web sites the AP story, including The Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, New York Newsday, Kansas City Star, and San Jose Mercury News.

The San Diego Union Tribune (2/15) reports, "Nine people linked to a notorious street gang have been arrested after a six-month undercover probe into a suspected drug trafficking operation in San Diego, authorities have announced. Two of those arrested during raids over past weeks previously were publicly identified as San Diego Park & Recreation Department employees accused of using city vehicles to deal drugs." With the culmination of the probe, called Operation Southern Strike, John S. Fernandes, special agent in charge of the San Diego office of the Drug Enforcement Administration, "said he hoped it would send a strong signal that gang membership and drug dealing are dead ends. 'The DEA is committed to working hand in hand with local authorities to confront drug dealers and gangsters who perpetrate crime and violence in our cities,' he said. Recent criminal activities by the gang prompted the DEA to set up a task force comprised of DEA agents, members of the San Diego County Sheriff, District Attorney's Office, California Highway Patrol and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms to target the Syndo Mob and its associates."

Trial Begins For Philadelphia Drug Dealer Accused Of Murdering Witness. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/16, Slobodzian, 423K) reports former FBI most-wanted suspect Felix Summers, "already acquitted of two murders," went on trial yesterday "on charges involving the 1999 killing of a potential witness against him. Assistant District Attorney Carlos Vega called the murder of 39-year-old Charlotte Presley 'a crime that cuts to the core of the court system.' … Authorities say Summers…a former South Philadelphia drug dealer, was the gunman who went to Presley's third-floor apartment in…1999, and shot her. Defense attorney Jack McMahon told the jury Summers was the victim of mistaken identity compounded by the wrath of a 'woman scorned' -- a former girlfriend trying to get even by fingering Summers for a crime he did not commit. Complicating yesterday's first day of the retrial: Sherrie Hewett, the former girlfriend who gave Summers his nickname, failed to appear at court as subpoenaed."

DEA Helps Investigate One Of Michigan's "Longest-Running" Criminal Enterprises. Lansing (MI) State Journal (2/16) reports, "Authorities on Wednesday said they have dismantled a Lansing drug ring that had been dealing heroin and crack cocaine since the early 1980s. It was one of the longest-running criminal enterprises in the history of western Michigan, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Courtade, who headed the prosecution. The U.S. District Court's Western Michigan region encompasses Lansing and everything west, as well as the Upper Peninsula. 'It wasn't the biggest, but it was certainly one of the longest in existence,' he said, adding that it was run like a family business. Two Lansing men were convicted Monday in federal court for their roles in the ring that included at least a dozen others — many of them related. The organization supplied heroin and cocaine in the Lansing area for more than two decades. … Prosecutors said the close-knit nature of the relationship between the buyers and the family members selling them the drugs made the case difficult for authorities to break. The investigation was conducted by the ATF's Lansing office, Lansing police and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration."

WLNS-TV, Lansing, Michigan (2/16) reports on its Web site, "Lansing police say they've shut down a major heroin ring in the city, and just this week a grand jury indicted the last of fourteen dope dealers. The evidence of drugs and firearms show the magnitude of the operation. The Lansing Police Department says 14 people -- mostly from the same family -- have been delivering large amounts of heroine and cocaine for nearly four years."

WILX-TV, Lansing (2/16) reports on its Web site, "The ringleader, 49-year-old Lionel Beard of Lansing, was convicted this week of running a criminal operation, dealing drugs and for being a felon in possession of guns. His younger brother, 34-year-old Thomas Beard of Meridian Township, was convicted by the same federal jury for weapons possession and dealing. With the Beard ring out of action, police officials say they've noticed a dip in heroin trafficking in the city."

City Council In California Prevents Businesses From Distributing Medical Marijuana. The AP (2/15) reports, "San Marcos became the first city in San Diego County to ban businesses from distributing medical marijuana. The ordinance tentatively approved Tuesday by the San Marcos City Council allows the only medical marijuana dispensary in the city north of San Diego to remain open if it follows all applicable laws. But what those laws are remains unclear. Federal law bans marijuana, but in 1996, California voters approved Proposition 215, which legalized marijuana for medical purposes. San Diego County has defied the state-ordered program and filed a legal challenge to the voter-approved law. San Marcos' lone marijuana dispensary is owned by Legal Ease Inc., which said it only sells the drug to people with valid prescriptions from doctors." The AP adds, "In December, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration raided the business along with 12 others in San Diego after undercover agents said they were able to buy marijuana without a prescription. The DEA said Legal Ease remains under investigation."

Bolivian Coca Farmers Call For Expulsion Of US Anti-Drug Units. The Washington Times (2/16, Arostegui) reports, "A coalition of coca farmers led by Bolivian President Evo Morales is calling publicly for the immediate expulsion of U.S. counternarcotics units from the country, raising questions about the viability of U.S. programs. The move, placing further strain on tense relations with the United States, came late Tuesday at a meeting of six dominant coca-growing federations with Mr. Morales presiding. However, the president appeared to back away from the resolution in an address to the armed forces yesterday afternoon, saying, 'As long as Bolivia's sovereignty is respected, no international organism will be expelled from Bolivia.' The resolution would affect the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the State Department's Narcotics Affairs Section and the Alternative Development Program run by the U.S. Agency for International Development to help farmers develop alternative crops. … U.S. Ambassador David N. Greenlee met last week with newly appointed counternarcotics officials, including Felipe Caceres, the vice minister for social defense, and Felix Barra, who heads the Alternative Development Program, since renamed the Program for Coca and Integral Development. … Mr. Greenlee expressed satisfaction with his talks and said there was 'room for understanding.'"

Venezuela's Daily Journal (2/16) reports, "Bolivian President Evo Morales said he will not expel U.S. anti-narcotics agents, as sought by the coca growers who helped propel him to power, but warned foreign officials operating here to respect the nation's sovereignty and dignity. … The president said Wednesday that Bolivia should foster friendly international ties and that foreign officials should be allowed to continue operating in the Andean nation as long as they respect its laws. … Under a bilateral pact, the United States provides financial, material and technical assistance to Bolivia in battling the cocaine trade. Part of the program involves the presence of DEA agents in the central coca-growing region of Chapare. Sources at the U.S. Embassy in La Paz [said] the request by…coca growers to boot the DEA agents prompted the mission to cancel a scheduled meeting with Bolivian anti-narcotics officials."

Wisconsin Man Sentenced To Five Years For Racially-Motivated Church Arsons. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (2/10, 266K) reported, "A 22-year-old Oconomowoc man has been sentenced to five years and three months in prison for trying to burn down two African-American churches, one in Milwaukee and one in Michigan. Daniel L. Dropik pleaded guilty in October to two counts of racially motivated arson of a church. … At the sentencing hearing Friday in federal court in Milwaukee, U.S. District Judge Rudolph T. Randa said he believes Dropik's actions 'were motivated by deep psychological and psychiatric problems.' However, the judge also considered the seriousness of the offense, particularly that Dropik set out to burn churches with largely black congregations. In addition to the prison term, Dropik must spent three years on supervised release and pay $39,697 in restitution." The AP (2/10) also reported on the sentencing, drawing heavily on the Journal-Sentinel story.

Richmond, VA, Gun Show Comes Under Federal Scrutiny. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (2/16, Mussenden) reports, "A crackdown on illegal firearm sales at Richmond-area gun shows led to a congressional inquiry yesterday into whether federal agents trampled the rights of gun buyers." The Times-Dispatch continues, "The organizer of an August gun show at Richmond Raceway Complex told a House panel that a large team of federal agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and city, state and county police patrolled the two-day show, harassing law-abiding gun buyers while looking for illicit gun sales. … Annette Gelles of Showmasters, the organizer, told the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Crime that agents' aggressive tactics unnerved some attendees, and the visible presence drove away other customers. … 'hey impeded people's Second Amendment rights,'Gelles said after the hearing. ' think they were there trying to shut the show down. Why else would they bring that many officers? It scared away a lot of law-abiding people.'" The Times-Dispatch adds, "After noticing that guns purchased at shows -- which, unlike store sales, do not always require a background check -- were used to commit local crimes, the ATF, Richmond and Henrico County police and Virginia State Police joined to strengthen oversight of gun-show firearm sales. … Representatives of the four agencies were not invited to the hearing. … The ATF is scheduled to present its side of the story at a hearing Feb. 28, said subcommittee chairman Rep. Howard Coble, R-N.C."

New York Launches Strategy To Curb Gun Dealers. The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Marks) reports, "New York and other major cities are preparing to take on Congress and the gun lobby. … The reason: They're tired of their streets being flooded with guns bought somewhere else. In New York City, for instance, 85 percent of the guns used in crimes are bought legally in other states with far less stringent gun-control laws, most of them in the South." The Monitor continues, "Other East Coast metropolises, from Boston to Washington, face a similar gun influx. And so, despite a recent federal law that protects gun dealers and manufacturers from litigation, city leaders have signaled the start of a national movement to sue out-of-state gun dealers they consider 'bad apples' - those who knowingly sell to so-called straw buyers and others who traffic in illegal guns. … 'Right now, about 1 percent of gun dealers account for almost 60 percent of guns used in crimes nationally,' New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg said in his recent State of the City address. 'This year, we are going to launch lawsuits against these irresponsible dealers, and we are going to hold them accountable for the terrible damage their guns cause.' … That is a central part of his five-pronged strategy to attack gun violence in New York. It also includes toughening penalties for possession of illegal guns, intensive interrogating of suspects toting illegal guns so the source of the weapons can be better traced, and setting up a gun-offender registry similar to the ones set up for sex offenders so communities can know if a convicted gun offender lives in the neighborhood. … But the legal assault on gun dealers is the action expected to gain the most attention, and support, from other cities. Boston Mayor Tom Menino has already signaled he intends to join New York in its direct challenge to lawmakers in Washington."

ATF Bomb-Sniffing Dog Dies After Fall At Basketball Game. The Houston Chronicle (2/16, Hanson) reports, "An explosives sniffing dog died this morning after falling from a ramp at the George R. Brown Convention Center in downtown Houston." The Chronicle continues, "The dog, Mikey, was part of a U.S. Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives unit involved in a security sweep of the convention center in preparation for the NBA All-Star game, said Franceska Perot, spokeswoman for ATF." The Chronicle adds, "Perot said about 1:30 a.m. the unit was taking a break and the dog, a Labrador, was being put into the back of a truck when he suddenly bolted and went over the edge of a ramp. … The dog fell about 55 feet to the ground and was taken to a local veterinary clinic where he died. Perot said the dog, used for detecting explosives, may have seen a pigeon and instinct took over and he jumped at the bird."

Frist Calls Capital Gains, Dividend Tax Cuts "Non-Negotiable." In a Washington Times op-ed (2/16), Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist says the "one thing" that "must remain non-negotiable" in the conference for the tax cut bill is "an extension for the effective reductions in capital-gains and dividends taxes that Congress enacted in 2003." The "very existence of taxes on capital gains and dividends ranks among the worst provisions of America's labyrinthine tax system. Those who earn capital gains have already paid income taxes on their initial investments. When the government seizes a portion of profits earned as a company increases in value or issues a dividend, it penalizes saving, investment and risk-taking. The idea of taxing capital gains and dividends has deep flaws and, in time, we ought to eliminate both types of taxes altogether. For the moment, however, keeping them lower, longer appears a very good economic policy."

CQ (2/15, Schatz) reports Majority Leader Frist "warned the Senate's top tax writer Wednesday that he will reject the final $70 billion tax cut bill if it does not include an extension of the 2003 rate cut on capital gains and dividends." With formal conference negotiations "on the bill (HR 4297) set to begin, Frist also signaled that he would consider moving less controversial breaks separately — such as a "patch" to blunt the effect of the alternative minimum tax (AMT)." In a Feb. 14 letter to Finance Chairman Charles E. Grassley, R-Iowa, Frist said he "will not call up a conference report for Senate floor consideration if it does not include an extension of the capital gains and dividends tax relief."

Baucus Says 2006 AMT Fix More Important Than Expiring 2009 Provisions. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (2/16), Sen. Max Baucus says the Journal was "right on one count in your Feb. 9 editorial 'The Max Baucus Speed Bump': Cutting taxes is harder than it should be, at least when it comes to protecting America's working families from the alternative minimum tax. My so-called 'speed bump' on the road to extending capital gains and dividends cuts that do not expire until 2009 should be of little concern, compared with the brick wall toward which Congress is speeding: a huge 2006 tax increase for 17 million Americans the AMT should never snare. Congress should fix the AMT for 2006 now, and pass additional tax cuts Sen. Chuck Grassley (R., Iowa) and I have proposed for teachers, small businesses and individuals. Then we must work to repeal the stealth tax of the AMT altogether. I will gladly invoke Senate rules to keep Congress's eyes on the road toward immediate tax cuts for hardworking Americans who need them now."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

In TV Interview, Cheney Discusses Hunting Accident. Vice President Cheney, who has been criticized for his silence in the aftermath of his hunting accident, yesterday sat for an interview with Fox News' Brit Hume. Cheney took responsibility for the shooting of 78-year-old attorney Harold Whittington, and grew emotional when he discussed the accident and Whittington's injuries. As the CBS Evening News (2/15, lead story, 2:45, Axelrod) put it, for a "tough guy, not known for emotion, Dick Cheney looked somber and shaken." CBS also reported, "CBS News has learned that it was President Bush's political enforcer, Karl Rove, who finally got the Vice President to speak publicly about his hunting accident. And Rove pushed Mr. Cheney hard, worried that the story was moving from distraction to political problem."

While the coverage of Cheney's interview contains assessments of the White House strategy – and of Cheney's choice of Fox News for his interview – most stories are built around extensive excerpts of the Vice President's comments. Most reports this morning include this Cheney statement on Fox News' Special Report (2/15): "Ultimately, I'm the guy who pulled the trigger that fired the round that hit Harry. And you can talk about all of the other conditions that existed at the time, but that's the bottom line. And there's no -- it was not Harry's fault. You can't blame anybody else. I'm the guy who pulled the trigger and shot my friend. And I say that is something I'll never forget." Cheney also said "the image of him falling is something I'll never be able to get out of my mind. I fired, and there's Harry falling. And it was, I'd have to say, one of the worst days of my life, at that moment."

Cheney's explanation of why he didn't notify the White House press corps also gets a lot of play in the coverage. Cheney said on Fox News' Special Report (2/15), "My first reaction was not to think: I need to call the press. My first reaction is: My friend, Harry, has been shot and we've got to take care of him. That evening there were other considerations. We wanted to make sure his family was taken care of." Cheney added that Katherine Armstrong "suggested, and I agreed, that she would go make the announcement, that is that she'd put the story out. And I thought that made good sense." He added, "I had a bit of the feeling that the press corps was upset because, to some extent, it was about them -- they didn't like the idea that we called the Corpus Christi Caller-Times instead of The New York Times. But it strikes me that the Corpus Christi Caller-Times is just as valid a news outlet as The New York Times is, especially for covering a major story in south Texas."

Those two excerpts from the interview dominate much of the coverage. For example, USA Today (2/16, Jackson, 2.31M) reports a "somber…Cheney took full responsibility." Similar stories appear in the Baltimore Sun (2/16, Davis, 296K), which titles its report "Cheney Accepts Blame For Hunting Mishap" and Washington Post (2/16, A1, Baker, 744K), in a story headlined "Cheney Says Shooting Was His Fault." Reuters (2/16, Holland) reports Cheney "took the blame," adding that he acted "under pressure from Democrats and some Republicans to break his silence." The AP (2/16, Pickler, Brezosky) says "Cheney took the blame." Cheney "was soft-spoken and appeared shaken." Bloomberg (2/16, Rosenkrantz) and Knight Ridder (2/16, Hutcheson) run very similar stories.

The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Muskal, 958K), meanwhile, notes Cheney "praised" White House press secretary Scott McClellan "for how he handled the press. 'It's especially a tough job under these conditions and circumstances,' Cheney said." The New York Times (2/16, Sanger, Kornblut, 1.19M) reports Cheney "suggested in the interview that he had been advised by Mr. McClellan and Dan Bartlett, Mr. Bush's counselor and longtime communications adviser, to disclose what had happened more broadly and more quickly. 'I've got nothing but good things to say about Scott McClellan and Dan Bartlett,' Mr. Cheney said."

NBC Nightly News (2/15, lead story, 2:45, Williams) reported, "The Bush White House made an attempt at stopping the political damage by breaking four days of silence on the part of the Vice President." NBC (Gregory) added, "Until now, however, eyewitness Katharine Armstrong…and the White House have faulted Whittington for failing to alert Mr. Cheney that he was rejoining the hunting line after falling behind to search for a downed bird."

ABC World News Tonight (2/15, lead story, 2:45, Raddatz) reported, "The Vice President was unapologetic about the way this incident was handled. But he did take full responsibility for it." Raddatz: "Brit Hume, who conducted the interview, said the Vice President seemed shaken today, and found it difficult to speak about the accident." ABC added, "Cheney's description of what happened was markedly different in tone than the description offered Sunday by fellow hunter, Katharine Armstrong." The Washington Times (2/16, Sammon, 90K) also reports "the vice president's insistence on taking full responsibility for the accident marked a shift in strategy for the administration. Previously, the White House suggested that Mr. Whittington had violated a hunting 'protocol' by not making his whereabouts more clearly known to Mr. Cheney."

Most analysts agree the interview could go a long way toward defusing the growing controversy about the accident. ABC's News Nightline (2/15, Moran) called Cheney's interview on Fox News, "Personal, pained and decidedly unpolitical. … Tonight, many are saying the Vice President may have helped put out the political firestorm." GOP strategist Ed Rollins: "I think no one could have watched that interview, and would have seen the pain and anguish he has about shot accidentally -- a tragic accident. Shooting a friend. He has all the remorse anyone would expect."

The Financial Times (2/16, Daniel) disagrees, saying "Cheney's appearance on Fox News may be too late to limit the fallout. The accident, and his unapologetic stance, have become satirical fodder for late-night comedians. A man who prided himself on his hunting skills, he is now a footnote in the Texas hunting annals."

On ABC World News Tonight (2/15, story 2, 1:05, Vargas), correspondent George Stephanopoulos said, "The Vice President, if he had given this interview a couple days ago, would have prevented this story from exploding. He hit the right notes." Stephanopoulos added that as "long as his story is not contradicted by Mr. Whittington or the sheriff's report, and as long as Mr. Whittington doesn't take a turn for the worse, I think he's stopped the political damage."

On NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 2, 1:55, Williams), NBC Washington bureau chief Tim Russert said, "It depends on the health of Harry Whittington. If in fact he recovers fully and returns home, that will be very good news for everyone and probably will help end this story relatively quickly. If however, his health, God forbid, deteriorates, it will be ongoing." Democrats "have seized on this. They say it's a metaphor for the secrecy of the Bush White House, for the misjudgments made in Iraq and Katrina. Republicans have seized on it, saying it's a feeding frenzy by the White House Press Corps and it's time to move on."

The Washington Post (2/16, A1, Baker, 744K) reports, "White House aides and allies expressed hope that Cheney's public comments would defuse the uproar," but "Democrats continued to pound away. Even before the interview, the office of Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) issued a statement accusing Cheney of being 'unable, or unwilling, to level with the American people.' Sen. Frank Lautenberg (N.J.) added: 'Vice President Cheney had a chance to shoot straight with the American people, but he decided to stonewall and delay. Now that he feels forced to talk, he wants to restrict the discussion to a friendly news outlet, guaranteeing no hard questions from the press corps.'"

Under the headline "Accepting Responsibility, With An Asterisk," the Washington Post (2/16, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports, "President Bush in 2000 ushered in the Era of Personal Responsibility. Yesterday ushered in the Era of Qualified Personal Responsibility." Cheney "offered a stark claim of responsibility," but he also "admitted no fault in creating the four-day firestorm."

Other stories this morning focus on the "feeding frenzy" surrounding the incident. The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Feldmann, 61K) reports, "Right or wrong, the White House press corps has behaved like a dog with a bone over the story of Vice President Cheney's hunting accident." The Washington Times (2/16, Harper, 90K), meanwhile, runs a story titled "Critics Hit Cheney 'Feeding Frenzy,'" in which it says "Greg Mitchell of Editor & Publisher, a media journal, questioned the reporting. 'There was poor reporting early on. Too many journalists did not question those initial reports that the victim was OK. They did not treat it as a shooting. The joking started. Reporters were clowning on news shows, and it spread from reporters to senators.'"

Finally, the Wall Street Journal (2/16, Kronholz, 2.11M) analyzes the etiquette of quail hunting, "a genteel sport, where shooters with expensive guns and well-trained dogs hunt a skittish bird that is about the size of a fist and has the speed of a Little League pitch."

The Washington Post (2/16, A10, Romano, Balz, 744K) also reports on Whittington's past political activities, calling him "a well-known fixture on the Texas political landscape for half a century, a distinguished lawyer to whom governors have turned to help clean up messes, a Republican statesman before there was much of a Republican Party in the state." He and Cheney "were little more than acquaintances before last weekend, when the vice president accidentally sprayed him with birdshot, landing the 78-year-old in an intensive care unit in Corpus Christi. But friends say that Whittington is exactly the kind of man a host would include in a hunting party with the vice president of the United States." USA Today (2/16, Kiely, 2.31M) runs a story about local reaction to the shooting, titled "Incident No Big Deal In Tiny Texas County."

Cheney Reportedly In "State Of Meltdown" Over Accident. The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 3, 2:10, Borger) reported, "One source who is very close to the Vice President told CBS News today that Dick Cheney has been in what he calls a state of meltdown over this hunting accident. And another top White House aide also told CBS 'you can't imagine how upset the Vice President is.' In fact, he said, the Vice President is so upset, that the Whittington family is worrying about Dick Cheney."

McClellan Answer Said To Signal Tensions Within White House. The New York Times (2/16, Sanger, Kornblut, 1.19M) also says the interview "did not obscure the tensions that have riven the administration since the accident on Saturday, and in a sign of disagreement at the very top, the White House signaled that…Bush wished that Mr. Cheney had made the news public more quickly." The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Hitt, McKinnon, 2.11M) runs a similar report under the headline "Cheney Takes Blame For Shooting But Defends How It Was Disclosed," in which it reports, "Asked if the president was satisfied with Mr. Cheney's handling of the situation…McClellan yesterday repeated his statement from earlier in the week that 'you can always look back at these issues and work to do better in the future.' Asked if that was Mr. Bush's view, Mr. McClellan said he was 'speaking on behalf of the White House and the president.'" The Washington Post (2/16, A1, Baker, 744K) calls that McClellan comment "a sign of the extraordinary tension inside the White House -- evidently even between Bush and Cheney."

Bush's Handling Of Hunting Accident Contrasted With Cheney's. ABC World News Tonight (2/15, story 3, :30, Sawyer) reported, "I'm thinking of our conversation in the newsroom today, about President Bush and his one own hunting mishap." ABC (Vargas) added, "That's right. He wrote about it in his autobiography. In 1994, he shot a rare bird on a hunting trip of his own. He says he didn't know what to do. But then, decided to tell every single reporter who was accompanying him on that hunting trip. So, at least in that respect, you saw a very different way, a different version of how to handle this kind of crisis." Sawyer: "Different incident. But sharp contrast in the way it was handled."

Aftermath Of Hunting Accident Compared To Katrina Response. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Brownstein, Wallsten, 958K) reports, "Throughout his presidency, George W. Bush has been admired for his ability to set clear goals and doggedly follow a path to achieve them." But "Bush and his White House often seem to struggle when pressed to react to unexpected events, a difficulty highlighted Wednesday by the continuing furor over…Cheney's hunting accident and a congressional committee's sharply critical report about the federal response to Hurricane Katrina." The Times adds, "One GOP fundraiser close to the White House said he thought the administration's response to the news that Cheney had mistakenly shot a fellow hunter Saturday so closely replicated the Katrina experience that he wondered, 'Is this a bad dream we are seeing again?'"

Whittington Remains In Intensive Care. CNN's The Situation Room (2/15, Lavendera) reported, "We understand that Harry Whittington is still being kept in the intensive care unit of this hospital in Corpus Christi, but that really has very little to do with his condition. They say that he's actually doing quite well and he is being kept in the ICU mostly for privacy reasons, because of this high-profile status that has kind of enveloped his situation here. Doctors have been releasing over the last couple of days a little bit of information about his condition saying that he is stable, alert, eating regular food. In fact, at one point, they say that he was planning on doing some of his law work. And that is carefully orchestrated and discussed with the family. Even though Harry Whittington hasn't made any public comments or released any statements since he has been here at the hospital, they are releasing -- and through the wishes of the family, some of the updates to let people know that he is doing OK. By all means, they don't have to do that. They could have put the clamp down on any kind of information about his condition."

Cheney Could Face Charges. The AP (2/16, Curry) reports, "If the man wounded by…Cheney dies, the vice president could -- in theory at least -- face criminal charges, even though the shooting was an accident." Dallas defense attorney David Finn, "who has been a state and a federal prosecutor, said Wednesday that a Texas grand jury could bring a charge of criminally negligent homicide if there is evidence the vice president knew or should have known 'there was a substantial or unjustifiable risk that his actions would result in him shooting a fellow hunter.'" The AP adds, "To indict Cheney, the grand jury would have to conclude that a reasonable person in the vice president's place would say to himself, 'I am not pulling the trigger because this other guy might be in front of me,' Finn said."

Shays Says Administration Is Overly Secretive. Rep. Chris Shays said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/15) that the Whittington shooting is a "good example" of the Administration being overly secretive, adding, "It's like they don't learn. I mean, obviously this information's going to come out. So just let it come out. It had to have been one of the worst days of his life. It had to have been terrible for him and obviously the individual he shot and everybody who was there. But the information needs to be made public and be made public quickly."

Cheney's Choice Of Fox News Venue Criticized. Media analysts tended to be critical of Cheney's choice of Fox News for his interview. The New York Times (2/16, Stanley, 1.19M) reports, "Most V.I.P.'s in trouble choose the safe waters of Larry King on CNN to do damage control. Mr. Cheney chose what this administration views as the even more secure location of a Fox News interview."

Under the headline "Shoot a Pal, Complain About the Press," Paul Brownfield writes in the Los Angeles Times (2/16, 958K), "If you accidentally shoot a hunting buddy in the face, make it about the media. That was the message Vice President Dick Cheney got out Wednesday, courtesy of Fox News Channel and its most sober and decorated journalist, Brit Hume, who was summoned by Cheney for an exclusive interview and then left to play Cheney's press secretary, getting the veep's talking points out the rest of the day on Fox."

In his "Media Mix" column, Peter Johnson writes in USA Today (2/16, 2.31M), "Cheney's choice of Fox News Channel…had media types talking Wednesday, particularly among some competitors who view Fox News as sympathetic to the Bush White House. 'They're the house organ for the Republican Party,' said CNN political analyst Paul Begala, a former Clinton aide. 'It's like Khrushchev giving an interview to Pravda.'"

The Washington Post (2/16, C1, Kurtz, 744K) reports Mary Matalin, "a former Cheney aide and informal adviser who accompanied him to the interview in the vice president's ceremonial office, said the vice president likes Hume but that 'our objective was to get the whole story out in a consecutive way. He wanted a long form. We had no desire for anything other than comprehensive and hard questions.'" Matalin "said Cheney considered holding a news conference, but that 'would have meant a lot of grandstanding' by reporters." Fox News "is widely viewed as more sympathetic to the Bush administration than the other networks."

O'Reilly Says Press Despises Cheney. Bill O'Reilly said on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (2/15), "The press is making a big deal out of this because they despise Dick Cheney. Generally speaking the media feels that Cheney is arrogant and distant. But this hatred has gone too far. … Like Cheney or not, once it degenerates into hatred, there's no value. This incident is the best illustration I've seen in years of a media out of control."

DOJ_NMG_0015453

More Commentary. Peggy Noonan writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.11M), "Right now in the White House they're discussing how to help the vice president get through his problem. They've already tried the wearing of orange ties, an attempt to take the sting out of the incident by showing they don't feel the sting. Duck! Ha ha! But what are they thinking that they're not saying? Here's a hunch, based not on any inside knowledge but only on what I know of people who practice politics, and those who practice it within the Bush White House. I suspect what they're thinking and not saying is, If Dick Cheney weren't vice president, who'd be a good vice president? They're thinking, At some time down the road we may wind up thinking about a new plan. And one night over drinks at a barbecue in McLean one top guy will turn to another top guy and say, 'Under the never permeable and never porous Dome of Silence, tell me...wouldn't you like to replace Cheney?'" Noonan adds, "It would have to be a man wildly popular in the party and the press. And it would have to be a decision made by Dick Cheney. If he didn't want to do it he wouldn't have to. If he were pressed -- Dick, we gotta put the next guy in here or we're going to lose in '08 and see all our efforts undone -- he might make the decision himself. He'd have to step down on his own. He's just been through a trauma, and he can't be liking his job as much now as he did three years ago. No one on the downside of a second term does, hate magnet or not."

Under the headline "Mr. Vice President, It's Time To Go," Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (2/16, 1.19M), "It's time for Dick Cheney to step down -- for the sake of the country and for the sake of the Bush administration. Mr. Cheney's bumbling conduct at the upscale Armstrong Ranch in South Texas seemed hilarious at first. But when we learned that Harry Whittington had suffered a mild heart attack after being shot by the vice president in a hunting accident, it became clear that a more sober assessment of the fiasco at the ranch and, inevitably, Mr. Cheney's controversial and even bizarre behavior as vice president was in order." Cheney "would do his nation and his president a service by packing his bags and heading back to Wyoming. He's become a joke. But not a funny one."

Mary Zeiss Stange, who teaches at Skidmore College and is a member of USA Today's board of contributors, writes in USA Today (2/16, 2.31M), "Cheney's errant shooting is a fitting metaphor for a gang that, all too apparently, can't shoot straight."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (2/16, 958K) says the way in which the Cheney shooting story was made public is a "serious reminder that when it comes to the executive branch's doings, Cheney is the bottleneck." The Times takes note of "two other secrecy-related stories…making headlines" on Wednesday. First, Australian public television "aired grotesque new images of prisoner abuse at Abu Ghraib." Second, the House Committee on Government Reform has been listening this week to "witness after witness describe how they suffered workplace retaliation after blowing the whistle on national security activities they thought were unethical or illegal." The Times adds, "We wouldn't know about the NSA program or even Abu Ghraib if Cheney had his way," and we'll be "living with the consequences of Cheney's tight lips long after this week's brouhaha fades."

David Brooks writes in the New York Times (2/16, 1.19M), "In normal life, people would look at this event and see two decent men caught in a twist of fate. They would feel concern for the victim and sympathy for the man who fired the gun. But we in Washington are able to rise above the normal human reaction. We have our jobs. We have our roles. So in the days following the Cheney-Whittington accident, liberal pundits had to live up to their responsibility to manufacture a series of unsubstantiated allegations while turning the episode into a Clifford Odets-style tale of plutocrats gone wild. 'Was he drunk? I mean, these are ultrarich Republicans, at a weekend, fun-time hunting,' the pundit Lawrence O'Donnell wondered on MSNBC. … Finally there is the Office of the Vice President, inevitably failing to surpass expectations. The vice president's role, on this as on all days, is to treat the press and the Washington community in general as a plague-ridden horde, from whom it is possible, upon the merest conversation or contact, to catch some soul-destroying disease. So, of course, the vice president was compelled to recreate his role as Voldemort, Keeper of the Secrets."

Jacob Weisberg, editor of Slate.com, writes in the Financial Times (2/16), "The Bush administration's aversion to openness reached the proportions of parody. … One could recount dozens of examples in which Mr Bush and Mr Cheney have spurned legitimate requests for information from all kinds of groups. In sum, these episodes represent more than the familiar tug and pull of the branches of government, mere hostility to the press, or the challenges to freedom in wartime. They are the arrogant expression of a deaf, imperial presidency that hears the phrase 'the public's right to know' as the public's right to 'No.'"

Cheney Says Vice Presidents Have Authority To Declassify Information. Vice President Dick Cheney was asked on Fox News' Special Report (2/15) about court filings that indicate that Lewis Libby was authorized by unidentified "superiors" authorized the release of some classified information. Cheney said, "It's nothing I can talk about. This is an issue that's been under investigation for a couple of years. I've cooperated fully, including being interviewed, as well, by a special prosecutor. All of it is now going to trial. Scooter is entitled to the presumption of innocence. He's a great guy. I've worked with him for a long time, have enormous regard for him. I may well be called as a witness at some point in the case and it's, therefore, inappropriate for me to comment on any facet of the case." Asked if a vice president has the authority to declassify information, Cheney said, "There is an executive order to that effect,' adding, "There is an executive order that specifies who has classification authority, and obviously focuses first and foremost on the President, but also includes the vice president."

The New York Times (2/16, 1.19M) reports that Cheney "said he had participated in decisions to declassify information, but he declined to say whether he had ever declassified information on his own. Mr. Cheney said he could not comment on the case of his former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby Jr., who was indicted on five counts of perjury and obstruction of justice in October after an investigation into the disclosure of the identity of an officer of the Central Intelligence Agency, Valerie Wilson. Mr. Cheney said he might be called as a witness."

The Washington Post (2/16, A10, 744K) reports, Libby told a grand jury that his 'superiors' authorized him to disclose in July 2003 the contents of a National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq, according to newly released court documents. Sources familiar with the matter have told The Washington Post that Cheney was one of those superiors, but it was unclear whether Libby meant classified or unclassified information."

DOJ Seeks Senate Panel Documents On Miranda Leak. The Hill (2/16, Bolton) reports Justice Department officials are "negotiating with the Senate's legal counsel over access to Judiciary Committee documents on the committee's investigation of a memo scandal that roiled the upper chamber two years ago, according to a source familiar with the situation." The Senate legal counsel is "in turn consulting with committee staff about the sensitivity of the documents to determine what can be turned over to the executive branch, decisions that could have an impact on how much access future administrations have over legislative documents." Lawmakers "will make the final decision about what is shared." The investigation "stems from the controversial publication in the fall of 2003 of internal Democratic memoranda that two former Republican committee aides admit to accessing on a computer server shared by Republican and Democratic members of the Judiciary Committee." The "uproar over the memos' publication resulted in the resignation of Manuel Miranda, then the top aide handling judicial nominations for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). Miranda admitted to accessing the documents. A junior Judiciary Committee aide who admitted to downloading and reading the Democratic files also resigned."

Supreme Court Said To Be In Transition. The New York Times (2/16, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports, "With the addition of two new justices in the last four months, the" Supreme Cour "is in the midst of a major transition." Justice Stephen G. Breyer, when he joined, "felt adequately prepared and had expected to move comfortably into his new role, he said, and was therefore surprised at how overwhelming he found it." Breyer spoke "only for himself, offering neither advice to nor commentary on Justice Alito or his other new colleague, Chief Justice Roberts. But coming from one who ordinarily projects an air of cheerful self-assurance, his comments were a reminder that the Supreme Court is a different world, even for those who may have spent a lifetime preparing for it."

Alito Chooses Time Warner Lawyer As Clerk. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Lattman, 2.11M) reports, "Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., whose ceremonial swearing-in as the 110th justice of the Supreme Court will be held today, has named as one of his law clerks a Time Warner Inc. lawyer who served as a top legal adviser to Attorney General John Ashcroft from 2001 to 2003." His appointment "is unusual because of Mr. Ciongoli's age and level of experience," as "most Supreme Court clerks…are recent law-school graduates with clerkship experience at the federal appeals courts."

The AP (2/16, Holland) reports, "Helping promote Samuel Alito's nomination to the Supreme Court has paid off for three conservative lawyers, including a one-time confidant of former Attorney General John Ashcroft. … The three have prize assignments as Alito's law clerks and the opportunity to help shape his early days on the court. They also have resumes that could add some firepower to the junior justice's chambers." The AP continues, "Alito, 55, has surrounded himself with solid conservatives and loyalists - all three clerked for him when he was an appeals court judge, dating back a decade. … Two of the new clerks, Jay Jorgensen and Hannah Smith, are previous Supreme Court clerks who traveled across the country as part of a public relations campaign on Alito's behalf last month. … The third, former Justice Department lawyer Adam Ciongoli, participated in so-called 'murder boards,'' mock sessions that got Alito ready for his Senate confirmation hearings." The AP adds, "Earlier, Jorgensen was among the conservatives who raised questions about the credentials of Bush's early court nominee, Harriet Miers. When Miers withdrew in the face of conservative criticism, Bush turned to Alito. Jorgensen also prepared a paper for the Federalist Society on the nomination of Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, a liberal member of the court. … 'I think what's notable is that he's picked individuals who are so defined on the right ideologically. That tells us who Samuel Alito is,'' said Erwin Chemerinsky, a liberal Duke University law professor.'

Bush Promotes Health Savings Accounts In Visit To Ohio. President Bush yesterday traveled to Dublin, Ohio, to promote his proposal for health savings accounts and amplify the consumer choice oriented healthcare message he delivered in his State of the Union address. Democratic critics reiterated that while the proposals would benefit younger and healthy workers, traditional insurance plans would be burdened by older, sicker workers. Bush also promoted the political fortunes of several Ohio incumbents, although Sen. Mike DeWine skipped the event.

The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Gerstenzang, 958K) reports President Bush talked "about good health, and his plan to help America pay for it, at the home office of the nation's third-largest purveyor of hamburgers and French fries." Bush "urged Americans concerned about healthcare costs to consider a fledgling government program built around high-deductible insurance for catastrophic illness or accidents and tax-free personal savings accounts to pay for routine medical needs." Health savings accounts, "or HSAs, offer participants choices in healthcare while holding down costs because the payments will come from a patient's savings account, Bush said." The Times adds the plan's "critics have argued that the program would attract the healthiest Americans, who would be able to put aside savings tax-free and spend little for healthcare, while traditional employer-provided plans would be filled with people whose health costs are the highest." Bush's "one-hour speech is part of a weeklong administration effort to draw public attention to its healthcare proposals." But the President's "message drew sharp criticism, and the location of the speech was too delicious for some critics to resist."

The Washington Post (2/16, A5, VandeHei, 744K) reports that as "part of a new White House campaign to promote incremental changes to the health care system this year, Bush is calling for new tax incentives to help millions of Americans purchase health care coverage for catastrophic illness and pay for out-of-pocket medical costs." In his "fiscal 2007 budget, the president proposed a mix of tax credits and deductions to increase the number of employers and employees using health savings accounts to both mitigate health care costs and begin transforming the traditional insurance system. Much as he did last year in a failed campaign to restructure the Social Security system, Bush is selling the accounts as a way to provide consumers more control over their money and to transition away from what he calls a costly and unsustainable program." About 3 million Americans "have opened HSAs, including 9,000 of the 40,000 employees at Wendy's, a fast-food chain that has been a big supporter of Republicans. Bush picked Wendy's because the company started offering the tax-free savings accounts in 2005 and has reduced its health care spending as a result."

The Columbus Dispatch (2/16) reports President Bush "said Wendy's was facing double-digit increase in health insurance costs when it decided to implement the health savings accounts. The company pays for a health insurance plan with a high deductible and also contributes to the health savings account that employees can use to pay any health costs. Bush said 9,000 full-time employees of Wendy's have the accounts, and 90 percent of them ended last year with a balance that is earning interest." Wendy's spokesman Denny Lynch said HSAs "allowed Wendy's to offer the same level of benefits for a slight rise in costs to the company, rather than the steep increase expected if the company had remained in a traditional health plan." About "100 of the 700 Wendy's headquarters employees were able to see the president's speech in person, with others viewing it by simulcast, Lynch said."

The AP (2/16, Riechmann) reports President Bush "mixed politics with his prescription for what ails the nation's health care system on a trip Wednesday to Ohio, which was a pivotal state in his re-election and one with key races in this year's midterm elections." The President "made his case for health savings accounts at Wendy's International Inc., where 9,000 employees have signed up for the accounts since the hamburger giant began offering them last year." But the Ohio trip "had a political component too. The Ohio governor's race and about a half-dozen House and Senate seats from the state are competitive in this year's election, and whether voters stick with Republican incumbents could foreshadow voter sentiment in 2008." Republican incumbents "running for re-election are trying to avoid fallout from an election-year scandal in the state, which helped put Bush over the top in 2004." Bush was "joined at the event by Taft, George V. Voinovich, R-Ohio, and Reps. Pat Tiberi, David Hobson and Deborah Pryce. Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, who is in a toss-up race against Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown, was invited but remained in Washington for a Judiciary Committee hearing."

Reuters (2/16, Bohan) reports Democrats "accused" the President "of offering recycled ideas that would worsen the health system." Bush "pointed to Wendy's as an example of a company that offered HSA plans to employees. But Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said, 'The president's most recent recycled health care idea will make the health care crisis worse.'" In an initiative "the White House estimates will cost $59 billion over five years, Bush would expand the tax breaks offered to those with HSAs and raise limits on contributions."

The New York Times (2/16, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports President Bush declared "his proposals were not just for the wealthy and would help some of the 45 million Americans who remain uninsured. In an hourlong speech in one of the most politically troublesome states for Republicans in this year's midterm elections, Mr. Bush took on critics of his plan, who say that poor or underemployed people cannot afford the accounts." Bush's plan "seeks to make the accounts more attractive by expanding their tax incentives and by increasing the amount of money that people may contribute to them each year." Democrats "criticized Mr. Bush's plan as a windfall for the rich and said that a fast-food cook making $15,000 a year could not afford to set aside $5,000 in a health savings account or pay $1,050 in medical bills."

The Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.11M) reports Bush "outlined his plan to confront rising healthcare costs by giving consumers more choice." He "pointed to laser-eye surgery as an example of how market forces can have a positive impact on the price and availability of medical procedures, when third-party payers aren't involved." Bush "touched on the problems encountered in the early stages of the new Medicare prescription drug program, but urged seniors to sign up for the plan, which he said will cut their costs."

Ohio Will Be Battleground In Struggle For House Control. Roll Call (2/16, Habte) reports that Ohio is expected to be a battleground in the struggle for control of the House in 2006. Roll Call adds, "With today's candidate filing deadline looming, the stakes are higher for the GOP which is battling to protect three Republican incumbents who Democrats boast are especially vulnerable: Reps. Bob Ney, Deborah Pryce and Steve Chabot. Many Democrats running in Ohio, and many of their surrogates in Washington, D.C., have honed an overarching campaign message that identifies the Ohio GOP with a 'culture of corruption.' … Not that the Democrats don't have their work cut out for them. The race in the 6th district, where Rep. Ted Strickland (D) is running for governor, is considered a tossup at this point. And in the heavily Democratic 13th district, which Rep. Sherrod Brown (D) is leaving to run for Senate, Republicans recruited their preferred candidate, Lorain Mayor Craig Foltin (R), into the race this week."

Bush Job Approval Rating Slips In Harris Interactive Poll. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.11M) reports that a recent Harris Interactive poll has found that President Bush's job approval ratings have slipped since January 2006 while Congress' ratings have remained about the same. The Journal adds, "Any benefit President Bush may have gained from his State of the Union speech didn't last long enough to be measured in the latest poll, as Mr. Bush's ratings are now 40% positive, down from a positive rating of 43% in January, and 58% negative, up from 56% negative. Elsewhere, approval of the way Congress is handling its job is mostly unchanged, with 25% of U.S. adults giving Congress a positive rating and 71% giving it a negative rating."

Gutierrez Says US Needs To Embrace Scientists. The San Jose Mercury News (2/16, Poletti, 268K) reports, "The Bush Administration wants to make math and science cool. Carlos Gutierrez, U.S. Commerce Secretary, visiting Silicon Valley and Stanford University on Wednesday, said that along with President Bush's recently announced American Competitiveness Initiative, there needs to be a change in American culture -- to embrace inventors and scientists, in the same way Americans worship athletes or pop stars." In an interview Gutierrez said, "We need to make those people just as cool as the athletes and we need to make that achievement something a student would strive for. … It is part cultural, it is part math and science, it's part what happens in the classroom. But it's also what we value as a society." Gutierrez told a group of Stanford University business students "that they are in the right place at the right time in American business, and they should 'let others do the hand-wringing' over whether the nation is losing its competitive edge to emerging countries such as India and China." Yet, "even after rattling off several statistics about strong U.S. economic growth in his lunch-hour speech, the first question posed by a student was about the 'big fear' that the United States is losing its creative edge to China and India." Gutierrez replied, "Let me repeat my speech. … We are dealing with it today, we are dealing with it successfully. We just need to stay focused."

More Claims Surfacing Of White House Interference With NASA. The New York Times (2/16, Revkin, 1.19M) reports, "Top political appointees in the NASA press office exerted strong pressure during the 2004 presidential campaign to cut the flow of news releases on glaciers, climate, pollution and other earth sciences, public affairs officers at the agency say." The Times adds, "Press officers, who were granted anonymity because they said they were still concerned for their jobs despite Dr. Griffin's call for openness, said much of the pressure in late 2004 was placed on Gretchen Cook-Anderson." She managed "the flow of earth science news at NASA headquarters." The story says she told colleagues "that Glenn Mahone, then the assistant administrator for public affairs, had told her that a planned news conference on fresh readings by a new NASA satellite, Aura, that measures ozone and air pollution, should not take place until after the election. In an e-mail message yesterday, Ms. Cook-Anderson… said, 'While I can't discuss these matters, I won't disagree with that description of what took place.'" The Times says Mahone did not return calls seeking comment and that "Dean Acosta, a political appointee who was then Mr. Mahone's deputy and is now Dr. Griffin's press secretary, said he had never pressed Ms. Cook-Anderson to cut back on news releases. … But archives of news releases on the NASA headquarters Web site show a sharp change in the number of such releases, to 12 in 2005 from about four dozen in 2004." The Times cites other complaints such as a "standing unwritten order from political appointees" to not use the term "global warming," but "climate change." The story closes, "David R. Mould, NASA's assistant administrator for public affairs and a political appointee, said none of the appointees had brought a political agenda to the agency. 'We've received no marching orders from anyone,' Mr. Mould said."

Griffin Likely To Face Questions On Subject In Today's Hearing. In his space news blog "The Write Stuff" (2/15) Orlando Sentinel space editor Michael Cabbage writes, "NASA chief Michael Griffin's scheduled appearance before the House Science Committee on Thursday will be lawmakers' first chance to grill him since the administration's 2007 budget request was made public. It also will be the first hearing since revelations about a hyper-partisan public affairs officer and a potential scandal involving the NASA inspector general. There are bound to be plenty of tough questions about cuts to NASA programs and whether some of the agency's political appointees have spun out of control. Put Griffin's blunt, straightforward style in front of lawmakers looking to score political points in an election year and this could get really interesting. The hearing begins at 10 a.m. EST and can be watched on the web."

NOAA Statement Acknowledges Dissent. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Regalado, 2.11M) reports, "Amid a growing outcry from climate researchers in its own ranks, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration backed away from a statement it released after last year's powerful hurricane season that discounted any link to global warming. A corrected statement, which says some NOAA researchers disagree with that view, was posted to NOAA's Web site yesterday. The change is part of a high-stakes fight over the issue of global warming, and what some scientists complain is a widening gap between what their research shows and White House climate policy." Scientists have been complaining about interference since December, the Journal says. "They gained force last week when James Hansen, a climate researcher at NASA Goddard Institute for Space Studies, again accused NOAA of censoring scientific communication. Dr. Hansen has said NASA public-affairs officials had tried to discourage him from presenting his views that human activities could lead to severe global warming."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Chaddock, 61K) reports, "Dissent often carries a price in official Washington, especially in the war years of the Bush presidency. Since the Sept. 11 attacks, the number of insiders alleging wrongdoing in government - either through whistle-blower channels or directly to the press - has surged, as have reprisals against them." The Monitor cites cases in the CIA and NSA and adds, "Outside the realm of national security, James Hansen, the top climate scientist at NASA, spoke out about efforts by the NASA press office to screen his speeches and limit his contact with the press. In response, Rep. Sherwood Boehlert (R) of New York, chairman of the House Science Committee, backed Dr. Hansen" and NASA's Michael Griffin "e-mailed all NASA employees, affirming that staff should not alter, filter, or adjust scientific work. But Hansen says the issue is not yet resolved, citing a pending investigation by the House Energy and Commerce Committee challenging the scholarship of other scientists working on global warming."

In a column about general White House communication strategy on the Seattle Post-Intelligencer (2/16) Marianne Means writes, "Recently a prestigious climate scientist complained that a young Republican hack at NASA had been muzzling him to prevent him from warning of global warming, a concept the administration refuses to confront."

Specter Earmarked $50 Million In Defense Funds To Firm Represented By Aide's Spouse. USA Today (2/16, Kelley, 2.31M) reports Sen. Arlen Specter "helped direct almost $50 million in Pentagon spending during the past four years to clients of the husband of one of his top aides, records show." Specter used "'earmarking' 13 times to set aside $48.7 million for six clients represented by lobbyist Michael Herson and the firm he co-founded, American Defense International. The clients paid Herson's firm nearly $1.5 million in fees since 2002, federal lobbying records show." Herson's wife, Vicki Siegel Herson, "is Specter's legislative assistant for appropriations. She deals with Specter's work on the Senate Appropriations Committee and its defense subcommittee, where all the earmarks originated. Siegel, who uses her maiden name at work, is a former lobbyist for defense contractors who has worked for Specter since 1999."

USA Today (2/16, 2.31M) listed the projects earmarked by Sen. Specter, which included "$20.9 million in the 2005 and 2006 budgets for projects at Drexel University in Philadelphia dealing with bioterrorism response and computer networking. Drexel has paid ADI $200,000 a year since 2002."

Earmark Reform Could Undercut Bipartisanship. The Hill (2/16, Cusack) reports the "building momentum for earmark reform could force lawmakers to cut back significantly on their beloved pork projects, and in the process reduce something that is in short supply on Capitol Hill: bipartisanship." Securing "federal money for local projects regularly unites conservatives and liberals from the same or neighboring states, but future funding for earmarks will probably be dramatically cut now that the anti-pork movement, led by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), has gained traction." Unlike "taxes, healthcare and ethics issues, Republicans and Democrats are careful not to criticize each other on earmark funding." Most lawmakers "put aside their philosophical differences and join forces with their political adversaries because most of what they do is aimed at winning the next election: fundraising, gerrymandering their districts and crowing about the local projects they fought for in Washington."

Hastert Wants Reform Proposal By March. CQ (2/15, Ferrechio) reports Speaker Hastert "wants to get the lobbying scandal behind House Republicans by the end of March — a deadline that would require him to resolve differences with new Majority Leader John A. Boehner over privately financed congressional travel." During a "closed-door GOP conference meeting Wednesday, Hastert told fellow House Republicans that they must reconcile their divergent views so that a bill can be taken up on the floor by the end of March." Hastert and House Rules Chairman Dreier "have proposed banning privately funded travel, tightening limits on gifts to members and staff and requiring additional disclosures about lobbyist-lawmaker interactions." But plans to "quickly introduce legislation hit a snag earlier this month, when rank-and-file members loudly voiced their opposition. Many called the tighter gift limits insulting and complained that a travel ban would eliminate useful trips with educational value."

Top GOP Leaders' Opposition Slows House Earmark Reform. The Washington Times (2/16, Dinan, 90K) reports the "push to end earmarks, which critics call pork-barrel spending, is bogged down in the House, thanks to a strong defense of the practice from top Republicans." House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis "said the Predator unmanned aerial vehicle, used for missile attacks on terrorist lairs, is a shining example of the best of earmarks. He said the Predator proved its success in Bosnia after he stuck an earmark into a spending bill in the mid-1990s, long before the war on terror." Other leaders "defend the practice by saying it's how they are judged at home." Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said, "The Buffalo News, which is my hometown newspaper, still believes I ought to bring home the bacon." The Times adds earmark "opponents have noticed the return fire." Rep. Jeff Flake said, "The empire is striking back." He said Mr. Lewis "tried to intimidate his bill's supporters by issuing a list of earmarks that each had requested."

Nonprofit Groups Oppose Proposals To Ban Private Congressional Trips. The Hill (2/16, Hearn) reports a "handful of nonprofit groups that sponsor travel for members of Congress are pushing back against recent proposals to ban privately funded trips, arguing that their activities are far different from the golfing and exotic foreign junkets that have been the centerpiece of recent lobbying scandals." Groups such as the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), the American Jewish Committee (AJC), the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism and the Council for Christian Colleges & Universities "have been quietly raising the issue with sympathetic members of Congress, hoping to convince lawmakers that their trips are valuable educational experiences and have not been abused by lawmakers or lobbyists." Meanwhile, Speaker Dennis Hastert and Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.), "whom Hastert tapped to marshal a reform package through the House, have received significant blowback from their own members since introducing a series of suggested reforms last month. A large section of the conference is opposed to a ban on privately funded travel that Hastert and Dreier proposed last month. The two leaders are hoping to work through the committees of jurisdiction to bring some reforms to the floor."

Lobbyists Frustrated By Failure Of Online Disclosure System. The Washington Post (2/16, A9, Birnbaum, 744K) reports, "Thousands of lobbyists, including the president of a lobbyists' trade association and the co-author of an authoritative lobbying manual, were unable to file their disclosure reports electronically this week as required by a new congressional system." Paul A. Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, and Thomas M. Susman, co-editor of the American Bar Association's "The Lobbying Manual," "tried to send their reports to the clerk of the House of Representatives via the Internet on Tuesday, the filing deadline. But, like many of their colleagues, they were frustrated to receive a return message that said 'Submission status: failed.'" Unable to "use the new filing method, they were forced to print out their reports and mail or fax them with a cover letter explaining that at least they had tried."

Lobbying Firms Report $36 Million Increase In Revenue In 2005. Roll Call (2/16, Newmyer) reports that despite "stormy times for the Washington, D.C., lobbying industry, the top firms in town are reporting steady growth for 2005." The top 25 firms 'collected $397.9 million in lobbying revenues — a $36 million jump from the fees reported by the 25 largest shops the previous year." That's an "8 percent climb from 2004 to 2005 — a solid recovery after a slow presidential election year, though still less than the 15 percent annual growth rates the sector chalked up in prior years." Officials at top-ranked firms "predicted that current rates of growth would continue, though they also sounded a note of caution for the coming year, citing a short legislative calendar and the looming prospect of new restrictions on the lobbying business."

The Washington Post (2/16, A25, Sarasohn, 744K) reports in its "Special Interests" column, "It is February 2006, but the results of the lobbying disclosures for the first six months of 2005 are just in at PoliticalMoneyLine, the online organization that tracks lobbying and campaign money: A record $1,164,586,968 was spent on lobbying Congress and the executive branch during the first six months. That amounts to '$194 million in spending per month, almost $6.5 million a day, or more than $540,000 an hour in a twelve-hour day."

Former Member Says Congress Should Crack Down On Crooked Lobbyists. In a Roll Call op-ed (2/16), former Rep. Bill Sarpalius says he has spent "the past 10 years as a paid lobbyist. My career has been built on garnering the support of elected officials on issues that were important to my constituents and that currently are important to my clients." Good lobbyists "do their homework and help Members of Congress understand the impact of legislation, the outcomes of which American citizens must live with every day." The "point is that not all lobbyists are bad or crooked, and they should not be blindly grouped with Jack Abramoff. What is bad is the method that some lobbyists, such as Abramoff, employed to influence Members of Congress." It is "unfortunate that individuals such as Abramoff, who apparently lacks any and all ethics, abused the system and his clients." Sarpalius adds, "Perhaps Congress should focus on those who abuse the system and who do not follow the reporting requirements."

NAS Creates Informal Embryonic Stem Cell Oversight Committee. The New York Times (2/16, Wade, 1.19M) reports, "To fill a void in federal supervision, the National Academy of Sciences is setting up a committee to provide informal oversight over research with human embryonic stem cells." The National Institutes of Health is "unable to specify what kinds of research are ethically acceptable" due to "the Bush administration's reservations about embryonic stem cell research," even though "contentious issues in biological research are usually handled by" it.

President's Bioethics Council Member Criticizes Bush Stance On Cloning. Michael Gazzaniga, director of the Center for Cognitive Neuroscience at Dartmouth and a member of the President's Council on Bioethics, writes in an op-ed in the New York Times (2/16, 1.19M), "I have not heard any outcry over" President Bush's "policy statement on cloning" from his State of the Union speech, and "I can only guess that this means the public doesn't care, or doesn't understand what Mr. Bush means." His "calling human cloning in all its forms an 'egregious abuse' is a serious mischaracterization," and using "the phrase 'in all of its forms'" is "a way of conflating very different things: reproductive cloning and biomedical cloning." Even "the president's own largely conservative Bioethics Council…made a big distinction between the two forms of cloning," but "the president rejected the advice of his own counselors and has kept his ban on federal financing of stem cell research for all but a handful of strains of existing lines." However, "This search for alternatives is costly not just in dollar terms but also in time not being spent on the best research possibilities. And it represents a perversion of the scientific process:… it is being used in the service of political goals."

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke Says Economy On Track For Continued Growth. ABC World News Tonight (2/15, story 8, :20, Vargas) reported, "The new Federal Reserve Chairman made his debut today on Capitol Hill. Ben Bernanke stuck closely to the script of his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, that the economy is on track for good growth this year. But there was one big difference, committee members said he was much easier to understand. Bernanke signaled that the Fed is ready to boost interest rates if needed to control inflation."

Reuters (2/16, Ahmann) reports Bernanke "said the US economy was running so near capacity that higher interest rates may be needed to quell the risk of inflation." The Fed chairman "appeared keen to establish credentials as an inflation 'hawk' in his first extensive comments since taking office two weeks ago by stressing the need to keep price pressures contained." The Wall Street Journal (2/16, lp, 2.11M) also says :Bernanke demonstrated continuity with Alan Greenspan's interest-rate policies but broke with his predecessor's style.:

Knight Ridder (2/16, Hall) reports, "Unlike his predecessor Alan Greenspan, who was famous for convoluted public testimony, Bernanke was clear, concise and mercifully brief." He "erased any doubts that he, as a longtime academic, could handle the political hot seat. He answered tough questions with confidence, authority and an occasional gentle smile." The Financial Times (2/16, Balls) reports Bernanke "made an assured debut."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Trumbull, 61K) reports, "Often, a transition in leadership at the Federal Reserve is a rocky time for financial markets. Dips or dives for stock prices are not uncommon. For Ben Bernanke, it's so far so good." Bernanke "has sent signals that have done more to calm and encourage Wall Street than to rattle it."

The New York Times (2/16, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "He was calm and he was cool, and he most certainly was not Alan Greenspan." He "did three things on Wednesday that his predecessor usually did not: He gave short answers, generally free of twists and turns that could be interpreted in two or more ways. He simply refused to answer questions that would ensnare him in politically charged battles over tax cuts, spending cuts or the overhaul of Social Security. ¶He said nothing that rattled the financial markets."

USA Today (2/16, Kirchhoff, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) also emphasized Bernanke's "straightforward manner," while the Washington Post (2/16, Henderson, Irwin, 744K) runs a similar story under the headline "Bernanke Says Economy's Expansion Is On Track." The Washington Times (2/16, Hill, 90K) titled its report "Bernanke Optimistic On Economy."

Factory Output Rises Again In January. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Conkey, 2.11M) reports, "US factory output rose 0.7% in January from December levels, the fourth consecutive monthly increase and another sign of increasing economic momentum." The Federal Reserve "said overall industrial production last month fell 0.2% from the previous month, largely because of a 10.1% decline in utility output linked to unseasonably warm weather in many parts of the country."

Utility Output Declines. The New York Times (2/16, 1.19M) reports, "Industrial production unexpectedly fell last month as the warmest January in more than a century led to a record decline in utility use even as manufacturing strengthened, the Federal Reserve said yesterday. … Utilities generated less power as heating demand fell during the warmest January since records began in 1895. Utility production fell 10.1 percent, the biggest drop on record, the report said."

Foreign Investment Slows. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Walsh, 2.11M) reports, "Non-US investors made $56.6 billion in net purchases of U.S. securities during December, the smallest amount in seven months and a reminder of America's dependency on foreign capital to finance its trade deficit." While foreign investors "bought a strong $74.2 billion in US securities, Americans invested $17.6 billion in foreign securities, leaving a net capital inflow that was far less than Wall Street analysts expected."

Home Ownership Rate Appears To Be Leveling. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Simon, 2.11M) reports, "After climbing steadily for a decade, the nation's homeownership rate appears to have leveled off. New data released late last month by the U.S. Census Bureau put the homeownership rate at 69% in the fourth quarter of 2005, down from 69.2% a year earlier." While "the decline itself is too small to be considered statistically significant," it is "the third quarter in a row that the rate hasn't posted a year-over-year gain -- and it's the first time since 1994 that the rate at year-end hasn't increased from the previous year."

Meanwhile, says USA Today (2/16, Knox, 2.31M), "Home prices in the fourth quarter of 2005 posted double-digit increases in 72 metro areas -- a record number that likely marked a high point in this real estate cycle, the National Association of Realtors said Wednesday. Nationwide, the median sales price for an existing single-family house rose to $213,000 in the fourth quarter, up 13.6% from the October-December period of 2004. But David Lereah, the NAR's chief economist, cautioned that the market is rapidly cooling." The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Bater, Kerch, 2.11M) runs a similar story under the headline "Home-Price Growth Still Hot, But Pace Has Cooled Some."

Stocks Up. The New York Times (2/16, 1.19M) reports, "The Dow Jones industrial average gained 30.58 points, or 0.3 percent, to 11,058.97. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index climbed 4.47 points, or 0.4 percent, to 1,280. The Nasdaq composite index rose 14.26 points, or 0.6 percent, to 2,276.43." The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Patterson, 2.11M) also reports the stock numbers.

States Looking For Ways To Cut Medicaid Costs. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Solomon, 2.11M) reports that with Medicaid costs "now consuming about 17% of state general-fund budgets, and rising at more than twice the rate of inflation, state governments are scouring the health program for savings to protect their bottom lines. But changing a safety net for 52 million poor and disabled Americans involves delicate trade-offs -- and political risk." Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, a Republican who heads the National Governors Association, said, "A lot of governors are looking at what is being done out there, but looking with a cautious eye." The Journal adds some states, like Florida and Vermont, are "experimenting with limits on how the state will pay for Medicaid recipients' medical costs. Others, like Tennessee, have wound up cutting hundreds of thousands of individuals off Medicaid, prompting a backlash from residents and health-care advocates."

GOP Believes It Could Win Jefferson Seat If He Resigns. A front page story in the Washington Post (2/16, A1, Murray, Lengel, 744K) reports on Rep. William Jefferson, who federal investigators are targeting "for allegedly demanding cash and other favors for himself and relatives, in exchange for using his congressional clout to arrange African business deals. A former aide recently pleaded guilty to bribing Jefferson and is cooperating with authorities, and sources familiar with the case say a plea agreement with the lawmaker is being explored." The Post adds, "Jefferson's world is toppling. … Depending on Jefferson's fate, his central New Orleans district -- badly damaged by Hurricane Katrina and in need of effective representation in Washington -- could face a rowdy special election. The political scene is so chaotic that Republicans believe they could win the gerrymandered Democratic seat."

Kean Leads Polls In New Jersey Senate Race. Roll Call (2/16, Drucker) reports that New Jersey State Sen. Tom Kean Jr. 'is running against newly appointed Sen. Bob Menendez (D)." President Bush "lost New Jersey to Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) in the 2004 presidential race, but cut his defeat margin in half compared to the 16-point bath he took in 2000 against then-Vice President Al Gore. And, he raised his percentage of the vote from 40 percent to 46 percent. But Bush's job-approval numbers in the Garden State are down. A Strategic Vision poll conducted Feb. 3-5 showed that only 37 percent of likely voters approve of his job performance, with 57 percent disapproving. The survey had a 3 percent margin of error. The good news for Kean in this poll is that he led Menendez in a Senate matchup, 33 percent to 28 percent, even though 39 percent of respondents self-identified as Democrats, compared to only 28 percent who said they were Republicans. Thirty-nine percent of those surveyed were undecided, possibly leaving the answer to how this race turns out in the hands of undecided voters. A Zogby poll conducted Feb. 8-10 showed Menendez leading Kean 37 percent to 32 percent, with 30 percent undecided." Roll Call adds, "Menendez begins the race with a hefty financial edge, banking more than $4.2 million at the end of 2005, compared to $861,000 for Kean. … Running statewide in the Garden State is an expensive proposition because 76 percent of it is encompassed by the New York City media market, while 24 percent is covered by Philadelphia. New Jersey is a state light on retail politicking and heavy on mass media, so money will matter; it costs about $1 million per week to advertise effectively on television in the two markets."

Steele Called GOP's "Great Black Hope." Roll Call (2/16, Kurtz) calls Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, "the GOP's great black hope, the Republican with the best chance of winning a Senate election in Maryland since 1980." Roll Call adds, "It may be overly simplistic to say that Steele's strategy for victory is based solely on scrambling Maryland's normal political math — on picking off as many black voters as possible in a state where Democrats have routinely enjoyed 90 percent black support. But a recent day with Steele in the middle-class black enclave of Prince George's County shows just how potent a candidate he can be."

Steele Campaign Manager Resigns. The Washington Post (2/16, B4, Mosk, 744K) reports, "The man hired to run Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele's campaign for U.S. Senate has resigned, an internal move disclosed for the first time yesterday in the aftermath of an off-balance week for the Republican candidate. Campaign manager Graham M. Shafer made a quiet exit earlier this month, citing family obligations, a campaign spokesman confirmed yesterday. His departure highlighted a growing tug within the Steele campaign between the candidate's Washington advisers and his coterie of longtime loyalists from Maryland, of which Shafer was one." The Post adds, "One Washington figure who does know Maryland well, and who is taking a more hands-on role in the campaign, is national GOP Chairman Ken Mehlman, Steele confirmed during a brief interview at the State House yesterday. Mehlman is a native of Pikesville, a suburb north of Baltimore, and he ran President Bush's 2004 reelection campaign before becoming party chairman. He has made electing black Republicans a key goal nationally and has focused considerable personal attention on Steele."

Interest Group Director Criticizes Unions. Rick Berman, executive director of the Center for Union Facts, writes in an op-ed in the Washington Times (2/16, 90K), "Despite the anti-democratic tendencies, the hypocrisy, the corruption and the political machinations of their leaders, unions remain remarkably popular." They hire "temp workers" and "the homeless to picket" for them. "Needless to say, there's no health care or pension plan contributions for these folks." Also, "in 2005 alone, federal racketeering investigations resulted in 196 convictions against union officials and staff, as well as $187 million in fines." Organization now means "union representatives cajole, harass and intimidate workers to sign cards. As soon as half of them sign a card, all of them start paying the union to keep their jobs." Several "titans of American industry all went bankrupt, largely because union bosses were unwilling to back off from unsustainable labor contracts. American workers have been victimized one too many times by union executives. It's time for American workers to ask if they're getting their money's worth."

Venture Capitalists Investing In Education Entrepreneurs. The New York Times (2/16, Flanigan, 1.19M) reports, 'Venture capitalists of Silicon Valley, who have backed hundreds of high-technology entrepreneurs, are eagerly financing a new group these days: schoolmasters. 'We give education entrepreneurs money to start or to speed up building their companies,' said L. John Doerr, who over 26 years has helped start dozens of ventures, including Sun Microsystems, Amazon.com and Google. He help found the New Schools Venture Fund in San Francisco six years ago for a new breed of entrepreneur — the kind who doesn't have to produce a profit. … Recipients of the fund's investments are not whiz kids eager to become the next Bill Gates. Mainly, they are public school teachers with a passion to improve the ways poor children are taught. The companies they form are nonprofit charter school management organizations, capable of running publicly financed elementary and secondary schools that are freed from some rules and regulations in exchange for producing educational results better than those of the large urban school district. Almost all their students are eligible for free or reduced-price breakfasts and lunches."

Maine Subsidized Health Insurance Criticized. Tarren Bragdon, director of health reform initiatives at the Maine Heritage Policy Center, and Adam Brackemyre, assistant director of legislative affairs for the Council for Affordable Health Insurance, write in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.11M) that Maine Gov. John Baldacci's (D) Dirigo Health program, which "the governor claims has saved the state millions of dollars," will cause state taxes to "go...up." Dirigo "is levying a Savings Offset Payment, or SOP -- a remarkably innovative name for a new claims tax -- to 'recover' every dollar that the state says it has 'saved,'" as "without the SOP, Dirigo Health's high costs would bankrupt the program." However, "if Dirigo truly saved money, the program's benefits would exceed its costs." Now, the "legislature held a public hearing for a bill that would forbid insurers from passing along the cost of the SOP to policyholders," which "threatens the very financial viability of the private insurance market in Maine." Instead, "a better alternative for uninsured individuals in Maine is Health Savings Accounts."

Economist Calls For $2 Per Gallon Gasoline Tax. Economist Robert Frank writes in the New York Times (2/16, 1.19M) that a $2 per gallon gasoline tax "whose proceeds were refunded to American families in reduced payroll taxes" would "produce hundreds of billions of dollars in savings for American consumers, significant reductions in traffic congestion, major improvements in urban air quality, large reductions in greenhouse gas emissions, and substantially reduced dependence on Middle East oil." Frank adds, "Proposals of this sort have been advanced frequently in recent years by both liberal and conservative economists. Invariably, however, pundits are quick to dismiss these proposals as 'politically unthinkable.'" Frank adds, "The gasoline tax-cum-rebate proposal enjoys extremely broad support. Liberals favor it. Environmentalists favor it. The conservative Nobel laureate Gary S. Becker has endorsed it, as has the antitax crusader Grover Norquist. President Bush's former chief economist, N. Gregory Mankiw, has advanced it repeatedly. In the warmer weather they will have inherited from us a century from now, perspiring historians will struggle to explain why this proposal was once considered politically unthinkable."

WSJournal Lauds Suits Against "Wal-Mart" Laws. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.11M) editorializes, "America's retailers announced last week that they aren't especially keen to follow the steel, airline and perhaps the auto industries into bankruptcy court" with "two federal lawsuits filed by the Retail Industry Leaders Association against the state of Maryland and Suffolk County, New York. At issue are the "Wal-Mart" laws that both jurisdictions recently passed." This "unusual show of solidarity… suggests more companies are figuring out that organized labor's campaign against Wal-Mart is merely a warm-up to a broader assault" under the "union strategy…to force any competitive, non-unionized company to incur the same labor-induced costs as their own beleaguered employers." Still, "the good news is that the judiciary isn't likely to let such legal gerrymandering stand."

Bush Seeks $75 Million To Promote Democratic Reform In Iran. ABC World News Tonight (2/15, story 5, :45, Sawyer) briefly noted that after her testy hearing before the Senate Foreign Relations committee, "Secretary Rice announced a $75 million program to support democracy in Iran."

Fox News' Special Report (2/15, Rosen) reported, "Secretary Rice came to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee touting the Bush Administration's $100 million program to promote democracy in Iran and lamenting that country's claims to have restarted uranium enrichment." Fox (Rosen) added, "Rice and her aides all steered clear that the US is trying to pursue regime change in Iran. But she said the money will go toward supporting things like exchange programs, indigenous groups inside Iran that promote free thinking. $50 million of the money would subsidize around the clock Farsi language broadcasts inside of Iran."

Reuters (2/16, Hudson) reports, "Bush wants $75 million to try to spur democracy in its adversary Iran, expanding a program that skeptics say can have little effect in the Islamic republic." In congressional testimony Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "said the funds would be used to broadcast U.S. radio and television programs into Iran and help pay for Iranians to study in America, requested the money in a supplemental budget request for fiscal year 2006." $10 million has already been approved by Congress, but experts "are skeptical U.S. efforts to reach out to Iranians can work in a country where America is labeled the 'Great Satan' and believed to be anti-Muslim."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (2/16) reports, "The Bush administration will 'walk a fine line' in seeking punitive international sanctions against Iran's Islamic government over its disputed nuclear program, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Wednesday." Rice "detailed a two-track approach to Iran -- concerted international pressure to deter Tehran from building a bomb, and a newly robust attempt to seed democratic change inside the country with $75 million for broadcasts and aid to dissidents." Yet, "Rice ran into tough questions from lawmakers of both parties...underscoring congressional worries about administration policies throughout the Middle East."

The New York Times (2/16, Weisman, 1.19M) reports, "The scope of the administration's effort goes beyond the numbers. Until now, the United States has been cautious about supporting dissident groups, fearful that Iranians may view these efforts as an echo of past American meddling in Iran's affairs." The Times notes, "Until recently, the administration has been cautious about embracing the 'regime change' approach, but some conservatives at the Defense Department and Vice President Dick Cheney's office are known to be resigned to a nuclear-armed Iran and to argue that the best way to address that problem is by opening Iran to democracy and reform."

The Financial Times (2/16, Dinmore) said the Budget request was a signal the US was setting out "a tougher policy towards Iran." Rice "did not specifically use the words 'regime change'. But her testimony revealed a dual policy of isolating Iran on the international front, including sanctions and interdictions of prohibited shipments, while seeking to weaken the clerical regime from within." Experts "advising the Bush administration say the US has realised that significant opposition to Tehran is unlikely to be generated from exiles so it has sought ways to destabilise the Islamic regime from within." But it "risks damaging the diplomatic unity it has achieved at the United Nations in confronting Iran over its nuclear programme."

The Washington Times (2/16, Kralev, 90K) adds, "Rice said she might shift funds from other programs in the 2007 budget to boost the Iran democracy fund." Senior State Department officials "said Washington has been receiving more support from other countries on pushing democracy in Iran since President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad took office in August."

The Washington Post (2/16, A1, Kessler, 744K) in a front page story says "Rice won bipartisan praise for her handling of negotiations on Iran's nuclear programs, but lawmakers from both parties raised objections to the overall thrust of the administration's Middle East policy."

Bloomberg (2/16, Zacharia) notes Rice "told the panel she plans to visit the Persian Gulf next week to talk about Iran. 'No one wants to see a Middle East that is dominated by an Iranian hegemony, particularly one that has acquired nuclear weapons technology,' she said."

US Threatens Iran With Sanctions. Reuters (2/16, Heinrich) reports, "Threatening new sanctions, the United States accused Iran on Wednesday of defying the world by resuming uranium enrichment for nuclear fuel without resolving suspicions it secretly wants to build atomic bombs." Meanwhile, "Russia urged Iran to change course to allow a compromise. It said Iran had to regain international trust before Moscow would back Tehran's declared right to enrich uranium on its own soil."

Meeting Between Iranian Minister, EU Panel Seen As Possible Return To Dialogue. The AP (2/16, Wielaard) reports, "Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki will meet Monday with the European Parliament's foreign affairs committee." The meeting was suggested by Iran "and showed a readiness in Tehran to 'return to a dialogue' with Europe," the panel's spokesman Thomas Bickel said.

Ahmadinejad Tours Nuclear Facility. The AP (2/16, Dareini) reports, "President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad visited the Natanz uranium enrichment plant Wednesday, a day after Tehran confirmed it had resumed small-scale enrichment there last week, the official news agency reported." His "visit to the plant in central Iran is widely seen as a gesture of support and a morale boost for scientists involved in Iran's uranium enrichment program."

Khamenei Also Has Role In Determining Iranian Nuclear Dispute. Time (2/16, MacLeod) in a web exclusive reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "does not determine Iran's foreign policy alone. It is ultimately in the hands of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, which reports to Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. And despite the Iranian president's defiant posture, the National Security Council has signaled its continuing interest in a negotiated settlement by announcing that an Iranian delegation will visit Moscow next week for talks on a proposed Russian compromise. But with Ahmadinejad turning the nuclear issue into a populist cause, it's far from certain that the more pragmatic heads will prevail."

Rice Defends Administration Middle East Policies. ABC World News Tonight (2/15, story 5, :45, Sawyer) reported Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "had a very rough day on Capitol Hill. Senators from both parties sharply criticized the Administration's policies on Iraq, then Iran, then the Palestinians. Republican Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, was especially blunt." Sen. Hagel: "I don't see, Madame Secretary, how things are getting better. I think things are getting worse. I think they're getting worse. I think they are getting worse in Iraq. I think they're getting worse in Iran." Secretary Rice: "I am optimistic that the United States is seeing Iraqis step up, take responsibility for seniority, take responsibility for controlling their territory."

CNN's The Situation Room (2/15, Blitzer) reported, "Rice took heat from Senators of both parties over the Administration's policies in Iraq, Iran and the Palestinian territories. It was Rice's first congressional testimony in months, and Senators accused the Administration of being too upbeat in its assessment of global hot spots."

Fox News' Special Report (2/15, Hume) reported that Rice got "an earful of criticism from both Democrats and Republicans." While Rice presented the Administration's plans for Iran, "many of Rice's questioners had a different focus. Democrats used the hearing to assail the Administration's conduct of the war in Iraq. … Two Democrats on the panel, Chris Dodd of Connecticut and John Kerry of Massachusetts, at times treated the hearing like a deposition or grand jury inquiry into the CIA leak case."

US Will Continue To Provide Aid To Palestinians, But Not Government. The Wall Street Journal/AP (2/16) reports that in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "provided new detail about the future of U.S. aid to the Palestinians under Hamas. … Rice said the U.S.…would not turn its back on such humanitarian programs as immunizing children against disease." In response to questioning by Sen. George Allen Rice said, "But no money will go to that government." Allen said, "I don't want a penny of taxpayer money going to Hamas." Rice replied, "Neither do I." She "reiterated that message later Wednesday in a private meeting with eight Jewish leaders she invited to the State Department to discuss Hamas and Iran."

Hamas Control Of Security Forces Uncertain. USA Today (2/16, Gutman, 2.31M) reports, "A key issue for the new government will be how to assert control over the Palestinian security forces. Preventive Security, the main intelligence outfit, is one of about 12 Palestinian security departments. All are currently in the hands of people connected to the ruling Fatah Party." And "Some in Hamas may harbor ill will toward security forces that often hunted them. And many of the security agents may balk at working for Hamas." USA Today notes, "If Hamas is unable to exert control over the security forces, it will result in 'significant civil strife,' says Jamil Rabah, director of Near East Consulting."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Mitnick, 61K) reports that "a brewing dispute between the Islamic militants and the deposed Fatah Party is already calling into question the stability of a new government: How will authority be divvied up between the Hamas prime minister's cabinet and the higher-ranking post held by President Mahmoud Abbas?" On Saturday Abbas is expected to deliver a speech calling for Hamas "to embrace his vision for peace with Israel." But "Hamas is expected to remain steadfast in its opposition to Abbas's approach, deepening the divide between Fatah and Hamas lawmakers as negotiations begin to form the new government." One key concern "is who will control the 60,000-strong Palestinian paramilitary police." That may influence "whether the policemen will reinforce Abbas's preference of extending a year-long calm in violence with Israel, or possibly collude with militants to launch new attacks."

Hamas Nominates Members For Senior Legislative Posts. The Washington Times/AP (2/16, Barzak) reports, "The Islamic militant group Hamas said yesterday that it will put together the next Palestinian government by early March -- timing that could help Israeli hawks in parliamentary elections." Hamas' announcement it "would stack top government positions with its own people" may "trigger an Israeli boycott of the Palestinian Authority. Yesterday, Hamas nominated three members for senior legislative posts, including parliament speaker." The AP notes, "In addition to his legislative powers, the speaker would become caretaker president if the elected head of the Palestinian Authority -- Mr. Abbas -- were to die."

Three Protestors Killed In Pakistan During Anti-Cartoon Demonstration. NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 5, 0:10, Williams) reported, "In Pakistan, three days of protests against those controversial cartoons of the prophet Mohammed took a deadly turn again there today. Three people were killed, including an eight-year-old boy, when a massive demonstration turned into a riot."

The Washington Post (2/16, A18, Lancaster, 744K) notes, "Until this week, Pakistani protests over the cartoons had been peaceful and in many cases were supported by elected officials. But as the protests have started to get out of control, officials have changed their tune, warning they will crack down on violence."

Pakistani Politics Influence Protests. The New York Times (2/16, Masood, 1.19M) reports, "The protests have also become enmeshed with Pakistani politics as opposition parties and Islamic groups opposed to the president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, have led the protests and directed the anger over the cartoons into denunciation of General Musharraf's alliance with the West." In response to "mounting public criticism over what many protesters have described as a 'timid response' to the cartoons, the Pakistani cabinet on Wednesday tried damage control by reiterating a condemnation of 'sacrilegious material' in Western newspapers."

Musharraf Says Controversy Eroding Goodwill For West. NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 6, 2:40, Brokaw) reported, "Today's violent riots in Peshawar were another reminder of Pakistan's precarious state. An estimated 70,000 protesters took to the streets of the frontier city, the unofficial capital of Pakistan's radical Muslim movement, the gateway to the tribal region on the Afghan border where the Taliban continue to operate with the support of the local population. For his part Pakistan's President Pervez Musharraf says the cartoon controversy is canceling out much of the goodwill the West gained with its response to Pakistan's devastating earthquakes." Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf: "I think there is a terrible amount of anger. They have forgotten about all the good and they are just talking about this." Brokaw: "What can the West do?" President Musharraf: "There are many people who are voicing support over this. Please they should stop that."

Protests Have Roots In Past Muslim Grievances. The Washington Post (2/16, A1, Shadid, Sullivan, 744K) in an extensive front page story recounting the recent Muslim protests over cartoons reports that "the scope of the fallout tells only one story. The debate over the cartoons is replete with unintended consequences, some still taking shape this week. On one side is a defense of freedom of expression, on the other an unforgivable insult to a sacred figure. In between are potentially longer-lasting repercussions: a rethinking of relations between Europe and the Muslim world, and a rare moment of empowerment among Muslims who have felt besieged. Given the moral certainty pronounced by each party, some in the middle feel forced to take sides, blurring the diversity of religious thought that might offer grounds for compromise." The dispute "illustrates a broader collision of worldviews, often fueled by feelings of Muslim weakness and injury that date back long before the cartoons were published."

USA Today Raises Concerns Over Censorship. USA Today (2/16, 2.31M) editorializes that "the backlash in the Muslims street is driving an ill-considered response in the non-Muslim world, this one against free expression and free speech. Although the Western response is in the name of tolerance and preventing violence, it's a dangerous step toward censorship of ideas that give offense." USA Today notes, "religions have thrived for centuries and withstood the slings of non-believers. Those who would enshrine censorship in the name of tolerance don't give religions enough credit. They also invite censorship of their own beliefs if those who disagree come to power."

EU Leader Warns Core European Values Under Assault. The New York Times (2/16, Bowley, 1.19M) reports, "In the face of escalating attacks against foreigners in the Muslim world by violent critics of cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad, the European Union's chief executive said today that Europe had to fight for its core European values, including freedom of speech." European Commission president José Manuel Barroso "said in an interview that Europe had to defend its right to have in place a system that allowed the publication of the cartoons." Barroso "said European society was based on principles that included equality of rights between men and women, freedom of speech and a clear distinction between politics and religion."

Last MASH Unit To Complete Relief Mission In Pakistan. USA Today (2/16, Wiseman, 2.31M) reports, "The last of the U.S. military's legendary MASH units is completing its final assignment here in the quake-stricken Himalayas -- 3,000 miles from the frozen Korean countryside where Hawkeye Pierce and Trapper John mixed martinis, plotted practical jokes and pursued shapely nurses." Over "the next few weeks, the 212th Mobile Army Surgical Hospital will pull out of Pakistan, donate its Muzaffarabad field hospital to the Pakistani government and return to its home base at the Miesau Army Depot in Germany."

International Consensus Building For Ending Darfur Conflict. The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, McLaughlin, 61K) reports, "Amid new escalation in fighting in the troubled Darfur region of Sudan, with rebels shooting down a government helicopter Tuesday, there's fresh pressure on the international community to step in to help stop the three-year-old conflict." A "consensus is hardening in Western capitals and at the United Nations that the 7,000 African troops now in Darfur…are inadequate." Recently, "UN Secretary General Kofi Annan met with President Bush to push for US support on Darfur. Mr. Bush, who is under pressure from Christian conservatives to act, remained noncommittal. 'We did agree that we need a much more effective force on the ground' to replace AU troops, Mr. Annan said after the meeting, although he didn't mention specifics."

Congress Puts Pressure On Administration Over Sudan. The Hill (2/16, Mikhail) reports, "A bipartisan resolution denouncing both Sudan and the Arab League may place the White House in the difficult position of choosing between strategic and humanitarian interests." The Administration "will face tremendous pressure to support the measure, which expresses disapproval for the Arab League's holding its annual summit in Sudan, to bring attention to what has been deemed by many as genocide in the country's Darfur region. However, such support may undermine U.S. intelligence-sharing with Sudan as well as diplomatic efforts in Darfur and Iraq."

House Panel Criticizes Internet Companies For Aiding Chinese Censors. The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 11, 2:15, Schieffer) reported, "Officials of four of this country's biggest and richest Internet companies, Google, Yahoo!, Microsoft and Cisco, were called into Congress today and criticized for going along with censorship in China. It's the price of doing business." CBS (Hughes) added Rep. Christopher Smith likened "the four companies' cooperation with China to helping Nazi Germany." Rep. Christopher Smith, New Jersey: "If the secret police a half century ago asked where Anne Frank was hiding, would the correct answer to be to hand over the information?" Hughes: "Yahoo! officials admit to handing over information that sent Chinese dissidents to prison." Michael Callahan, senior vice president, Yahoo!: "Ultimately, American companies face a choice: Comply with Chinese laws or leave." Hughes: "But the incentives to stay are enormous, huge money from a huge population: More than 110 million Chinese Internet users and growing. But help for the Chinese web surfers may be on the way." But "apparently, China is feeling the pressure, too. In a rare move, the government tried to publicly defend its Internet controls, something American Internet companies had a hard time doing."

ABC World News Tonight (2/15, story 6, :45, Sawyer) reported, "And still on Capitol Hill, American Internet companies were called on the mat today, and accused of helping China crush dissent. Officials from Microsoft, Google, Yahoo! and Cisco, came under attack for complying with Chinese demands that they restrict Internet access and helping the Chinese government, which spies on its citizens." Rep. Tom Lantos: "My message to these companies today is simple -- your abhorrent activities in China are a disgrace. I simply do not understand how your corporate leadership sleeps at night."

The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Schatz, 2.11M) reports the high-tech executives "repeated arguments that staying in China and other repressive countries -- despite widespread Internet censorship -- does more good than harm for citizens there, as well as helping shareholders. The companies' arguments are similar to those used in the 1980s by companies criticized for doing business in South Africa."

Tech Firms Invite US Government To Provide Regulatory Remedies. The Financial Times (2/16, Kirchgaessner) reports, "Yahoo, Google, Microsoft and Cisco later responded to stinging criticism of their business practices – including accusations that they have 'enthusiastically volunteered for China's censorship brigade' – saying the issue was too big for the companies to tackle on their own and that the US government needed to take a leadership role."

The Washington Post (2/16, D5, Noguchi, 744K) reports, "All the companies invited the U.S. government to negotiate terms that would help them increase their services around the world while protecting the privacy of individual users." Yahoo General Counsel Michael Callahan said, "These issues are larger than any one company, or any one industry." Google vice president of global communications Elliot Schrage said the US "should make censorship a central part of trade negotiations."

The New York Times (2/16, Zeller, 1.19M) notes the request that lawmakers provide a legislative solution "divided members of the subcommittee over where blame lies if companies have gone adrift in China." Rep. Robert Wexler "asked if Congress ought not be ashamed itself, for having granted China trade status as a most favored nation. Mr. Wexler said that it was 'duplicitous' to blame the companies for doing what the government had legally sanctioned them to do, and that the firms were in a 'no-win situation.'" But that "drew an incredulous response from Dana Rohrabacher, a California Republican. 'Most favored nation status?' he said, 'Who lobbied for that? Come on. The corporations did.'"

Agreement Reached On New Haitian Leader.

The New York Times (2/16, Thompson, 1.19M) reports, "The front-runner in last week's presidential election," René Préval "will be declared the winner as part of an agreement by leaders of Haiti's interim government to retabulate the votes, a high-ranking official of the Organization of American States said Wednesday night." The OAS official "said that loopholes in Haitian electoral law allow the government to discard an estimated 85,000 blank ballots included in the original tally. By excluding them, Mr. Préval's lead would increase from 48.7 percent of the votes to slightly more than 51 percent."

Election Materials Found At Dump. The Washington Post/AP (2/16, A22) reports, "U.N. police officers went to a garbage dump near the Haitian capital Wednesday to recover election materials, including numbered bags apparently used to carry results and tally sheets, as charges mounted that last week's presidential election was marred by fraud. Thousands of ballots, including some that were marked, were strewn over about an acre at the dump."

US Reestablishes Dialogue With Venezuela.

Reuters (2/16) reports, "Venezuela and the United States have opened talks after they expelled diplomats this month in a dispute over charges that a U.S. naval attache was spying, U.S. officials said on Wednesday." A "private meeting on Tuesday between U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for Western Hemisphere Affairs Tom Shannon and Venezuela's ambassador in Washington came after fraying diplomatic ties between the two countries hit a new low." U.S. ambassador to Caracas William Brownfield said, "Without a doubt we have established a dialogue."

Bolton Opposes Venezuelan Bid For UN Security Council Seat. Reuters (2/16, Arieff) reports, "Venezuela is stepping up a previously low-key drive for a seat on the U.N. Security Council beginning next year, U.N. diplomats said on Wednesday, prompting criticism from U.S. Ambassador John Bolton." Bolton said, "I don't think it would be conducive to an effective and well-functioning Security Council."

Effort To Reform UN Human Rights Council Delayed.

The Washington Times (2/16, Sands, 90K) reports, "A drive by a bloc of Islamic nations for a global ban on 'defamation of religions and prophets' has thrown a major kink into U.S. hopes for an overhaul of the leading U.N. human rights body." The Islamic proposal "states that 'defamation of religions and prophets is inconsistent with the right to freedom of expression' and that governments and the press have a 'responsibility in promoting tolerance and respect for religious and cultural values.'" But, "Jennifer L. Windsor, executive director of the human rights group Freedom Watch, said the OIC effort was one of a number of attempts by nations and blocs at the United Nations to 'dumb down the human rights standards.'"

EU Defense Agency Faces Funding Shortage.

The Washington Times (2/16, Borowiec, 90K) reports, "The European Union's ambitious plan to create an independent defense force has stumbled into financial difficulties that are likely to delay, if not scuttle, the project. The EU defense agency is looking for an initial $60 million budget to begin weapons research, but contributions have not been forthcoming as some nations argue that NATO should remain the dominant defense pact and trans-Atlantic link, diplomats say." It "has led to an acerbic debate pitting Britain, a staunch NATO supporter, against France, the prime backer of a separate European defense capability."

Health Officials Issue Restrictions After Bird Flu Virus Arrives Early. The New York Times (2/16, Bernstein, Rosenthal, 1.19M) reports, "Health officials across Europe issued restrictions for commercial poultry farms Wednesday after reports that the deadly bird flu virus had turned up at a surprisingly early date in migratory birds in several Western European countries." While "91 people have died after picking up the virus from close contact with birds, the most immediate threat for Europe is an uncontrolled outbreak of the virus among domesticated fowl, which can rapidly decimate a national poultry industry."

Japan Could Be Model For US Energy Conservation. The Washington Post (2/16, A1, Faiola, 744K) reports, "As President Bush calls on Americans to break their addiction to oil and increase energy efficiency in the face of soaring prices, perhaps no people serve as better role models than the energy-miser Japanese." Japan "has set strict new energy-saving targets for 18 kinds of consumer and business electronics. Home and office air conditioners, for instance, must be redesigned to use 63 percent less power by 2008. The targets have sparked a gold rush among electronics makers, who are churning out record numbers of energy-saving -- but higher-priced -- consumer products." Currently "Japan's energy consumption per person is now almost half that of the United States" and Japan's philosophy is "rooted more in economics than environmentalism."

Indian Economic Progress Touted. Harvard professor Martin Feldstein, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Reagan, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.11M) writes, "When President Bush visits India next month, he will see a country that is making remarkable economic progress despite enormous structural problems. … In India he will not see the modern high-rises or the general level of prosperity that he has seen in urban China. But the progress in India is nevertheless real." Feldstein concludes, "The optimistic mood in India's business community, the desire for reforms by the top leadership of the government, and the growing number of relatively middle-class households provide a force for change and a source of support for new entrepreneurial activities. If the political leaders can now persuade the traditional opponents of reform that growth can benefit their constituents and that better new jobs will replace the old, India will see decades of remarkable achievement."

WSJournal Hopes Judge Will Allow Leniency For Cuban Refugees. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.11M) in an editorial writes, "During the Cold War no one would have thought to send a child who had escaped East Germany back across the Berlin Wall. But today the U.S. thinks nothing of sending Cuban refugees intercepted at sea back to Fidel Castro's island tyranny." Fifteen recent refugees "learned that lesson the hard way." They escaped Cuba but "the Coast Guard promptly returned them, with the argument that because the old bridge was severed from the U.S. the Cubans hadn't technically made it to the land of the free. Under a policy invented by the Clinton Administration -- known as 'wet foot-dry foot' -- Cuban refugees who are not walking on land are repatriated." The Journal concludes that "the case may also be a first step toward reviewing a policy that reversed an American tradition of welcoming freedom seekers on the run from dictatorships."

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Opens Internal Probe Of NSA Surveillance Program. The Washington Post (2/16, A4, Eggen, 744K) reports, "The Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility has opened an internal investigation into the department's role in approving the Bush administration's warrantless domestic eavesdropping program, officials said yesterday. … In a letter to Rep. Maurice D. Hinchey (D-N.Y.), Office of Professional Responsibility counsel H. Marshall Jarrett said that his office has 'initiated an investigation' into the Justice Department's role in the NSA surveillance program. The letter, dated Feb. 2 but not received by Hinchey until yesterday, indicates that the probe will include 'whether such activities are permissible under existing law.' But Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said the inquiry will be more limited: 'They will not be making a determination on the lawfulness of the NSA program but rather will determine whether the department lawyers complied with their professional obligations in connection with that program.' … Scolinos also said that 'OPR routinely looks into issues of this kind.'"

The AP (2/16, Barrett) reports, "Marshall Jarrett, the office's counsel, acknowledged the investigation in a letter to Rep. Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y. Jarrett's letter did not specify which of the agency's actions or employees are being examined. … 'You asked this office to investigate the Department of Justice's role in authorizing, approving and auditing certain surveillance activities of the National Security Agency, and whether such activities are permissible under existing law. For your information, we have initiated an investigation,' Jarrett wrote." The AP notes, "Hinchey is one of a few dozen Democratic lawmakers who have been highly critical of the eavesdropping program first revealed in December. … 'We're very happy that the OPR is doing it, because it seems on the surface certain illegal actions may have taken place,' said Hinchey, one of Congress' most outspoken critics of President Bush." The AP notes, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the office routinely looks into issues of this kind. … 'They will not be making a determination on the lawfulness on the NSA program, but rather will determine whether the department's lawyers complied with their professional obligations in connection with examining this program,' Roehrkasse said."The New York Times (2/16, Shane, Lichtblau, 1.19M) reports that the review "is the first formal government inquiry into the surveillance program since its existence was reported by The New York Times in December. … The Justice Department review was begun despite public assurances by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and President Bush that the program is legal and closely monitored by government lawyers."

Gonzales Says Ashcroft, Comey Testimony Will Be Limited. The Washington Post (2/16, A4, Eggen, 744K) reports, "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales signaled in an interview with The Washington Post yesterday that the administration will sharply limit the testimony of former attorney general John D. Ashcroft and former deputy attorney general James B. Comey, both of whom have been asked to appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee regarding the program. 'Clearly, there are privilege issues that have to be considered,' Gonzales said. 'As a general matter, we would not be disclosing internal deliberations, internal recommendations. That's not something we'd do as a general matter, whether or not you're a current member of the administration or a former member of the administration.' 'You have to wonder what could Messrs. Comey and Ashcroft add to the discussion,' Gonzales added."

Specter Challenges Roberts To Offer Legislation On NSA Surveillance. Roll Call (2/16, Pierce) reports, "Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) challenged Senate Intelligence Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) to put his money where his mouth is on the issue of how Congress should act on revelations that President Bush authorized warrantless eavesdropping on domestic electronic communications. Prompted by a reporter to respond to Roberts' recent comments that the Intelligence panel is better suited to deal with any legislation regarding the National Security Agency program, Specter replied, 'I would agree with him, and I would defer to him. Where's the legislation?' Specter is expected this week to rollout his own legislation to allow the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to look into the legality of the program, and he has been holding hearings, most recently with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, to try to determine the scope of the program and whether Congress needs to act more forcefully." Specter "indicated that he is not inclined to delay his own bill while Roberts decides what, if anything, to do."

WPost Praises Efforts To Draft Legislation. An editorial in the Washington Post (2/16, A26, 744K) editorializes, "Congress is feeling its way gingerly as it contemplates the Bush administration's extralegal program of domestic surveillance. That's not surprising. The administration, which kept the program secret from all but eight members of Congress until recently, insists that any congressional inquiry could help the terrorists who are the ostensible targets of the surveillance. Moreover, given changes in technology, it may not be easy to write a law that both permits surveillance activities that make the country safer and protects civil liberties and congressional oversight.

Nonetheless, those twin goals must be served, and the Republicans and Democrats looking for ways to do so are on the right track." The Post concludes, "As much as the administration would prefer otherwise, it is not acceptable simply to have this program continue in the existing legal and regulatory vacuum."

Will Laments Lack Of Checks On NSA Program, Calls For Congress To Authorize Surveillance. George Will writes in the Washington Post (2/16, A27, "The next time a president asks Congress to pass something akin to what Congress passed on Sept. 14, 2001 -- the Authorization for Use of Military Force (AUMF) -- the resulting legislation might be longer than Proust's 'Remembrance of Things Past.' Congress, remembering what is happening today, might stipulate all the statutes and constitutional understandings that it does not intend the act to repeal or supersede. But, then, perhaps no future president will ask for such congressional involvement in the gravest decision government makes -- going to war. … Administration supporters incoherently argue that the AUMF also authorized the NSA surveillance -- and that if the administration had asked, Congress would have refused to authorize it." The argument "that the AUMF contained a completely unexpressed congressional intent to empower the president to disregard the FISA regime is risible coming from this administration. It famously opposes those who discover unstated meanings in the Constitution's text and do not strictly construe the language of statutes." Will adds, that immediately after 9/11, Bush "should have begun surveillance of domestic-to-domestic calls -- the kind the Sept. 11 terrorists made. But 53 months later, Congress should make all necessary actions lawful by authorizing the president to take those actions, with suitable supervision. It should do so with language that does not stigmatize what he has been doing, but that implicitly refutes the doctrine that the authorization is superfluous."

Kondracke Says Administration Should Help Draft Legislation. Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (2/16), "Congress seems to be moving toward a sensible consensus on President Bush's secret National Security Agency surveillance program: Make it legal. Now, Bush should take 'Yes' for an answer. So far, the administration seems stuck on using the president's 'inherent' constitutional authority to tap suspected terrorists, but Bush would be on stronger ground if he agreed with Congress on a plan to establish its legality. Some Democrats still want to investigate Bush for what they see as his breaking the law with the program. But most now seem to accept that it's a valuable anti-terrorism tool that ought to be continued." Kondracke adds that Gonzales "indicated to the Senate Judiciary Committee that he'd listen to suggestions from Congress on legal changes. He ought to sit down with Congressional leaders and help write them."

US Seeks Extradition Of al-Qaeda Suspect From Canada. Reuters (2/16) reports, "The United States has formally requested the extradition of a Canadian man accused of supplying weapons to al Qaeda, but the process could take years, officials said on Wednesday." Reuters continues, "U.S. authorities say Abdullah Khadr, 24, also conspired to kill Americans abroad. Khadr was arrested in Toronto in December two weeks after returning to Canada from Pakistan." Reuters adds, "Khadr is the eldest son of Ahmed Said Khadr, who was an alleged al Qaeda financier and close friend of Osama bin Laden. He was killed in a 2003 gun battle in Pakistan. … Brother Omar Ahmed Khadr is the only Canadian held at the U.S. prison camp at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. … Canada's Justice Department now has 30 days to approve the U.S. request and if it says yes, a court hearing will be held to consider the extradition. Khadr can appeal that decision all the way to the Supreme Court, and it could be a long time before a final ruling is made."

Judge Allows Moussaoui Back Into Courtroom For Juror Questioning. The New York Times (2/16, Lewis, 1.19M) reports, "Zacarias Moussaoui resumed his place in a federal courtroom here on Wednesday and sat quietly as lawyers questioned potential jurors after he apparently reversed course and agreed not to disrupt the proceedings." This after Moussauoi was eject from the courtroom a day earlier after he refused to heed the judge's warnings "to defer to his court-appointed lawyers and stop making speeches about his case."\

The Washington Times (2/16, Seper, 90K) reports, "U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema, who Tuesday barred Moussaoui from ongoing jury selection in the trial's sentencing phase, offered no explanation for her change of mind -- and made no mention of his prior behavior to potential jurors in the death-penalty case."

The AP (2/16, Sniffen) reports that Judge Brinkema "had barred Moussaoui from jury selection Tuesday because he wouldn't promise to stop giving insult-laden speeches. … Brinkema did not explain her change of mind in court, but she had said the day before that she might reconsider if Moussaoui decided to alter his behavior. Even Moussaoui's court-appointed defense lawyers did not know why she changed her mind." The AP adds, "Fifteen of the 24 prospective jurors interviewed Wednesday were qualified for service - three over defense objections and one over government protest. Identified only by number, they were ordered to return March 6 when lawyers will exercise peremptory - or unexplained - strikes to whittle the pool to 12 jurors and six alternates. More potential jurors will be selected between now and March 6."

The Richmond Times-Dispatch (2/16, Bradley) reports, "Moussaoui exhibited none of the disruptive behavior that has characterized earlier courtroom appearances. Clad in a jail-issued green jumpsuit and white skullcap, he sat alone at a table behind his court-appointed defense team. … But in a continued show of defiance, he remained seated when the court clerk called out 'all rise' as Brinkema left the bench. He muttered 'God curse America' to spectators as federal marshals led him out of the courtroom at the lunchtime break. … He never spoke to his lawyers, with whom he has refused to cooperate. He once asked marshals for a drink of water and peered into the cup as if the drink had been tainted before taking a sip."

Pentagon Probe Found No Pre-9/11Information On Atta. The Washington Times (2/16, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "The Pentagon's top intelligence official told Congress yesterday that his investigation turned up no chart or photo depicting hijacker Mohamed Atta before the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, but a Republican lawmaker accused the Bush administration of ignoring evidence." The testimony from Stephen Cambone, undersecretary of defense for intelligence, "did not appear to answer the question about whether Able Danger singled out Atta as an al Qaeda-connected operative more than a year before the attacks." Rep. Curt Weldon "has been on a campaign to prove that such an identification was made. 'There has been no investigation,' Mr. Weldon said during a hearing in which several members deferred their 10-minute allotment to him. 'There has been no analysis by the 9/11 commission or anyone else.'"

Documents Reveal Internal Al Qaeda Struggles. USA Today (2/16, Diamond, 2.31M) reports, "Recently captured al-Qaeda documents portray terrorist leaders struggling over strategy, facing challenges by subordinates and issuing guidelines listing minimum qualifications for terrorism training camp supervisors. Drawn from a classified database called 'Harmony' compiled by the U.S. Special Operations Command, the documents were disclosed in a report released this week by West Point's Combating Terrorism Center." The documents "show al-Qaeda is committed to waging a holy war against 'dictators of the Earth and secular groups' that will end only when 'everyone believes in Allah.'"

Holy Land Foundation Prosecutors Mistakenly Disclosed Classified Records. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Krikorian, 958K) reports, "Federal officials in Dallas mistakenly disclosed classified counter-terrorism information in a breach of national security that could also threaten one of the country's biggest terrorism prosecution cases, newly unsealed court records show. The blunder exposed secret wiretap requests that commonly include classified information from U.S. agencies, foreign intelligence reports and confidential sources. The criminal case involves officials of the Texas-based Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, a now-defunct Islamic charity with alleged ties to terrorists. Its assets were frozen by the Treasury Department three months after the Sept. 11 attacks." The Times adds, "Disclosure that the government erred in sharing secret intelligence on the case came to light when court files were unsealed this week. The mistake occurred nearly a year ago but was not previously disclosed. KTVT-TV in Dallas first reported the security breach late Tuesday."

CIA Operative Says He Could Have Captured Bin Laden. The Washington Post (2/16, C1, Leiby, 744K) reports on Gary Berntsen, a CIA field operative who was dispatched to Afghanistan in October 2001. By Berntsen's telling, "he could have gotten Osama bin Laden -- if only they'd given him the troops and the time to get the job done." In his book "Jawbreaker" Berntsen provides a "score-settling insider's account of how bin Laden eluded capture at Tora Bora that December."

Guantanamo Prison Said To Be "At A Crossroads." The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Richey, 61K) reports that the US prison camp at Guantanamo Bay "is at a crossroads. Will it return to its roots: a kind of rights-free zone where Al Qaeda suspects are interrogated with little judicial oversight? Or will it become an ever stronger magnet for vigorous legal challenges, based on alleged violations of international human rights, the Geneva accords, American law, and US constitutional protections?" The matter "is before two key courts, whose rulings will help define not just the scope of judicial oversight at Guantánamo, but perhaps also the role of America's system of divided government in wartime." The Monitor adds, "The first indication of how the courts may view Guantánamo's future role will probably come from the Supreme Court. On Friday, the justices are scheduled to consider at their closed-door conference a Bush administration motion that the high court dismiss the case of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a former driver for Osama bin Laden. Mr. Hamdan's case is one of the most important of the high court's current term. It is a test of the legality of President Bush's military commission process."

Al Qaeda Training Camp Photos To Be Key US Evidence At Hayat Trials. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/16, Thompson) reports, "The government has satellite images of a suspected al-Qaida training camp that federal prosecutors say was attended by" Hamid Hayat, and the photos are "expected to be a key part of the government's case" against Hayat and his father, Umer. The AP notes, "A jury was seated Wednesday for the trial of Hamid Hayat," and "opening statements were expected to begin Thursday."

Umer Hayat's "portion of the trial is to begin next week before a separate jury that was seated Tuesday."

Al Arian Retrial Will Begin In April If US Decides To Proceed. The AP (2/16, Stacy) reports, "Sami Al-Arian's second trial -- if there is one -- will begin sometime in April, according to a federal court filing Wednesday. Federal prosecutors haven't announced definitively whether they will retry the former University of South Florida professor on remaining charges of aiding Palestinian terrorists," and "also still at issue is who would represent Al-Arian if there is a second trial. His attorneys, William Moffitt and Linda Moreno, asked the court last month to allow them to withdraw from the case. A U.S. magistrate has not yet ruled on the request."

Blair Wins Parliamentary Vote On Anti-Terror Law. The New York Times (2/16, Cowell, 1.19M) reports that British Prime Minister Tony Blair "secured victory in the House of Commons on Wednesday in a vote to expand counterterrorism laws by making 'glorification' of terrorism a criminal offense. Legislators voted 315 to 277 in a ballot that pitted Mr. Blair's Labor Party against the Conservative and Liberal Democratic opposition. Seventeen Labor dissidents voted against the measure.'

The Washington Post (2/16, A14, Sullivan, 744K) reports, "The measure, called the terrorism bill, still must be approved by the House of Lords, which voted last month to strip the 'glorification' clause out of it. It was unclear whether the Lords would continue to object to the proposal on grounds that it infringes on civil liberties or back down in the face of Wednesday's clear margin of victory."

The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Daniszewski, 958K) reports, "Despite its earlier opposition, the House of Lords is expected to defer to the more powerful House of Commons when it takes up the measure again. The two chambers must reach agreement for it to become law."

German Court Overturns Law On Shoot-Down Of Hijacked Planes. The Washington Post (2/16, A15, Whitlock, 744K) reports, "Germany's highest court overturned a law Wednesday that had authorized the government to shoot down hijacked civilian airliners, ruling that it was unconstitutional to sacrifice the lives of passengers to protect potential targets of a terrorist attack. … The law was challenged by opponents who argued that the constitution forbids the military from endangering the lives of German citizens or exercising domestic police powers." The Post adds, "German lawmakers from the ruling party, the Christian Democratic Union, said they would try to amend the constitution to revive the law, but many other members of Germany's coalition government are opposed to that. Changing the constitution would require a two-thirds vote by Parliament."

Escaped Al Qaeda Prisoners Becoming Folk Heroes In Yemen. The New York Times (2/16, Fattah, 1.19M) reports, "Almost two weeks after 23 prisoners suspected of terrorist ties broke out of a maximum-security prison here, the fugitives are emerging as unlikely folk heroes: the men who thumbed their noses at the Yemeni government and, more significantly, at America. … A nationwide manhunt continued Wednesday as the Yemeni government offered a $25,000 reward for information leading to the arrest of the 13 people suspected of being operatives of Al Qaeda among the escapees. Side streets leading to the prison remained blocked off, while security men patrolled in and around the mosque where the men emerged."

PATRIOT ACT:

Feingold May Try To Amend Patriot Act. The AP (2/16, Kellman) reports, "Faced with losing his bid to block the USA Patriot Act, Sen. Russell Feingold is preparing a last-ditch strategy to amend the legislation with stronger safeguards against government intrusion and more frequent congressional oversight." The AP continues, "The effort is unlikely to succeed. Most senators, including the leaders of his party, are expected to vote for the White House-brokered deal that supporters say makes the most changes possible without jeopardizing passage before the terrorism-fighting law expires March 10. … 'The outcome here is absolutely predetermined,' said Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., expressing frustration with the Feingold-led delay. 'It's going to pass with overwhelming support.' … Still, Feingold, D-Wis., stuck to his objections, saying protracted talks with the White House over the law's protections for civil liberties had produced only a 'fig leaf' to cover weaknesses that leave people vulnerable to government intrusion. … 'What we are seeing is quite simply a capitulation to the intransigent and misleading rhetoric of a White House that sees any effort to protect civil liberties as a sign of weakness,' Feingold said during a floor speech Wednesday." The AP notes, "Without any apparent supporters for his filibuster, Feingold agreed to Frist's insistence on holding a procedural test vote Thursday that would clear the way for Senate debate on the legislation. Frist said the Senate would hold its final votes at the end of the month, when Congress returns from a weeklong recess. … During the process, Feingold will try to introduce several amendments that would strengthen protections for civil liberties. One would set a four-year expiration date on the use of so-called national security letters under the Patriot Act - secret government requests for information, according to Feingold's office. … Another would require the government to notify the subject of a secret search within seven days or obtain court permission to maintain the secrecy for a longer period, rather than the 30-day requirement in the legislation being considered."

Knight Ridder distributes a Milwaukee Journal Sentinel story (2/16, Gilbert) that reports, "Feingold was the only senator to vote against the act in 2001. But other lawmakers later joined him in criticizing the law and calling for curbs on the government's new police powers. Late last year, four Republicans joined Feingold and every other Democrat in the Senate in blocking renewal of the bill, saying it didn't do enough to protect civil liberties. … But in recent weeks, the White House agreed to some relatively small changes in the measure. As a result, Feingold's four Republican allies and a number of Democrats dropped their opposition, making its passage inevitable. … Feingold, however, has vowed to use every parliamentary move against the proposal. After he began his filibuster Wednesday, an agreement was struck to put off reauthorization of the Patriot Act until March."

CQ (2/15, Sandler) notes Feingold "drew a frustrated response from Majority Leader Bill Frist," who "referred to Feingold's filibuster…as one of several 'insufferable attempts to put off the nation's business.' … Feingold expressed a similar sense of frustration. He said he had tried all day long, to no avail, to get Frist to agree to let him offer a few amendments," which he hopes to bring to a vote today. However, "it does not appear that will happen. The Senate will vote Thursday morning on limiting debate on the motion to proceed to the bill changing the conference report," and "after that, a cloture vote on the bill would come Feb. 28, and then a vote on final passage March 1."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush To Seek Additional $4.2 Billion For Louisiana Recovery. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Gaouette, 958K) reports, "In an unexpected breakthrough in negotiations with Louisiana officials, the Bush administration announced Wednesday that President Bush would ask Congress for an additional $4.2 billion to help the state repair and rebuild homes battered by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. Federal support for housing reconstruction, which has been the subject of protracted negotiations between Washington and local officials, is considered a prerequisite for wider recovery because it opens the way for thousands of displaced people to return to New Orleans and surrounding areas. … Louisiana officials had complained that the administration wasn't providing enough housing help to allow the region to recover fully. On Wednesday, there was nothing but praise for the president." In thanking President Bush Wednesday, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco "pledged…to use the money to build a 'safer and smarter Louisiana.'"

The New York Times (2/16, Dao, Drew, 1.19M) reports, "The $4.2 billion request was a turnabout for the administration, which three weeks ago rejected legislation proposed by Representative Richard H. Baker, a Louisiana Republican, to create a nonprofit group to buy out flooded homes, the plan favored by Ms. Blanco. … Last week, Ms. Blanco threatened to try to block a federal sale of oil and gas leases off the Gulf Coast, saying it was 'time to play hardball.' But in the past week, state officials said, Donald E. Powell, the president's coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding, became convinced that the federal government should do more to help homeowners in the flood plain who did not have flood insurance."

More Funding, Property Buyout Plan Sought By State Lawmakers. CQ (2/15, Higa) reported, "Blanco praised Bush for requesting the additional money. But she also urged the administration to drop its opposition to legislation (HR 4100) offered by Rep. Richard H. Baker, R-La., that would create a government program to buy and redevelop hurricane-damaged properties. Baker, who along with Louisiana Sens. Mary L. Landrieu, a Democrat, and David Vitter, a Republican, testified Wednesday to the Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee on his plan and Louisiana's needs, released a statement reiterating 'the need for a comprehensive plan that includes property buyouts and federal resources to make it work.'" Meanwhile, Landrieu said, "The Bush administration…previously promised an additional $18 billion in relief. 'The $4.2 billion proposed today represents about 23 percent of that sum,' Landrieu said. 'I look forward to seeing the administration's plans for the remaining 77 percent.'"

Blanco Puts Aside Plan To Shrink New Orleans Government. Meanwhile, the AP (2/16, Deslatte) reports Blanco "abandoned for now her push to shrink New Orleans' government after the proposal ran into strong opposition during a special legislative session on hurricane relief. … The measure by House Speaker Joe Salter would have consolidated the city's century-old network of two elected sheriffs, two elected clerks of court and two court systems. It passed the House overwhelmingly and was scheduled for a hearing Wednesday in a Senate committee." The AP notes, "Blanco is continuing to press other proposals, including a measure to consolidate Louisiana's levee boards under state control."

Some Democrats Question Blanco's Viability, Push For Breaux To Enter Race. Roll Call (2/16, Whittington) reports, "As a House committee marked up the final version of the Hurricane Katrina report Wednesday on Capitol Hill, there was growing concern among Louisiana Democrats over the viability of Gov. Kathleen Blanco's (D) political future and whether the party can find another candidate to coalesce behind before the 2007 gubernatorial election. The first evidence of that movement became public this week, as pressure began to mount on former Sen. John Breaux (D) to consider re-entering political life and running for governor next year. There is little question that Breaux, who retired from the Senate in 2004 and remains widely popular back home, would be difficult to beat if he runs. However, many veteran Bayou State politicos remain doubtful that he has the desire to get back in the game." Roll Call adds, 'Some of the pressure for Democrats to find a consensus alternative to Blanco is being fueled by the behind-the-scenes machinations of Rep. Bobby Jindal (R-La.), who narrowly lost to Blanco in a 2003 runoff and is preparing for another run next year."

Chertoff, Rumsfeld Reportedly Don't Use E-Mail. Newsweek (2/16, Hosenball) reports in a web exclusive, that "congressional investigations of government responses to Hurricane Katrina have revealed that two of the nation's key crisis managers, the secretaries of Defense and Homeland Security, do not use e-mail." Newsweek continues, "The House committee established to investigate Katrina was 'informed that neither Secretary Chertoff nor Secretary Rumsfeld use e-mail,' reported Reps. Charlie Melancon and William Jefferson, two Louisiana Democrats who participated in the inquiry despite a boycott by other House Democrats who felt that the inquiry was too partisan. … Spokesmen for the two officials maintain that Rumsfeld and Chertoff were kept informed during Katrina the same way as they keep in touch during other crises: through aides and a variety of other communications methods. 'This is a large organization with a very competent staff that that kept the secretary well informed on Defense Department operations throughout Katrina,' Bryan Whitman, a Defense spokesman, told NEWSWEEK. Brian Besanceney, Chertoff's top spokesman, said: 'Every senior DHS official knows that, if they have important information to convey to the secretary, they go to his office or pick up the phone.'"

Senate Panel Blasts Chertoff's Handling Of Hurricane Katrina Disaster. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff faced harsh criticism yesterday before a Senate panel for his department's performance during and after Hurricane Katrina. CBS also interviewed Chertoff, who did not respond directly when asked if he had offered to resign over the Katrina disaster. Meanwhile, a House panel released a report that criticized all levels of government, calling the response to the storm "a national failure, where leaders failed to lead."

ABC World News Tonight (2/15, story 4, 2:20, Sawyer) reported House and Senate Committees "blasted the Federal Government's response to Hurricane Katrina, calling it a monumental failure. They aimed their anger at the Bush Administration's senior emergency management official, the head of Homeland Security, Michael Chertoff, charging that faster action, better planning and better communication could have spared lives." ABC (Thomas) added, "There was a stunning revelation that the top two officials in charge of responding to Katrina, former FEMA Director Michael Brown and Secretary Chertoff, were at odds at the moment of crisis." Sen. Collins: "I have an e-mail in which your staff is complaining to Michael Brown's staff that you have lost all contact with Michael Brown for two days. And this is a critical two days. Michael Brown testified before this committee that he found your phone calls to be annoying, disruptive." Thomas: "Lack of communication and coordination was a constant theme. Chertoff says he found out the levees broke in New Orleans, a full day after FEMA officials knew." House Republicans also "issued a 600-page report that can be summed up in one word -- failure, and at every level."

The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 5, 1:55, Schieffer) reported, "Chertoff was getting beaten up by senators from both parties, one of them saying the disaster workers ran around like Keystone cops." CBS (Attkisson) added the senators were "methodically challenging Chertoff on his mindset before, during, and after Katrina's landfall, like why he went to a bird flu conference the day after Katrina hit." Chertoff was "also criticized in a scathing report issued on the House side today and it was Republican Tom Davis who lambasted the White House." Rep. Tom Davis, Virginia: "I think the White House attitude is that they were monitoring this and they were disengaged and this was Homeland Security's responsibility. And I think that's a copout to a great extent."

NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 3, 2:15, Reid) reported, "On day one of Hurricane Katrina, as water poured into New Orleans, Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff testified today he was unaware the levies had breached, even though dozens of emails show many other government officials did know." Chertoff "told frustrated senators he didn't learn of the breeches until the next morning but still decided to stick to his schedule and fly to Atlanta for a conference on avian flu."

The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 7, 1:55, Schieffer) interviewed Chertoff following his senate hearing. CBS (Schieffer) reported Chertoff discussed "what he conceded was a very rough day. Well, Mr. Secretary, you took quite a pounding up there today. Was it deserved?" Michael Chertoff, Secretary of Homeland Security: "This terrible disaster occurred on the first six months of my watch, and I've got to take responsibility for it. And I'm interested in hearing the criticism, but what I'm really interested in is using that criticism as a basis to get ourselves prepared for what is around the corner this next hurricane season or some other natural or manmade disaster." Schieffer: "Well, let me just put it to you this way: There are a lot of rumors that your job is on the line here. Have you actually offered your resignation to the President?" Secretary Chertoff: "You know, the President understands, of course, and I understand, that I serve at his pleasure. As long as he thinks that I make a contribution, I am happy to serve him."

The New York Times (2/16, Lipton, 1.19M) reports Chertoff "endured two and a half hours of intense personal criticism Wednesday by Senate Republicans and Democrats investigating the response to Hurricane Katrina, several of whom said he bore responsibility for a multitude of errors that prolonged the suffering of Gulf Coast residents. The rebuke was a painful turnabout for Mr. Chertoff, a former federal judge who was unanimously confirmed a year ago to take over the department and until recently had largely escaped blame for the government's flawed response to the storm." Chertoff "acknowledged that he and his department had failed to respond adequately to the disaster, citing management lapses, improper deployment of staff and the unreliable delivery of disaster relief supplies. He said that his department had moved far too slowly to evacuate the refugees who packed the New Orleans Superdome and, later, the city's convention center." The Times notes, "Both Democrats and Republicans on the committee told him they appreciated his candor and willingness to accept blame, contrasting it with the testimony on Friday by Mr. Brown."

The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Neuman, Chen, 958K) reports while fielding "a withering barrage of congressional criticism," Chertoff "vowed to do better, referring to an array of reforms that he has initiated. Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Me.), chairwoman of the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs, said in her opening remarks that her panel's latest hearing was intended not only to learn why Chertoff's vast agency was 'plagued by indecision and delay,' but also to avoid a repeat of the fiasco." While "he accepted responsibility for his department's shortcomings," Chertoff "also pointed out the extraordinary nature of the hurricane and urged lawmakers to not overlook 'things that succeeded.'" Chertoff added "that within months of taking over the newly created department, he set out to streamline its operations, targeting Oct. 1 as a deadline. 'Unfortunately, Katrina didn't wait until Oct. 1,' he said." The Times adds, 'Today's hearing served as the latest reminder of how his department's response to Katrina has tarnished Chertoff's reputation just a year after he took office. … Now some question whether he can survive in the job."

Under the headline "Homeland Security Misled Before Storm, Chertoff Says," the Washington Times (2/16, Hudson, 90K) reports Chertoff "said key officials were informed of the possible devastation of Hurricane Katrina days before the storm hit but were misled on emergency precautions in place." He "described his conversations with ousted Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) director Michael D. Brown as 'heated' more than a day after the storm struck and the New Orleans levee system failed. In those discussions, Mr. Chertoff said he was 'nudging, prodding, poking and ultimately raising my voice about buses on Wednesday, [which] led to a decision by the deputy and me on Thursday that we needed to simply take this away and get it done ourselves.' … Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican and chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Government Oversight Committee, said the biggest mistake was in keeping Mr. Brown on the job despite his objections to his agency's restructuring and its role in emergency planning."

USA Today (2/16, Hall, 2.31M) reports, "Chertoff told senators he accepts responsibility for 'many lapses' during the catastrophe," but "deflected some blame to former Federal Emergency Management Agency director Michael Brown. He said he would not have named Brown to lead the response if he had known then 'what I know now about Mr. Brown's agenda.'" Chertoff also "defended his decision to fly to Atlanta for an avian flu meeting the day after the storm. He insisted it wasn't proof he was disengaged from the crisis."

Reuters (2/16, Smith) reports, "The report released by a US House of Representatives panel was a rare criticism of the administration by congressional Republicans. It said the response to the hurricane, which killed 1,200 people and destroyed about 300,000 homes, was 'a failure of initiative. It was a failure of leadership.'" The report added that the President "did not receive adequate advice and counsel from senior staff during the crisis. 'Federal agencies, including (the Department of Homeland Security), had varying degrees of unfamiliarity with their roles and responsibilities,' the report concluded." In testimony before the Senate, "Chertoff noted Bush declared the Gulf coastal region a disaster area before the storm hit landfall and said that action was unprecedented. Despite preparations for the storm, he said the agency was quickly overtaken by events. 'We now know our capabilities were simply overwhelmed by the magnitude of this storm,' Chertoff said."

Report Finds DHS Suffered From Staffing Shortages. In its "Federal Diary" column, the Washington Post (2/16, B2, Barr, 744K) reports that one of the "biggest" ways "Katrina overwhelmed the Department of Homeland Security…involved staffing. When the monster storm hit, the department was short-handed. That's one of the key findings in a report released yesterday by the House committee that investigated preparations for and the response to Katrina, which hit New Orleans and much of the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29. … The staffing woes were particularly evident at the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which has about 2,500 full-time employees." Meanwhile, "FEMA scored second to last among government agencies in a 2005 survey of job satisfaction, the report notes. The report also says Homeland Security officials 'were unable to maintain their ranks of disaster professionals, through employee retention, development or recruitment, and this failure hindered the response to Hurricane Katrina.'"

House Report Prompts Legislative Initiatives. CQ (2/15, Starks) reported, "The report's release triggered legislative initiatives that touch on nearly every aspect of the response to the disaster. The House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee will soon begin moving legislation expected to call for the Department of Homeland Security to relinquish control of FEMA. The House Appropriations Subcommittee on Homeland Security will likely look to boost funding for the embattled agency." Meanwhile, "House Democratic leaders commended the work of the GOP-dominated panel whose five-month investigation they had boycotted, fearing a partisan whitewash. But they renewed their calls Wednesday for an independent panel, arguing that the committee failed to press the White House hard enough for documents."

Report's Findings "Swept Up In…Election-Year Politics." The Washington Post (2/16, A3, Hsu, 744K) reports that the House panel report's "findings were quickly swept up in divisive election-year politics and the complex task of rebuilding the devastated Gulf Coast. Rep. Thomas M. Davis III "said that Congress and the White House are ready to debate proposals to restructure national emergency plans, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the federal flood insurance program, and laws that spawned a bungled $2 billion-plus effort to temporarily house evacuees. But Democrats from hard-hit Louisiana and Mississippi, backed by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), said such changes, while needed, would do nothing to hold Bush administration officials accountable or speed help to 2 million victims of the Aug. 29 storm. Democrats renewed calls for an independent investigation, and accused the GOP of corruption, citing FEMA and US Army Corps of Engineers relief contracts with firms tied to associates of President Bush." The Post adds, "The partisan political maneuvering underscored the limitations of yesterday's House report."

Columnist Says Chertoff Demonstrated "Qualified Personal Responsibility." Dana Milbank, in his column for the Washington Post (2/16, A2,, 744K) writes, "President Bush in 2000 ushered in the Era of Personal Responsibility. Yesterday ushered in the Era of Qualified Personal Responsibility. In hours-long testimony before a Senate committee, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said he took the blame for the department's failures responding to Hurricane Katrina. 'I am responsible for the Department of Homeland Security,' came the inevitable claim. 'I'm accountable and accept responsibility for the performance of the entire department.'" However, Chertoff could not "come up with much in the way of what he had done wrong." Milbank continues that "from the start of his appearance before the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee yesterday, Chertoff interspersed claims of responsibility with assignments of blame elsewhere. He blamed the weather. 'This was a storm of unprecedented magnitude,' he said, rattling off statistics. He blamed the department he inherited, which, 'barely two years old, had a lot of work to do.' He added: 'Frankly, FEMA was strained in past emergencies.' Mostly, though, he blamed subordinates. 'I was conscious of the fact that although I'm the secretary, I'm not a hurricane operator,' Chertoff explained. 'I do not have 30 years of experience managing hurricanes, and I do not see myself in a position to contradict or second-guess operational decisions.' Chertoff did blame himself for one thing: trusting then-FEMA director Mike 'Brownie' Brown."

Chertoff's Job Said To Be Safe. Bloomberg (2/16, Bliss) reports, "Senators were uniformly critical of the Homeland Security Department's response to the storm, and most said Chertoff should have done more in its aftermath to ease the suffering of Americans who lacked basic necessities. Still, none went so far as Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, who said early last month that Chertoff should step down. Thomas Mann, a political analyst at the Brookings Institution in Washington, said Chertoff's job is safe. President George W. Bush 'likens forced resignations to an admission of culpability on his part,' Mann said. The president probably has gone as far as he's willing with the resignation of FEMA's former director, Michael Brown, Mann said."

More Commentary. Under the headline "A Deadly Vacuum," the New York Times (2/16, 1.19M) editorializes, "In the Bush administration, there is no such thing as failure at the top. When something goes wrong because of bad leadership, punishment is meted out to the foot soldiers and middle management, while the people in charge remain unscathed. Now we'll see whether the rule holds true in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina." Following the House panel's report, "one thing is clear. While there is no shortage of incompetent public officials involved in this tragedy, one stands out above the rest. That person is Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. According to the panel's report, Mr. Chertoff has 'primary responsibility for managing the national response to a catastrophic disaster,' yet he handled his decision-making responsibilities 'late, ineffectively, or not at all.'" The Times continues, "Now Mr. Chertoff and his opposite number inside the White House are proposing changes to FEMA, including a new professional response force. While this is a good idea in and of itself, big organizational solutions will not help if there is a leadership vacuum. It would be nice for the administration to finally send a message that if important people do a bad job, they go away."

Senator Places Hold On Increase In Flood Insurance Program Borrowing. The Hill (2/16, Schor) reports, "The House yesterday sliced about $400 million from a bill increasing the National Flood Insurance Program's borrowing authority, sending the bill back to the Senate for final approval, but an anonymous senator immediately placed a hold on the bill. The program has estimated that it will no longer be able to pay claims for policyholders hit by Hurricane Katrina if borrowing authority is not increased within the next few weeks, but the Senate hold could forestall final passage of the flood-insurance bill until March, requiring insurance companies to stop paying flood claims underwritten by the government. One lobbyist working for a swift increase in borrowing authority pointed to Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) as the likely source of the hold, saying Snowe is seeking recourse against a hold placed by Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) on extra home heating aid to the Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Program (LIHEAP)."

New Orleans Attorneys Feels Effects Of Katrina. The National Law Journal (2/16, Jones) reports, "Walk along the main streets of New Orleans' French Quarter and you will find restaurants and bars ready for business, with music spilling out of their open doors. Tables are set, ceiling fans are churning and servers stand poised for customers. … A few blocks away, in the business district, the town's streetcars have begun again to lumber past upscale shops, the Aquarium of the Americas and Harrah's casino. … But the streetcars roll along eerily empty for the most part, and many of the retail businesses remain boarded up. … 'What's worse than the devastation is that all of the people are gone,' said attorney William Rittenberg during a recent drive through the French Quarter. A small-firm practitioner who has worked in New Orleans for 35 years, he said he had not taken a paycheck from his six-attorney firm since Hurricane Katrina struck. … 'I worry about whether I can remain here,' he said." The Journal adds, "Rittenberg, a partner with Rittenberg & Samuel, is just one of thousands of New Orleans lawyers whose jobs took a drastic turn in September. As a small-firm lawyer, he is struggling to make a living in a town where much of his client base has disappeared. Other attorneys, such as Gary Elkins, who runs a midsize practice in the business district, and Richard Dicharry, chairman of 248-attorney Phelps Dunbar, have found, at least for now, former work replaced with rebuilding efforts and disputes arising from the destruction. … Whatever the size of the firm these New Orleans lawyers come from -- whether it is a solo practice, a large operation or somewhere in between -- the path their lives have taken five months after the storm-like-no-other has been marked with despondency and with hope."

NYTimes Opposes Use Of UAE Company For Port Security Operations. An editorial in the New York Times (2/16, 1.19M) says, "The Bush administration has done far too little to protect the nation's ports against terrorists. But it has taken that laxness to a new level by allowing a company from the United Arab Emirates to run significant operations at six American ports, including the Port of New York. The administration should reverse this decision." The Times adds, "Much remains to be done to protect the nation's ports against terrorism. Putting port management in the hands of a country with such a mixed record in the war on terror is a step in the wrong direction."

WAR NEWS:

Australian TV Airs New Pictures Of Abu Ghraib Prison Abuse. The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 9, 1:50, Schieffer) reported additional pictures of abuse of Iraqi prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison "have surfaced and some of them turn out to be worse than what we saw before." CBS (Martin) added, "Perhaps the most disturbing shows a deranged prisoner slamming his head into a cell door while someone takes pictures, but no one tries to stop him. Many of the pictures show the same kinds of abuse seen in the original photos which triggered the Abu Ghraib scandal. Iraqis subjected to sexual humiliation and shackled in positions tantamount to torture. The Pentagon has about 200 photos from inside Abu Ghraib, and it has steadfastly refused to release them, even going to court to stop some of them from getting out, arguing they would ignite anti-American violence. With Muslims still demonstrating and rioting over the publication of a cartoon making fun of the Prophet Muhammad, and with new revelations of a video showing British troops abusing Iraqi teenagers, these photos, in the words of a senior American official in Iraq, 'could not have come at a worse time.'"

The Financial Times (2/16, Tucker, Sevastopulo) reports an Australian television station yesterday broadcast these "previously unpublished images said to show physical abuse of Iraqi prisoners at the US-run prison near Baghdad. Bryan Whitman, deputy Pentagon spokesman, said the images would 'further inflame and possibly incite unnecessary violence in the world.'"

The New York Times (2/16, Stout, 1.19M) reports "the State Department legal adviser, John B. Bellinger III, said the latest pictures 'show once again just the reprehensible conduct that was going on in Abu Ghraib.'" He "noted that after the instances of abuse in late 2003 and their disclosure early in 2004 there had been public investigations, prosecutions and internal reviews. 'And it's unfortunate, in fact, that these photographs are coming out further and fanning the flames,' he said. Images from the Australian broadcast were shown in the Middle East."

The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Dreazen, 2.11M) says "the images also appeared to raise new questions about the extent of the abuse at the prison. One of the photos aired by the Australian network showed a prisoner lying dead on the ground in a pool of blood, while another sequence showed a corpse in a blood-smeared room that the network said had been used by the Central Intelligence Agency for interrogations. All told, the segment showed images of six corpses, though it was not clear how each had died. Other photos showed prisoners with wounds that appear to have been caused by shotgun pellets."

The Washington Post (2/16, A20, White, 744K) reports "Pentagon officials emphasized that the photographs had been part of investigations that led to the punishment of several military police soldiers who worked at the prison. 'We can confirm that 13 of the 14 images released by the Australian television outlet are authentic,' said Col. Joseph Curtin, an Army spokesman at the Pentagon. 'The Army condemns the abusive behavior depicted in these photos and has taken aggressive action to prosecute those held accountable. Nonetheless, these are not new images and are included in the Abu Ghraib criminal case files.'"

Tapes Reveal Saddam, Top Iraqi Leadership Discussing Terrorism, WMD. Tapes from the mid-1990s recovered by the CIA in Baghdad reveal former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and members of his cabinet discussing the possibility of terrorist attacks – conducted by others – using weapons of mass destruction in the US. The tapes show the top Iraqi leadership discussing WMD and how they used deception in dealing with UN inspectors.

ABC World News Tonight (2/15, story 7, 3:45, Ross) reported, "'Terrorism is coming,' says Saddam Hussein in one of the most dramatic moments on the tapes as he talks, or muses, with his cabinet, including Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz. Saddam says he warned the Americans 'that in the future, there will be terrorism with weapons of mass destruction.' He continues, 'What would prevent a booby-trapped car causing a nuclear explosion in Washington, or a germ, or a chemical one?' But he says Iraq would not be involved. 'This is coming,' says Saddam. 'This story is coming, but not from Iraq.' Tariq Aziz then adds, 'Sir, the biological is very easy to make. It's so simple that any biologist can make a bottle of germs, and drop it into a water tower and kill 100,000. An American in the house near the White House could do it,' Aziz says." Rep. Pete Hoekstra: "It appears they are authentic. From reading some of the transcripts, you would think that it is pretty likely there were WMD that were hidden or that were moved out of the country." Ross: "The tapes reveal in their own words Iraqi efforts to hide information about weapons of mass destruction, from the UN inspectors in the 1990s." Charles Duelfer, who "led the official US search for weapons of mass destruction after the war, says the tapes show extensive deception, but don't prove there are weapons still hidden in Iraq." Duelfer: "What they do is support the conclusion that the regime had the intention of building and rebuilding weapons of mass destruction." Ross: "In fact, Saddam's aides can be heard on the tape telling him they stand ready to resume work."

The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 10, 0:40, Martin) reported there are "about two CDs worth of audio recordings of Saddam meeting with his senior advisers in the 1990s. They're just now surfacing publicly, but intelligence officials say they've had them for some time and they contain no revelations about weapons of mass destruction. On the recording, Saddam seems obsessed with hiding his weapons programs from UN inspectors, but we now know what he was really hiding was that he didn't have any weapons of mass destruction, a fact he was trying to hide because he thought it made him more vulnerable to invasion."

NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 4, 0:40, Williams) reported, "On another tape, Saddam says, 'It is possible in the future to see a booby trap and the explosion turns out to be nuclear, germ or chemical.' US intelligence analysts tell NBC News do not prove Saddam had any weapons of mass destruction when the US invaded Iraq back in 2003."

ABC News Nightline (2/15, Ross) reported, "Most revealing on the tapes are the ongoing discussions about hiding details of Iraq's missiles and weapons of mass destruction programs from U.N. Inspectors during the 1990s." Hussein's son-in-law "briefs Saddam on the Iraqi campaign of deceit, aimed at fooling U.N. inspectors." Translator: "We did not reveal all that we have. Not the type of weapons. Not the volume of the materials we imported. Not the volume of the production that we told them about. Not the volume of use. None of this was correct." Regarding Iraq's nuclear weapons program, the translation reads: "As for the nuclear, sir, we say we have disclosed everything. But no. We have undeclared problems in nuclear, as well." Former US weapons inspector Charles Duelfer "says the tapes show Saddam's fascination with such weapons and his extensive deceit. But offer no new proof of whether such weapons are still hidden in Iraq." Duelfer: "No, they do not. What they do is support the conclusion and report which we made in the last couple years, that the regime had the intention of building and rebuilding weapons of mass destruction, when circumstances permitted." Rep. Peter Hoektsra, chairman of the House Intelligence Committee: "You would think that it's pretty likely there were WMD that were hidden or moved out of the country." ABC News concluded, "And these tapes only serve to fuel the continuing debate about Saddam's true intentions. And whether he, in fact, did hide weapons of mass destruction. There's enough in these tapes to help both sides bolster their arguments."

Defense Intelligence Reexamining Iraq WMD Evidence. The New York Sun (2/16, Lake) reports, "The CIA, FBI, and directorate of national intelligence have resisted calls from Congress to reopen the hunt" for WMD in Iraq. Yet "an interagency outfit known as the Media Exploitation Center, administered by the Defense Intelligence Agency, last month started its own search of these materials to attempt to discover the location of the weapons of mass destruction." One congressional aide said, "There are elements in NSA and DIA that believe there is enough evidence to warrant further re-examination and a relook at all the material. … This includes the imagery, documents, and human sources. They also think a more extensive debriefing of knowledgeable human sources and third party nationals is in order." Rep. Peter Hoekstra "has also been pestering the directorate of national intelligence to translate and make public what he claims are nearly 36,000 boxes of captured documents and materials from Iraq that may shed clues on the WMD front." The Pentagon "now appears to be working on the directorate to make other Iraq files public as well. A February 6 letter from Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld to Senator Santorum…said Mr. Rumsfeld is working with the director of national intelligence, John Negroponte, to release Iraqi files sought from the Harmony database, which catalogs material on terrorism secured since September 11, 2001." But a DNI spokeswoman said, "Intelligence community analysts from the CIA and the DIA reviewed the translations and found that while fascinating from a historical perspective, the tapes do not reveal anything that changes their postwar analysis of Iraq's weapons programs, nor do they change the findings contained in the comprehensive Iraq Survey Group report."

In 2000, Experts Agreed That Saddam Wanted WMD. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (2/16, 90K) excerpts the February 3, 2000 edition of Voice of America's "On the Line," on which Roscoe Suddarth, president, Middle East Institute and former U.S. ambassador to Jordan, said, "I don't think [Saddam Hussein's] objectives have changed. I think he still wants to be the primary Arab power. And they have the resources to do it -- the second largest oil reserves. … He lacks the means, the military means, but he is dearly trying to reconstitute them. … He's trying to reconstitute, obviously, his weapons of mass destruction." Patrick Clawson, director of research, Washington Institute for Near East Policy, agreed, saying, "There are no indications whatsoever that Saddam has backed off in the least. After all, this is a man who has forgone well over a hundred billion dollars in oil income in order to keep up with these clandestine programs of weapons of mass destruction."

Terror Attacks Kill 16 In Baghdad. The Washington Post (2/16, A19, Hernandez, 744K) reports, "As Iraqi politicians debated the formation of a government on Wednesday, a wave of gun and bomb attacks killed at least 16 people in the capital, including five children. Three children were killed and two wounded when a bomb exploded outside the Karama primary school in the Saydiyah neighborhood of southeastern Baghdad, said Gen. Salman Hassan Shammari of the Iraqi police. A second roadside bomb killed two children and wounded four more in the Fadhl neighborhood, he said. It was unclear who detonated the bombs or why." The New York Times (2/16, Wong, 1.19M) and Los Angeles Times (2/16, Moore, 958K) run similar reports.

Influence Of Radical Cleric Al Sadr Increasing In Iraq. The New York Times (2/16, Worth, Tavernise, 1.19M) reports radical Muslim Cleric Moktada al-Sadr was a key figure in the election of Ibrahim al-Jaafari as Iraq's next prime minister. The election "was a crowning moment for Mr. Sadr, whose sudden rise to political power poses a stark new set of challenges for Iraq's fledgling democracy. The man who led the Mahdi Army militia's two deadly uprisings against American troops in 2004 now controls 32 seats in Iraq's Parliament, enough to be a kingmaker. He has an Islamist vision of Iraq's future, and is implacably hostile to the Iraqis closest to the United States -- the mostly secular Kurds, and Ayad Allawi, the former prime minister." The Times notes, "In one sense, his participation represents the realization of a central American goal: to bring populist, violent figures -- whether Sunni or Shiite -- off the battlefield and into democratic politics." His "new influence and his populist roots may even help achieve the American goal of a broad-based government that includes all of Iraq's sects and ethnic groups."

Shiite Faction Urges Greater Outreach To Sunnis. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Moore, 958K) reports, "Only days after deciding to nominate incumbent Ibrahim Jafari to continue as Iraq's prime minister, his United Iraqi Alliance coalition on Wednesday was showing signs of fraying." Al Fadila al Islamiya party leaders, who are "associated with radical Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr…threatened Wednesday to break from the dominant alliance if the UIA did not make more overtures to Sunni Arabs, restrain Shiite paramilitary groups and rule in a more collaborative style." While "legislators prepare to form Iraq's first permanent government since Saddam Hussein's ouster…the Fadila ultimatum suggested that Jafari's nomination…was causing tension within the Shiite-led alliance." And one Western diplomat said, "I certainly see the political will in the different corners and the appreciation for a national unity government.

… I hear more people talk about cross-sectarian cooperation than I have ever heard."

WPost Urges Administration To Utilize Coalitions To Broker Deal For National Unity Government. The Washington Post (2/16, A26, 744K) in an editorial writes that Ibrahim Jafari's election means the Bush administration's job "will be still harder." His election "will complicate the task of forming a 'national unity' government." US ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad "is doing his best to promote a national accord that addresses the legitimate concerns of the Sunnis. … But given Iraq's powerful centrifugal forces, the ambassador could use more help, from Washington and beyond. The Bush administration has capably organized international coalitions to address the threats of Iran and North Korea; it has brought formidable pressure to bear on the Palestinians through the 'quartet.' … Now is the time for President Bush to mobilize that alliance, and every other bit of leverage he can muster. Iraq may not have another chance."

US Cavalry Regiment Model For Counterinsurgent Tactics. The Washington Post (2/16, A14, Ricks, 744K) describes the success the US 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment has had in completing "clear and hold" operations in Iraq. Recently, "the regiment has focused on breaking the insurgents' hold on Tall Afar, a town of 290,000. Their operations here 'will serve as a case study in classic counterinsurgency, the way it is supposed to be done,' said Terry Daly, a retired intelligence officer specializing in the subject." US officials "conducting an internal review of the three dozen major U.S. brigades, battalions and similar units operating in Iraq in 2005 privately concluded that of all those units, the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment performed the best at counterinsurgency, according to a source familiar with the review's findings." But it is unclear whether the regiment's "example can be followed elsewhere by American commanders in the country. The biggest problem U.S. troops in Iraq face is Baghdad, a city about 30 times the size of Tall Afar. With the current number of American troops in Iraq, it would be impossible to copy the approach used here, with outposts every few blocks."

WSJournal Applauds Australia For Pursuing Oil-For-Food Probe. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.11M) editorializes, "The rot from the United Nations' Oil for Food scandal has now reached Australia. But the good news is that that democratic nation has had the nerve to sort the wheat from the chaff -- and do it publicly." The Journal notes, "It's striking how Australia has been one of the few countries to have pushed the Oil for Food investigations to the extent of examining its own role. An Indian official lost his job after the Volcker report, and French and American prosecutors are investigating the matter in their countries. But China, Russia and Vietnam, to name a few -- have reacted with studied nonchalance. Saddam knew what he was doing when he put foreigners with political connections on his payroll."

US Soldiers Prepare To Fight "Long War" In Afghanistan. The New York Times (2/16, Kifner, 1.19M) reports that the 10th Mountain Division has prepared to continue not only their military mission in Afghanistan but also "a political one: to bolster the American-supported government of President Hamid Karzai." They are "developing a military ethos that goes beyond the tactics of past conventional warfare to a new age of ideological war." In interviews the soldiers and officers "spoke of the heightened language and cultural training they had instituted to meet the new challenges in a conflict against militant Islam that Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld recently referred to as 'the long war.'" Soldiers typically study "basic Islam and local mores for the duty of nation-building," but "the program here is particularly sweeping." The key to "the Army's strategy is the cultural awareness program. … In Iraq, many officers now believe, insensitivity to local customs in house searches, for example, created resentment that helped foster the insurgency."

In a second article on the 10th Mountain Division, the New York Times (2/16, Kifner, 1.19M) describes its history and how its role has changed to adapt to counterinsurgent tactics noting, "The Afghanistan campaign is often fought by the smallest units." Lt. Col. Christopher Cavoli said, "In a counterinsurgency, the calibration of force is critical. … The sloppy application of force ruins the cultivation of the populace."

Clinton, Oxley To Unveil Program To Educate Military Families About Fraud. The New York Times (2/16, Henriques, 1.19M) reports, "NASD will unveil today a financial education program it has developed exclusively for members of the armed forces and their families. The effort is part of the financial regulator's response to published reports about military personnel being widely exposed to deceptive and misleading sales pitches for insurance and other financial products." The program will be unveiled "at a news conference in the Capitol building with several senior members of Congress in attendance, including Representative Michael G. Oxley…who heads the House Financial Services Committee, and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton."

DOJ:

Gonzales Outlines Top Priorities For DOJ. The Washington Times (2/16, Seper, 90K) reports, "Attorney

DOJ_NMG_0015490

General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday outlined six major priorities for the Justice Department at the start of his second year on the job: terrorism, violent crime, drug trafficking, cybercrime, government and corporate corruption, and civil rights. 'My goal is simple: Secure the opportunities of the American dream for all Americans and for future generations,' Mr. Gonzales said during a speech to Justice personnel gathered in the department's Great Hall. 'Keeping this charge is no small task, and it will require no small effort. And I am well aware that I can't do it alone. I will need your help. So, today, I'm laying out a set of priorities and initiatives to guide our work for the coming year. This plan will allow us to continue the progress you've already achieved -- most notably, four years without another terrorist attack here at home and a violent-crime rate that is at its lowest level in more than three decades,' he said."

WICS-TV Champaign, IL (2/15, 5:12 p.m.) reported, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales outlined the top priorities for the Department of Justice this year. Gonzales says the department will work to defend the country against terrorism and that he hopes the Patriot Act will serve as an aid to their efforts." A number of other stations around the country simply noted that Gonzales would be announcing the priorities, including WJLA-TV Washington, DC (2/15, 6:14 a.m.) and KNVX-TV Phoenix (2/15, 5:38 a.m.).

Gonzales Asserts Independence. Knight Ridder distributes a Chicago Tribune article (2/16, Zajac) that reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, whose first year in office has been dominated by issues connected to his earlier job as White House counsel, said Wednesday that he regards himself as independent of the Oval Office, but that he nonetheless remains a policy advocate for President Bush. … 'Sure, I have to be independent as attorney general,' Gonzales said in an interview. 'But I think people lose sight of the fact that for purposes of policy, I'm still on the president's team, and I feel a responsibility and I'm expected to act as a member of the president's team in connection with pushing forward the president's agenda.'" The Tribune continues, "Still, Gonzales said, 'if I believe something is wrong, I will tell the president of the United States that something is wrong.' … Gonzales said proof of his autonomy will be seen in his department's performance, particularly in cases brought by the agency's career prosecutors. 'No matter who you are, no matter what party you may be affiliated with, if you've done something you shouldn't be doing, we're going to go after it,' he said."

DOJ's Sex Offender Registry Program Receives E-gov Award. Federal Computer Week (2/16, Weigelt) reports, "Five federal information sharing programs, from a searchable national sex offender registry to health information sharing between departments, received Excellence.gov awards today from the Industry Advisory Council at a luncheon in Washington, D.C." Among the programs cited was the National Sex Offender Public Registry, "a Justice Department program that makes state and territory public sex offender registries available online."

Government Computer News (2/16, Thormeyer) reports, "By making state and local sex-offender information available and searchable through a single portal, the Justice Department made it easier for the public to determine whether registered sex offenders live in their neighborhoods." GCN continues, "Justice's work on the National Sex Offender Public Registry Web site not only has empowered citizens, but it also won the department one of the five Excellence.gov awards handed out Wednesday by the American Council for Technology and the Industry Advisory Council of Fairfax, Va. … Because the Excellence.gov awards this year focused on information-sharing between agencies and different levels of government, the portal was chosen because it contained sex-offender information culled from federal, state and local governments. … Users can search federal and local sex-offender registries by name, state, county, city, town or ZIP code."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Witness Admits To Previous Misleading Testimony. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Emshwiller, McWilliams) reports, "An attorney for Jeffrey Skilling won some concessions in federal court here from a government witness concerning the former Enron Corp. president's conduct in connection with the criminal fraud and conspiracy charges against him. However, the witness continued to insist that he and Mr. Skilling were involved in misleading the public about a key Enron business unit." The Journal continues, "The witness, Kenneth Rice, headed Enron's high-profile telecommunications unit in 2000 and 2001. Under government questioning Tuesday, Mr. Rice laid out a number of areas where he and Mr. Skilling allegedly gave out false or overly rosy information about the unit." The Journal adds, "Allegedly false statements about the unit, known as Enron Broadband Services, or EBS, are part of the wide-ranging charges against Mr. Skilling, who is being tried here along with his co-defendant, former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay. Mr. Rice's testimony has, so far, hardly touched on Mr. Lay. … Under cross-examination by Mark Holscher, one of Mr. Skilling's attorneys, Mr. Rice softened some of his previous characterizations of the former Enron president's actions."

USA Today (2/16, Farrell) reports that Rice "admitted on the stand Wednesday that part of his testimony to the jury the day before was misleading." USA reports that Rice "testified Tuesday that an early 2001 budget forecast predicted that his unit would lose $489 million for the year.

After some internal haggling, Rice agreed to present management with a more optimistic forecast of $110 million in losses for the start-up unit. … Rice then testified that his boss, Skilling, insisted that losses at EBS couldn't exceed $65 million for the year. The two presented that figure to analysts and investors in March of 2001, allowing jurors to conclude that Skilling was presenting pie-in-the-sky goals as realistic business forecasts. … But under cross-examination by Skilling defense attorney Mark Holscher, Rice admitted that the early prediction of $489 million in losses at EBS was in itself unrealistic. Rice conceded that at budget time, he and others at Enron often engaged in a practice known as 'sandbagging,' in which managers set artificially low goals when negotiating with their corporate bosses. … Speaking of the impression he left on the jury, Rice admitted to Holscher that, 'It isn't fair for them to think that that was a reliable budget.'"

Spitzer To Fight Request For Grasso Deposition. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Lucchetti, McDonald) reports, "New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer will fight a request to be deposed by attorneys representing former New York Stock Exchange Chief Executive Dick Grasso in the matter of Mr. Spitzer's civil lawsuit against Mr. Grasso." The Journal continues, "In a legal memo sent to Mr. Grasso's attorneys, Mr. Spitzer argued that he cannot be deposed because he is a high-ranking government official and counsel to the plaintiffs in the case. … 'Like any lawyer for a party, Attorney General Spitzer cannot be asked to provide deposition testimony or to reveal work product,' Mr. Spitzer and his lawyers argued in a 15-page motion that also calls Mr. Grasso's motion 'absurd.'" The Journal adds, "Mr. Spitzer is also contesting a request for internal documents filed by former AIG Chief Executive Maurice R. 'Hank' Greenberg, who faces civil fraud charges stemming from Mr. Spitzer's probe of AIG's accounting. Mr. Greenberg's attorneys had requested emails and other evidence, including testimony from Mr. Spitzer or the member of his staff with the most detailed knowledge of the AIG probe. A state court judge will hear arguments on whether Mr. Spitzer needs to provide documents in the Greenberg case in late February and whether he needs to be deposed and provide documents in the Grasso case in mid-March."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Patriot Act Author Urges Dismissal Of Charges Against AIPAC Officials. The Washington Times (2/16, Seper, 90K) reports that Viet D. Dinh, who headed the Justice Department's Office of Legal Policy, is now a professor at Georgetown University Law Center, and "who helped write the USA Patriot Act," has added his voice to "defense lawyers in seeking the dismissal of charges against two former American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) officials accused of unlawfully disclosing national security information." He joined a motion "condemning the charges as 'a dangerous attempt by prosecutors to over extend to private citizens a statute which was intended to apply solely to government officials with access to classified information.'"

Prosecuting Citizens For Repeating Leaks Said To Run Counter To Democracy. Gary Wasserman, an adjunct professor of government at Georgetown University, where he teaches lobbying, writes in an op-ed in the Washington Post (2/16, A27, 744K), "This is an administration more horrified by leaks than torture." It "is applying to private citizens a never-used part of the 1917 Espionage Act. Its expanding secrecy powers threaten to paralyze public participation in making foreign policy," as "information is the lifeblood of policymaking. Expanding restrictions on information adds greatly to the power of the executive; criminalizing citizens' contact with that information adds even greater uncertainty." Also, "one argument for why autocratic regimes such as pre-World War II Germany and Japan have engaged in risky foreign adventures is that these narrow elites are not subject to the kind of outside review by knowledgeable people that exists in democracies." Democratic governments do not, "in general, 'authorize' the information citizens are allowed. Given enough information, citizens authorize and control their government. Or at least we used to."

At RSA Conference, Mueller Calls For Innovative Cybercrime-Fighting Effort. Under the headline "FBI Chief Asks Valley For Help," The San Jose Mercury News (2/16, Kuruvila, 268K) reports, "Computer hacking has evolved from a sport for geeks into a moneymaking tool for organized crime -- a trend so disturbing to FBI Director Robert Mueller that he came to San Jose Wednesday to ask for help from tech security experts. It was the first time a director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation had addressed the annual RSA Security Conference, a 15-year-old confab where the companies that build protective technology mingle with customers and discuss threats. Mueller's presence at the McEnery Convention Center was testament to the fact that just as the Internet has become a global growth engine for business, it also has become a global target for savvy criminals. Making matters worse, 'most' businesses won't report that they were victimized, Mueller said, making it more difficult for investigators to keep up with online criminals. Some fear publicity. Others fear that competitors will exploit their vulnerabilities. 'Maintaining a code of silence will not benefit you or your company in the long run,' Mueller said. 'In this world of globalization, we continue to build on one central theme, and that is of partnership.'"

Under the headline "FBI Director: Cyberthreats 'Fluid and Far-reaching,'" IDG News Service (2/15, McMillan) adds Mueller said that "the FBI must work with corporations and international law enforcement to help combat online criminal acts that are seldom reported. … 'Increasingly our cyberthreats originate outside of the United States,' he said. 'The once-clear divisions of jurisdiction and responsibility between agencies [and nations]...have been rendered obsolete by the fluid and far-reaching nature of today's threats.' … The FBI now has more flexibility to work with international law enforcement and is helping build relationships with those foreign agencies by putting operatives 'on the ground' in countries that may be hotbeds for cybercrime," said "Steven Martinez, the deputy assistant director for the FBI's Cyber Division, who spoke after Mueller. While the United States works with other countries on formal and treaty-level arrangements to speed up cooperation, FBI agents are endeavoring to develop direct ties to their counterparts in other countries, Martinez said." IDG adds, "Mueller also cited an FBI-backed initiative called IntraGuard that enables 3000 members…to share information with law enforcement on the latest cyberthreats. … Still, most law enforcement experts agree that the vast majority of cybercrimes go unreported to law enforcement, with fears of reprisals or adverse publicity creating what Mueller called a 'code of silence.' … But companies need to take a wider view of the situation, he said."

Under the headline "Companies Still Not Reporting Attacks, FBI Director Says," SearchSecurity.com (2/15, Savage) reports Mueller "urged the audience of infosecurity professionals…to share cybercrime data, promising that his agency will take steps to ensure their privacy. 'We certainly do not want you to feel victimized a second time by our investigation. … We won't release confidential data. We'll take steps to protect intellectual property,' he said. … 'No person, no agency, no company, no country can prevent crime and terrorism alone. … While challenges are growing each day, together we won't be defeated,' he said. The FBI has had success in investigating cybercrimes with help from the private sector, Mueller said. Among the cases he cited included collaborating with Microsoft and officials overseas to track down the suspects involved with the Mytob and Zotob worms. The agency also worked with the Red Cross, eBay and others to investigate fraudulent Web sites that exploited the Hurricane Katrina disaster." SearchSecurity adds, "Other top law enforcement officials echoed Mueller's remarks in a panel discussion held after his keynote. 'The most important people in fighting cybercrime are those of you here today,' said Arif Alikhan, senior counsel at the U.S. Department of Justice," and Deputy Assistant Director Martinez "said the agency's partnerships with the academic community and private sector are key."

Businessman, Former Atlanta Official Testify About Alleged Campbell Bribes. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/16, Warren, Scott, 430K) reports businessman Howard Sole "testified Wednesday in the corruption trial of former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell that his company dropped efforts to land a lucrative city contract after he was urged to break the law by paying $100,000 to the mayor's re-election campaign." Sole "was the second witness of the day whose testimony seemed to indicate Campbell's involvement with illegal money matters. Joseph Reid, former deputy chief operating officer, testified he passed campaign contributions directly to the mayor — some in cash." The Journal-Constitution adds, "Under cross-examination by defense attorney Fred Orr, Sole acknowledged he did not know if Campbell told" contractor Ricky Rowe "to solicit the money. … Reid, who was later convicted of corruption and served time in prison," testified that "he gave Campbell an envelope containing illegal checks for the mayor's 1998 runoff election that were written in the names of five Campbell family members. Reid also testified that on more than one occasion he gave cash campaign contributions to Campbell."

WXIA-TV (2/15, Carnes, King) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Wednesday, "Reid told the jury he often delivered those contributions directly to the mayor, including about $5,000 in cash. When it came to cash contributions, Reid said, 'He told me to give them to him.' Campbell says that he did no such thing. 'Never,' Campbell said. 'In fact he never said that in all of his ten interviews with the FBI.'"

Undercover FBI Agent Testifies About Cotton Bribes. WDEF-TV Chattanooga (2/15, Bennett) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Wednesday, "FBI undercover agent John Mule spent most of today on the witness stand. He posed as the Chief Financial Officer of the FBI's fake company E-Cycle. Mule says he first met former Hamilton County school board member Charles Love in December 2004, and Hamilton County Commissioner, William Cotton one month later. Jurors listened to an audio tape of a conversation between the three from January, 2005. Mule' wanted Cotton's help getting a resolution passed through the county commission. The three met at Southside Grill in late January, where Mule gave Love $3,500 in cash. … Mule said after the meeting, the county commissioner called to say thank you, acknowledging he received his shard of the bribe money." Jurors also saw video of a February 2005 meeting in which Mule' gave "Love an envelope with $6,000. When Love accepted the money, Mule' made it clear the money was for Cotton."

WTVC-TV Chattanooga (2/15, Grant) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Wednesday, "Today, jurors saw for themselves what happened when William Cotton, Charles Love and an undercover agent met in Nashville." Cotton "is the first person to be tried in Operation Tennessee Waltz. … The defense says there there is no proof that Cotton received ANY money. But the FBI says their secretly recorded videos prove otherwise." WTVC then airs clips from the FBI surveillance video shown at trial yesterday. The AP (2/16, Poovey) also reports on Mule's testimony, adding, "FBI agent Brian Burns testified Wednesday about a recording of a Jan. 16, 2005, conversation between Love and Cotton. Jurors also heard the FBI's recording of the commissioner telling Love that he would be attending a meeting of county officials and wanted to also get his counterparts in Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina and South Carolina to consider E-Cycle's proposal to recycle government computers. … Burns told jurors it wasn't illegal for Cotton to push E-Cycle to officials in other states. He said other segments of the recording show Cotton and Love scheming to hide bribes from E-Cycle behind a front company that would be set up in a building the commissioner owns."

Ryan Will Not Take Stand Until Next Week, If At All. The AP (2/16, Robinson) reports, "George Ryan won't take the witness stand at his racketeering and fraud trial until at least Tuesday and the former governor may not testify at all, his chief defense counsel said Wednesday." Defense lawyer Dan Webb added that he will call "as many as 11 character witnesses, including MASH actor Mike Ferrell, a forensic accountant who has been studying years of Ryan family finances and Edward McNally, former Ryan lawyer and now chief federal prosecutor for Southern Illinois." The AP adds, "Also Wednesday, defense witness Mickey Brown, a Chicago real estate lawyer, testified that there was nothing extraordinary about" codefendant Lawrence Warner's "ownership of buildings in Joliet and suburban Bellwood through a series of holding companies that made it difficult to see who the owner was. George Ryan leased both buildings for use by the state."

Former Chicago Water Employee Charged With Lying To Hired Truck Investigators. The Chicago Sun-Times (2/15, Warmbir, Novak) reported yesterday, "A former city Water Department employee, Frank R. Cannatello…was charged Tuesday with lying to federal agents last year when he told them he had nothing to do with a trucking company in the Hired Truck Program that was in his mother's name but bore his initials, FRC Trucking. … Cannatello's attorney, Richard Jalovec, said Tuesday that he expects his client to plead guilty when he appears before a federal judge on March 2." The AP (2/15, Robinson) added, "Among other things, prosecutors said Cannatello asked another city worker, Randy Aderman, to help FRC get city hauling work and Aderman did so through the water department. Aderman already has been charged in the investigation along with former city Clerk James Laski. Aderman appeared for arraignment before U.S. District Judge Charles R. Norgle Sr. on Tuesday and pleaded not guilty."

Entertainment Attorney Indicted In Pellicano Probe. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Krikorian, Blankstein) reports, "A federal grand jury today indicted prominent Los Angeles entertainment attorney Terry Christensen on wire-tapping and conspiracy charges in connection with the ongoing investigation of former private investigator Anthony Pellicano." The Times continues, "The two-count indictment alleged that Christensen paid Pellicano at least $100,000 to wiretap the wife of billionaire investor Kirk Kerkorian during a bitter child support dispute in 2002. Authorities charge that Pellicano listened to the phone calls of Lisa Bonder Kerkorian and shared the information with Christensen. … Christensen, 65, of Beverly Hills, is the first lawyer to be indicted in the Pellicano investigation, which has roiled the Hollywood and legal communities. … 'Pellicano would discuss with defendant Christensen how long the illegal wiretap should remain in place and when the illegal wiretap should be brought to an end,' according to the indictment." The Times adds, "When Pellicano allegedly turned over wiretap data to Christensen, he told the lawyer 'to be very careful about this because there is only one way for me to know about this,' the indictment states. … Christensen spoke repeatedly with Pellicano about the wiretaps, according to the indictment, hearing the 'exact words' spoken, directing Pellicano to listen to particular conversations, and then instructing Pellicano to 'wrap up' the illegal wiretap."

The New York Times (2/16, Weiner) reports, "Damage from the investigation of the celebrity private eye Anthony Pellicano reached the top of Hollywood's business community on Wednesday, when a federal grand jury issued wiretapping and conspiracy charges against the lawyer who handled Kirk Kerkorian's 2002 legal battle with his former wife." The Times notes that "Christensen, and his Century City-based firm are a major presence in the entertainment industry, having represented Paramount Pictures, Sony Pictures Entertainment, the Walt Disney Company and MGM/UA, among others. The lawyer has represented Mr. Kerkorian for over 30 years, once served as president of the 88-year-old billionaire's private Tracinda Corporation, and has been involved with Mr. Kerkorian's recent investment in General Motors. … In the surprise indictment — Mr. Christiansen had not previously surfaced in the long-running wiretap case, and was first contacted by the government only four weeks ago, according to a person who was briefed on the situation — officials charged that the lawyer paid Mr. Pellicano at least $100,000 to tap the phone of Lisa Bonder Kerkorian. Ms. Kerkorian, the billionaire's former wife, was then involved in a bitter legal dispute over the paternity of her young daughter and child support."

Police Using Homing Device To Cut Down On Dangerous Chases. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (2/16, Kohler) reports, "Is there a solution to high-speed police chases? … A company in Virginia is proposing one: a sticky dart with a homing device that police can fire at a fleeing car and track electronically at a distance." The Post-Dispatch continues, "Instead of pursuing the getaway car at high speed, police can lay back and set a trap for the fleeing car up the road. … The company believes its product, called StarChase, will save lives and reduce police liability by slowing some hot pursuits and stopping others altogether." The Post-Dispatch adds, "U.S. police departments, often criticized for chases, are interested. How it works - whether it works at all - remains to be seen. Police will want to know if they can use the device to arrest suspects they would have pursued with lights and sirens. … They'll also want to know if a fleeing driver will slow down without those lights and sirens on his tail. … Many eyes are now on Los Angeles, whose police are testing the device this year at the suggestion of the U.S. Department of Justice." The Post-Dispatch notes, "All police forces who struggle with high-speed chases should be watching, said Gilbert Moore, a spokesman for the Justice Department's Office of Community Oriented Policing Services. … StarChase will also be tested this year in a major East Coast city, said Trevor Fischbach, a StarChase vice president. He said the company hopes to begin selling it to police departments this year."

Judge Rules Defendant Has Right To Choose Attorney With Alleged Mob Ties. The New York Law Journal (2/16, Perrotta) reports, "An attorney with alleged ties to the Mafia can continue to represent a man accused of racketeering, extortion and three murders on behalf of the Gambino organized crime family, a federal judge in Brooklyn has ruled." The Journal continues, "The judge, Eastern District of New York Judge Jack B. Weinstein, also denied a request by several news outlets to obtain a copy of a video recording that captures a meeting between the attorney, Joseph R. Corozzo, and John Gotti Sr., the deceased head of the Gambino family, inside a prison medical center in Missouri." The Journal adds, "Weinstein said reporters, who saw the video during a recent hearing, could review it inside the courthouse, but could not broadcast it on television out of fear that it would prejudice potential jurors in the upcoming trial of Corozzo's client, Dominick Pizzonia. The trial is scheduled for June. … Pizzonia is an alleged Gambino captain accused of the Dec. 24, 1992, murder of Thomas and Rosemarie Uva, who had robbed several Mafia social clubs. … Pizzonia has known Corozzo since childhood and has insisted, throughout several hearings, that he wants to keep Corozzo as his lawyer, no matter the prosecutor's allegations of conflicts. … Weinstein himself has called the potential conflicts 'serious' and has warned Pizzonia of the dangers of continuing to trial with Corozzo as his attorney." The Journal notes, "Eastern District prosecutors raised concerns not just over Corozzo's alleged ties to the Mafia but his relationship to Michael DiLeonardo, a key witness against Pizzonia. In 2001, when DiLeonardo was being prosecuted on extortion charges in Atlanta, he asked Corozzo to interview another Gambino family member, Craig DePalma, to see if DePalma would testify against DiLeonardo. DiLeonardo gave Corozzo a check for $1,000, but Corozzo never cashed it."

Former FBI Mob Investigator Dismissed From Gotti Jury Pool. The AP (2/16) reports, "It would have been hard to draw a prospective juror less likely to get picked for John 'Junior' Gotti's racketeering retrial. A former supervisor of the FBI's organized crime squad in New York was among the pool of 250 prospective jurors who filled out questionnaires -- and among those quickly disqualified from serving on the jury of the son of late Gambino crime family boss John Gotti."

Texas Executes Man For 1992 Shooting Of Cabdriver. The AP (2/16, Lozano) reports, "Convicted killer Clyde Smith was executed Wednesday for fatally shooting a Houston cabdriver during a robbery in 1992. … 'I want to thank you all for being here and for your love and support,' Smith, 32, told friends who watched from a window." The AP continues, "Relatives of another cabdriver Smith had confessed to killing were present, but he did not acknowledge them. Relatives of the man Smith was executed for killing were not there. … He was pronounced dead at 6:17 p.m., seven minutes after lethal drugs were administered. His execution was the fourth this year in Texas." The AP adds, "Smith had confessed to the Feb. 7, 1992, death of 45-year-old David Jacobs, and to a similar shooting and robbery of another cabdriver, Victor Bilton, six weeks later. He later said the confessions were made under duress. … He was convicted of shooting Jacobs four times in the head and robbing him of about $100."

Trial Begins Today For Florida Deputy Charged With Falsifying Crime Reports. The Miami Herald (2/16, DeMarzo, 323K) reports, "After almost two years, one of six Broward sheriff's deputies accused of falsifying crime reports goes on trial today, amid skepticism over whether any of the cases headed to court will result in convictions." Christian Zapata "is the first deputy to face trial in the scandal that already has cost more than a half million dollars in taxpayer money. The outcome likely will set the stage for future cases -- and if anyone ultimately will go to jail. The scandal involves deputies who allegedly took crime complaints, then cleared or downgraded them to make themselves and their agency look better. In some instances, the cases were cleared by pinning them on people who could not have committed the crime because they were in jail -- or dead." The Herald notes, "The FBI, the public corruption unit of the Broward State Attorney's Office, and a private attorney hired by BSO have conducted investigations into the case-fixing. … But experts say it will be hard to prove that deputies purposefully altered the reports."

New York Man Sues Prosecutors After Exoneration. The New York Times (2/16, Kilgannon) reports, "A man whose attempted murder conviction was overturned after he served 12 a dozen years in prison is planning on filing a lawsuit charging that Queens prosecutors have withheld evidence and misled juries in a broad pattern of misconduct that has led to dozens of wrongful convictions." The Times continues, "The suit, which a lawyer expects to file today in federal court in Brooklyn, details 84 instances in which criminal convictions obtained by Queens prosecutors were reversed by higher courts for prosecutorial wrongdoing. The lawsuit says that the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown, and his predecessor, John J. Santucci, have not punished prosecutors for their misbehavior." The Times adds, "The suit accuses prosecutors in some cases of presenting false testimony by witnesses about their deals for leniency in exchange for cooperation, according to a copy provided by the lawyer filing the suit. It says prosecutors withheld evidence that could be seen as motivating witnesses to give false testimony, and also accuses prosecutors of making false or misleading trial presentations to juries."

Former DC Contract Advisor Debarred. The Washington Times (2/16, Mcelhatton) reports, "The D.C. government has barred a former consultant to the city's technology office from doing business with the District because he pleaded guilty to a criminal conflict-of-interest charge nearly three years ago." The Times continues, "John Izzard III, a former program manager at the D.C. Office of the Chief Technology Officer, was charged in 2003 with seeking about $36,000 from a vendor in exchange for helping the firm win D.C. government contracts, authorities said. … Mr. Izzard's duties as a private consultant at the technology office included recommending contracting actions to city officials, authorities said." The Times adds, "The panel, in a letter to Mr. Izzard last month, wrote 'there is no public purpose to be served for the District to contract with a contractor that committed a serious violation.' … The ruling bans him from city contracts or subcontracts until next year. … An attorney for Mr. Izzard yesterday said his client is considering whether to appeal the panel's decision."

WPost Scoffs At Police Tactics In Virginia Prostitution Probe. The Washington Post (2/16, A26) editorializes, "No doubt… selfless devotion to duty inspired detectives in Spotsylvania County's sheriff's department, who lately have been having sex with prostitutes in order to make cases against them. In one instance an officer even left a $350 tip for services rendered, which presumably sweetened the sting for the suspect in question." The Post continues, "According to an account by The Post's Tom Jackman, a Spotsylvania massage parlor known as Moon Spa was the target of one recent investigation. Undercover detectives who visited the spa received baths, massages and sex. In all, detectives, painstakingly thorough, made three such trips in nine days to the Moon Spa, each time paying a fee to the establishment as well as a tip. … 'This has to be done' to guarantee a conviction, Sheriff Howard D. Smith declared grimly, instantly ensuring himself a place as a laughingstock among police and prosecutors across the nation, who manage to secure convictions without engaging in sex with their suspects." The Post concludes, "Virginia drug laws contain an exception that specifically enables undercover cops to possess (and therefore buy) narcotics in the course of an investigation; there's no similar provision allowing for sex with prostitutes. As for the cops, they should find other ways to think of Spotsylvania."

Attorney Files Constitutional Challenge To Deficit Reduction Bill Over Typo. The Washington Times (2/16, Dinan, 90K) reports Alabama attorney Jim Zeigler has "filed the first constitutional challenge to last week's budget-cuts law, which he said is invalid because the House and Senate never passed the identical bill." Zeigler "said his challenge comes from the right -- as a conservative who is worried that the bill will hurt charitable giving to churches." The measure in question "reduced entitlement spending by $39 billion over five years. Because of a clerical error, the version that passed the House had a different time period for reimbursing medical providers for some medical equipment than the version that passed the Senate."

CQ (2/15, Dennis) reports Zeigler is "a conservative Republican lawyer who specializes in Medicaid cases," and he "filed the suit in U.S. District Court in Mobile, Ala., Feb. 13, saying the measure (PL 109-171) is not a valid law because it was not passed in identical form by both chambers." No hearing date "has been set, and it is unclear if Zeigler will be granted standing to bring the case. Several constitutional law scholars have predicted that if given the chance, the courts would rule that the act violates the bicameral clause of the Constitution, which requires both chambers to pass identical legislation before the president signs it into law."

Administration Using Federal Agency Rules To "Limit Consumer Rights." The Washington Post (2/16, D1, Mayer, 744K) reports the Bush Administration is "using federal rulemaking to limit consumer rights to seek damages under state laws governing faulty products." The Consumer Product Safety Commission "will vote today on a rule that would restrict such suits in the case of mattresses that catch fire, the most recent rule changes undertaken by several agencies. Last month, the Food and Drug Administration limited consumers' ability to recover damages for injuries from agency-approved drugs." Meanwhile, the National Highway Traffic and Safety Administration is "seeking to give automakers similar legal immunity from lawsuits over defective roofs if their vehicles meet new roof-crush standards. It is also proposing to limit consumer lawsuits in a rule that would address seat-belt requirements." Administration officials "say they are simply writing into rules a long-standing policy previously voiced in many friend-of-the-court briefs filed in lawsuits."

DOJ Settles Charges Of Trade Violations With Corporate Express. The Denver Business Journal (2/16) reports, "Corporate Express Inc. paid $5.02 million to the U.S. Department of Justice to settle allegations that it sold products to U.S. government agencies that were manufactured in countries not permitted by the Trade Agreements Act." The Journal continues, "The settlement resolves allegations that the Broomfield-based office supply company sold products from countries without reciprocal trade agreements with the United States, such as China and Taiwan." The Journal adds, "Van Hindes, a spokesman for Corporate Express, confirmed the settlement with the following statement: … 'Like other major distributors in the office product industry, Corporate Express recently settled differences with the U.S. government without acknowledging liability,' Hindes said." The Journal notes, "In 2005, Office Max Inc. paid $9.8 million to settle the same allegations with the Department of Justice. The department also reached a $4.75 million settlement with Office Depot Inc., a $7.4 million settlement with Staples Contract and Commercial Inc. and a $100,000 settlement with Caddo Design. … The settlements resulted from an investigation by the Civil Division of the Department of Justice, the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia and the General Services Administration's Office of the Inspector General. … 'Federal contractors will be held accountable for their violations of procurement regulations,' said Peter D. Keisler, assistant attorney general for the Civil Division, in a released statement."

Specter Predicts Another Vote On Asbestos Bill. Reuters (2/16, Cornwell) reports Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter said "the asbestos compensation bill he is co-sponsoring is 'very much alive' and that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist told him there would be another vote on it." The bill "to create an industry-financed $140 billion fund to pay injury claims lost a close Senate procedural vote on Tuesday evening." Specter's legislation is "backed by W.R. Grace and Co., USG Corp. and some of the 70 other companies pushed into bankruptcy by tens of thousands of asbestos injury claims. However, some smaller companies oppose a compensation fund, fearing they could be forced to pay more into it than they would face in private lawsuits." Specter said he "spoke with Tennessee Republican Frist on Wednesday morning and 'He (Frist) said he'd have another vote. He said he's looking forward to another vote.'" Specter added, "I consider asbestos to be very much alive."

Roll Call (2/16, Pierce) reports that despite "proclamations to the contrary from Senate GOP leaders, a controversial asbestos trust fund bill appears dead for the year following a crippling setback Tuesday night." Even if Majority Leader Frist "decides to bring the measure back up again — which is considered doubtful — sources on both sides of the aisle said it is improbable that the bill could survive a bipartisan filibuster." Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) "said he expected the measure to reappear on the Senate floor sometime after next week's Presidents Day recess."

CQ (2/15, Stern) reports the Senate asbestos bill "stands in legislative limbo. Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., insisted Wednesday that the bill (S 852), which was pulled from the floor Feb. 14 after a procedural vote failed, could still succeed." But Specter "said he does not expect another vote on the asbestos trust fund legislation until after Congress returns from its recess Feb. 27." Even then, Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., "may opt against taking up the troubled legislation, which could require weeks of additional floor time. Frist has already fulfilled his pledge to Specter to seek to bring the measure to the floor and carved out two weeks for consideration."

Congress Mulls Changes To Wartime Whistleblower Rules. The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Chaddock) reports, "Dissent often carries a price in official Washington, especially in the war years of the Bush presidency." The Monitor continues, "Since the Sept. 11 attacks, the number of insiders alleging wrongdoing in government - either through whistle-blower channels or directly to the press - has surged, as have reprisals against them. … That's the message from this week's congressional hearing on protections for national security whistle-blowers - the first in more than a decade. 'he system is broken,' says Rep. Christopher Shays (R) of Connecticut, who chaired the House Government Affairs subcommittee hearing." The Monitor adds, "Disclosures of flawed prewar intelligence, secret prisons and prisoner abuse, and warrantless surveillance by the National Security Agency have launched a debate on the conduct of the war on terror within Congress and the American public. Critics say some of those disclosures also compromised national security. … The struggle over dissent in dangerous times is not confined to national security matters, however. It appears to be settling deeper into the federal bureaucracy, where government scientists and even analysts at the scholarly Congressional Research Service - who are not actually blowing any whistles but who are staking out positions that deviate from the administration's - report efforts to control their contact with the press and public. … If whistle-blowers and others 'do not see an option for dissent within the system, then the system is in bad shape,' says Steven Aftergood, director of the Project on Government Secrecy at the Federation of American Scientists. 'Secrecy has become a growth industry.... It makes it harder for ordinary citizens ... to ask questions ... and to hold officials accountable.'"

Gonzales Says DOJ Will Broaden Program To Combat Housing Bias. The AP (2/16, Sherman) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pledged Wednesday to reinvigorate a program, which has been used infrequently in the Bush administration, to combat housing discrimination." The AP continues, "Test visits by department employees posing as prospective renters or buyers to rental agents and property owners suspected of discrimination will reach an all-time high in the next two years, Gonzales said in an address to employees in the Justice Department's Great Hall. … 'We will investigate suspected offenders with testing visits designed to expose discriminatory practices,' Gonzales said." The AP adds, "Since they began in 1992, the visits have resulted in 79 complaints. No more than 16 of those, however, were filed since President Bush took office in January 2001, according to the department's Web site. … The Justice Department's civil rights division declined to provide the exact number of complaints filed by the current administration or to say how many visits to landlords suspected of discrimination take place now. Spokesman Eric Holland said revealing the number of visits could tip off landlords to the prevalence of the undercover visits." The AP notes, "Gonzales, the first Hispanic attorney general, said his heritage drives his views about civil rights. But Gonzales and his civil rights unit have been criticized for not being aggressive in pursuing discrimination cases and for letting partisan politics influence decisions in voting rights cases. … The attorney general has denied any political interference and praised the civil rights division for what he described as "record levels of enforcement.""

US, Canada Bust Human Smuggling Ring At Border. The Detroit Free Press (2/15, Ashenfelter) reports, "In a case law enforcement officials say underscores the security threat at metro Detroit's international border, U.S. and Canadian authorities announced Tuesday they had smashed a ring that smuggled scores of illegal immigrants between the two nations to work in restaurants, brothels and sweatshops." The Free Press continues, "Officials said the organization posed a national threat because it was willing to smuggle anyone across the border for a price. As far as authorities know, however, no terrorists were among the more than 100 people who illegally crossed the border since December 2004. … The illegal immigrants -- from China, Albania, Iraq and Syria -- paid thousands of dollars each to be smuggled in both directions across the border, U.S. and Canadian officials said at a news conference in Windsor. … They were transported in cars, trucks, boats and even freight trains, sometimes in deplorable conditions, including subfreezing temperatures, authorities alleged. Most were headed for work in New York City, officials said. They also said most entered Canada first, were taken to safe houses in the Toronto area and driven to Windsor for transport across the border." The Free Press notes, "U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy III of Detroit said the investigation shows the importance of securing the nation's borders. … 'This stuff goes on every day,' Murphy said."

The Detroit News (2/15) reports, "Officials say it was one of the largest smuggling rings along the northern border to be dismantled by law enforcement in recent memory. … 'Those who smuggle human beings across international borders should realize that they will be met with an international united front of law enforcement agencies dedicated to stopping them cold and putting them in jail,' U.S. Attorney Stephen J. Murphy said." The News adds, "Since December 2004, U.S. officials say they have caught at least 78 illegal immigrants -- most of them Chinese -- attempting to enter Michigan in connection with this ring, which includes a nurse at Henry Ford Hospital in Detroit, a Windsor truck driver and the Albion owner of a restaurant. … A federal grand jury in Detroit indicted 14 people, and two others were charged in criminal complaints. Canadian officials charged seven others -- along with four of those also charged by U.S. officials -- with breaking Canadian laws."

The Canadian Post (2/16) reports, "Investigators said the migrants came from China, Korea, Albania, and Eastern Europe. … Canadian officials said 24 migrants were stopped entering Canada, while U.S. authorities said they intercepted

74 people being smuggled into the United States from Canada." The Post adds, "Seventeen people were arrested Tuesday in Toronto, Windsor, Detroit and New York City, the culmination of a two-year investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the U.S. Department of Homeland Security and the Canada Border Services Agency. … More arrests are expected as a total of 23 people are charged, with some facing charges in both Canada and the United States."

The Canadian Press (2/16, ROSE) reports, "Despite the large sums of money collected in the operation, Ontario residents alleged to have helped transport the migrants in the high-risk operation were paid only a few hundred dollars, the RCMP say. … 'The leaders, the organizers had these migrants to move across and they were the ones getting the bigger bucks, but they didn't want to take the risk, so they were paying local people involved in the Windsor and Sarnia area a few hundred dollars,' said RCMP Insp. Glenn Hanna. … They 'were naive and gullible and decided it was worth taking the risk for a few hundred dollars, not realizing how much was going in at the beginning of the pipeline, how much they were getting at their end of it, and how much they were being used.'" CP adds, "Despite the revelation of the smuggling ring, border officials say it is business as usual and there are no plans for any significant changes or crackdowns along the Canadian side of the 49th parallel."

Local Television. There was extensive local TV coverage of the news involving the breakup of a human smuggling ring. Some examples: WDIV-TV Detroit (2/15, 6:31 a.m.) reported on a "major bust involving a human smuggling ring. 14 people were arrested, accused of being smuggled into and out of the US from Canada. The suspects were hidden in trucks and on small boats and paid thousands of dollars to be involved. Arrests were made in Toronto, Windsor, Detroit, and New York City."

KCAL-TV Los Angeles (2/15, 9:16 p.m.) reported, "American and Canadian police say they busted an international human smuggling ring. People from several countries in Asia and Eastern Europe were transported both ways across the border with Canada and into Detroit by freight train." WJBK-TV Detroit (2/15, 11:02 a.m.) was just one of many Michigan stations also covering this story. Other stations outside of Michigan airing reports on it included WJW-TV Cleveland (2/15, 7:18 a.m.) and KAKE-TV Wichita (2/15, 6:19 a.m.).

DOJ Asked To Probe Deaths At Florida Juvenile Facilities. The AP (2/16, Kallestad) reports, "The mother of a 14-year-old boy said Wednesday that her son was murdered by guards who beat him at a boot camp for juvenile offenders in Panama City (FL)." The AP continues, "Bay County sheriff's spokeswoman Ruth Sasser declined comment because of the ongoing investigation into the Jan. 6 death of Martin Lee Anderson. The sheriff's office, which runs the camp, has said the boy was restrained after he became uncooperative. … 'My baby was murdered,' his mother, Gina Jones, said at a news conference. 'Don't let my baby's death be in vain.'" The AP adds, "Also Wednesday, the Legislature's black caucus urged the head of the Florida Department of Law Enforcement to remove himself from the investigation because he previously had been Bay County sheriff. But Gov. Jeb Bush said he remained confident in FDLE Commissioner Guy Tunnell and didn't plan to make any decisions until the formal investigation was completed. … Some legislators, however, weren't as confident in the investigation that already has taken about six weeks. Law enforcement authorities have resisted legal efforts by news organizations and others to obtain a video tape that two lawmakers said showed the beating." The AP notes, "In other new developments, the Florida Southern Christian Leadership Conference asked the U.S. Justice Department to investigate all deaths in Florida's juvenile system the last five years, including Anderson's. … Lawmakers and the NAACP also asked for arrests in the Anderson beating and called on Bush to appoint a special prosecutor."

FBI Investigating Alleged Civil Rights Violation By Texas Police. The Jasper (TX) Newsboy (2/15, Ellis) reports Kirbyville pastor Ted Williams on Monday addressed the Jasper City Council "and asked for assistance in 'getting some answers' from Jasper Police Chief Todd Hunter, concerning an incident in January that resulted in the arrest of his son Jeremy. … Williams said he and his son had met with Robert E. King, special agent with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, to determine if Jeremy's civil rights had been violated," and Williams said "that an investigation would be conducted with the results sent to Washington. Problems started with discarded wooden pallets that some JHS students were planning to use as fuel for the senior bonfire." Jeremy Williams "approached the students claiming that he had a contract for 300 pallets through FEMA. A disagreement and altercation ensued during which Williams…called 911 for the Jasper Police Department. Williams claimed that upon their arrival, officers used excessive force and that he was the only one arrested, even though he was the one attacked by the other parties involved."

Idaho Legislature Approves Gay Union Ban. The New York Times/Reuters (2/16) reports, "Idaho's Legislature gave final approval Wednesday to a measure that would bar all forms of "domestic legal unions" except marriage between a man and a woman." The proposed amendment to the state constitution "will now go up for a popular vote. Gay rights groups say the law would effectively bar any form of union that would allow same-sex couples to share rights enjoyed by heterosexual couples, like shared custody or insurance benefits."

New Jersey Supreme Court Considers Gay Marriage Question. The New York Times (2/16, Chen, 1.19M) reports, "Plunging into a contentious case of national interest, the State Supreme Court on Wednesday began weighing arguments about whether New Jersey should become the second state in the nation to permit same-sex marriage." Five "of the seven justices peppered lawyers for" both sides "with pointed questions indicating curiosity and concern. Legal scholars say that "New Jersey's high court…is particularly interesting because it has been considered one of the most liberal, and has also been unafraid to recommend solutions in other controversial matters…that some people argue could have, or should have, been done by the Legislature."

ANTITRUST:

US Leads Global Air Cargo Price-Fixing Probe. The AP (2/16, Weber) reports, "More than a dozen airlines have now been drawn into a widening investigation by United States and European Union officials of whether there has been collusion in the air cargo industry to fix prices on surcharges for fuel, security and insurance." The AP continues, "Spokespersons for the European Commission, the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Bureau of Investigation refused Wednesday to provide details about the probe. … But one of the foreign airline's targeted, SAS AB's SAS Cargo in Copenhagen, Denmark, said the EU has alleged that cooperation among airlines began in 2000 and involved agreements about surcharges imposed by airlines to offset certain external costs. … Among the costs, according to a statement from SAS, are surcharges on fuel, added security after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the U.S. and premiums for war-risk insurance after the start of the war in Iraq. SAS said in a statement it does not suspect any violations at its operations." The AP notes, "In Washington, FBI spokesman Bill Carter said records in the case have been sealed and he referred further questions to Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona, who would say only that the investigation was ongoing. She declined further comment. … EU antitrust spokesman Jonathan Todd in Brussels, Belgium, when asked if there was also an investigation into collusion in setting fuel surcharges for passenger flights, said: 'I cannot make any comment on any other investigation that may or may not be going on. At any one time, the commission has several hundreds of antitrust investigations going on, of which only a small proportion are in the public domain.'"

Reuters (2/16) reports, "The investigation started on Tuesday when the European Union's executive arm and the U.S. Justice Department raided a number of air cargo carriers on both sides of the Atlantic, while other airlines were asked for information related to the probe. … The case could threaten to put a brake on recent growth in the $50 billion (29 billion pound) global air cargo market, which U.S. aircraft maker Boeing Co. has estimated will expand at an average annual rate of 6.2 percent in the next two decades, exceeding the expected growth rates of passenger traffic and the world economy." Reuters adds, "The alleged activity, mainly involving various surcharges such as for fuel and for security measures imposed after the September 11, 2001, attacks on the United States using hijacked airliners, has supposedly been carried out since 2000, SAS said. … War-risk surcharges that were applied after the U.S-led invasion of Iraq in 2003 were also involved, it said."

Reuters (2/16) reports, "Air Canada parent ACE Aviation Holdings Inc. said on Wednesday that Canada's antitrust agency is investigating carriers that provide international air cargo services in a widening of the global investigation of suspected price-fixing. … 'We did receive yesterday a letter from the Competition Bureau of Canada stating that it has begun an investigation into the activities of carriers that are engaged in the provision of international air cargo services to and from Canada,' Isabelle Arthur, spokeswoman for ACE Aviation, told Reuters. … 'We will co-operate fully with the Competition Bureau. It is our policy to conduct our business in accordance with all applicable competition laws,' she added."

Yonhap News (2/16) reports, "South Korea's antitrust authority said Wednesday it has launched a probe into local airlines after allegations emerged of their involvement in an international air cargo price-fixing cartel. … 'Investigators have been sent to (the headquarters of) Korean Air and Asiana Airlines,' an official at the Fair Trade Commission (FTC) said. The regulator, who declined to be identified, said the branch offices of Air France and several other foreign airlines have been searched. He did not say when the probes began or reveal when investigators visited the airline offices. … 'In order to conduct an effective investigation, we are carrying out the probes in conjunction with European and U.S. antitrust regulators,' the official said."

Reuters (2/15) reports, "United Parcel Service Inc. said on Wednesday it has been contacted informally by the U.S. Justice Department over a transatlantic antitrust probe. … 'UPS understands it is not part of the probe,' UPS spokesman Norman Black said. 'As is its practice, UPS will cooperate with requests from government agencies.'"

Recalls, Litigation Make Guidant-BS Merger Problematic. USA Today (2/16, Iwata) reports, "Boston

Scientific triumphed last month in the fierce merger war for Guidant, outlasting Johnson & Johnson with a $27 billion offer. … But now Boston Scientific and Guidant, leading heart-device makers in the growing $250 billion market for medical devices and supplies, must ride out a legal and regulatory storm that could slow their deal, delay products and lead to costly court judgments and government penalties. The companies face investigations, product-liability lawsuits and warnings from the Food and Drug Administration to correct problems at their manufacturing sites." USA continues, "At the same time, Boston Scientific and Guidant — with a combined $11 billion in revenue, 30,000 employees and a dozen plants in the USA and abroad — must smoothly blend their operations. … 'It's a pretty complex juggling act,' says analyst Thomas Gunderson at Piper Jaffray. 'It adds a level of risk we haven't seen before.'" USA adds, "The merger clock is ticking. If the deal does not close by March 31, Boston Scientific must pay Guidant shareholders $4 million a day, Gunderson estimates. … Boston Scientific hopes to win antitrust approval soon from the Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission. … Meanwhile, the U.S. Attorney's Office in Minneapolis and the FDA are investigating Guidant's pacemakers and defibrillators, according to court records, patients' attorneys and Guidant's filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission. … As of December, seven people have died worldwide in incidents involving Guidant's Contak Renewal, Renewal 2 and Ventak Prizm 2DR devices, the FDA says."

Microsoft Slams EU In Antitrust Filing. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Cohen) reports, "Microsoft Corp. met a deadline to respond to European antitrust charges by attacking regulators, making it likely the U.S. software giant will be hit with new fines over a compliance dispute." The Journal continues, "The European Commission has 'ignored critical evidence in its haste' to impose daily fines of as much as €2 million, or about $2.4 million, against the company, Microsoft said. The Redmond, Wash., company said it already 'complied fully' with orders to help open software markets it dominates to greater competition. … But regulators said Microsoft had failed to provide workable instructions to rivals that want to write and sell software that can operate smoothly with Microsoft products. 'It is of course the European Commission that will decide whether Microsoft is compliant ... and not Microsoft,' regulators said in a statement."

Reuters (2/16, Lawsky) reports, "Microsoft today formally denied European Commission charges that could lead to 2 million euro (US$2.4 million) daily fines in an antitrust case, saying critical evidence had been ignored. … But the European Commission, in an unusual statement, said Microsoft had filed the evidence 11 days after a deadline in December - once the Commission had already issued a Statement of Objections to fine the company. … The Commission also said it is market-testing Microsoft's plans to offer access to source code, the blueprint for Microsoft's software." Reuters adds, "The Commission had given the US software giant until today to explain why it should not be fined for failing to carry out sanctions imposed in March 2004 for using its Windows software monopoly to muscle out smaller competitors. … The company was supposed to provide rival makers of server software with directions to allow their products to interconnect with Windows desktop machines as easily as Microsoft's own server software, used for work-group printer and other tasks. … The Commission said the directions were not workable but the company disagreed in its formal response."

The New York Times (2/16, Meller) reports that Microsoft "submitted a 75-page response to the commission, Europe's top antitrust authority, just hours before a midnight deadline." The Times adds, "On Dec. 22, the commission said Microsoft had not yet complied with its ruling. The agency said that 'Microsoft had not yet provided complete and accurate specifications of the interoperability information which it is obliged to disclose.' … Microsoft, however, said it had filed the technical documents to the commission by the Dec. 15 deadline. Those documents answered the remaining questions the commission had on the company's compliance, Microsoft said. … The commission, however, said it received nothing from Microsoft until after its public statement on the company. 'This documentation was actually supplied on Dec. 26,' the commission said."

The Financial Times (2/16, Buck) reports, "Microsoft also sought to turn up the heat on the Commission's technical adviser, the British computer scientist Professor Neil Barrett, whose scathing assessment of Microsoft's compliance efforts to date formed the basis for the regulator's charges. Mr Barrett dismissed Microsoft's documentation as 'totally useless' … Microsoft on Wednesday handed in a rival assessment that concluded that 'the inter-operability information . . . current industry standards' and provides 'complete and accurate information'."

The AP (2/16, White) reports, "An independent monitor had found that the documents provided by Microsoft last autumn needed a drastic overhaul. … Computer science professor Neil Barrett wrote a critical report about the company's efforts to comply with the EU's ruling, saying he and a colleague had been unable to use Microsoft's instructions to make rival software work with Microsoft servers."

Bloomberg (2/16, Newman) reports, "Today's filing includes two experts' reports that Microsoft said are independent. Five computers science professors evaluated the company's technical documentation and concluded that 'the interoperability information as provided by Microsoft meets current industry standards.' … 'We believe that it has provided complete and accurate information, to the extent that this can be reasonably achieved, covering protocols, dependencies and implicit knowledge,' the experts said in a 49-page report, according to Microsoft. … The commission's own independent trustee, hired to monitor Microsoft's compliance, came to the opposite conclusion. In a Nov. 30 report, computer scientist Neil Barrett, said: 'Overall the process of using the documentation is an absolutely frustrating, time-consuming and ultimately fruitless task. The documentation needs quite drastic overhaul before it could be considered workable.'"

CNET News (2/16, Marson) reports, "Microsoft also claimed that is has not been given enough time to respond to the commission's concerns and has therefore been 'denied due process in defending itself.' … 'The commission waited many months before informing Microsoft that it believed changes were necessary to the technical documents and then gave Microsoft only a few weeks to make extensive revisions,' the Microsoft filing states."

Dow Jones (2/16) reports, "Microsoft and the European Commission have battled over antitrust issues since 1998. In March 2004, the Commission fined the company a record EUR497 million and ordered it to change some of its business practices. … Since then, Microsoft has produced a version of its ubiquitous Windows operating system without a built-in media player. Concerns about rivals' software programs working with Windows-based servers - an issue known as interoperability - remain unresolved and are the basis of the Commission's December complaint."

Italian Regulators Fine Eni $345 Million For Competition Violations. Italian Antitrust Regulators Fine Eni For The AP (2/16) reports, "Italian antitrust regulators are fining energy giant Eni SpA 290 million euros ($345 million) for abusing its dominant position by 'hindering the entrance of independent operators' on the national market for natural gas." The AP continues, "The authority also said Wednesday in a statement on its Web site that it had ordered Eni to end its "competition-distortion conduct" by turning over to third parties the capacity for the additional transport of 227.5 billion cubic feet of gas annually from Algeria through the Eni-controlled Trans Tunisian Pipeline Company by Oct. 1, 2008." The AP adds, "Eni, the nation's dominant oil and gas company, said it would study the authority's reasons for the fine in deciding whether to appeal. … In a statement, Eni said it had recently given the authority 'some pro-competition measures' consisting of 'gas pipeline development to be undertaken in the shortest technical time.' … The authority's decision comes amid the politically sensitive issue of higher natural gas prices for Italian consumers, as the country deals with recently reduced gas supplies from Russia."

Hospitals Resisting Bush Proposal To Disclose Prices. The Hill (2/16, Young) reports the Bush Administration's "seemingly straightforward proposal to ask hospitals, doctors and other medical providers to disclose their prices is encountering some early resistance." Lobbyists for the hospital industry "left a meeting with National Economic Council Director Allan Hubbard at the White House on Tuesday concerned that they would be muscled into participating in the program." In a memo to his board of directors, Federation of American Hospitals President Chip Kahn said, "It is too early to tell whether or not the Administration will stick to their guns on the agenda that Hubbard laid out, but at this point we have to take their apparent determination to enter the health policy arena seriously." The Hill adds the White House "wants the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) to implement and oversee a voluntary program that would publicize the prices healthcare providers charge for their services. HHS Secretary Mike Leavitt will take the lead on working out a deal to get providers on board." The White House "appears prepared to push its healthcare agenda aggressively."

Cerberus Group Leads Bidding For GMAC Stake. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Berman, Pulliam) reports, "A group led by Cerberus Capital Management and Citigroup's private-equity arm is the leading bidder for the majority stake in General Motors Acceptance Corp. that its parent, General Motors Corp., is shopping to prospective buyers, people familiar with the matter said." The Journal continues, "While a separate bidding group led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Wachovia Corp. hasn't fully dropped from the running, GM is spending the bulk of its time negotiating with the Cerberus group, these people noted." The Journal adds, "Financial details couldn't be learned last night. GMAC, which writes loans on cars, homes, college tuition and other things, has been valued by many analysts at roughly $11.5 billion, the unit's book value. A final price could nonetheless vary substantially, based on how a deal is structured. GM may still choose, for instance, to sell off parts of the GMAC business and keep the auto-finance business intact. … Completing a deal will be difficult for any buyer, given the legal and financial issues surrounding the separation between GM and the financing arm. The company originally announced a possible sale in October, but the response from potential buyers has been tepid largely because of the complexity and scale of a transaction. … Despite those concerns, Cerberus has emerged as the most eager potential buyer, say people familiar with the transaction. The New York investment fund, which prides itself on secrecy, has taken stakes or control in dozens of companies over the past decade. In recent months, it was part of a group that signed a deal to purchase supermarkets from grocery chain Albertson's Inc."

BlackRock-Merrill Merger Talks Examined. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Berman, Smith, Lauricella) reports, "Money manager BlackRock Inc. was in the midst of deal discussions with Morgan Stanley on Jan. 17, when the heads of BlackRock and Merrill Lynch & Co. met at the Three Guys coffee shop near their homes on Manhattan's Upper East Side. … Merrill had caught wind of the BlackRock-Morgan talks. And days before, a meeting was discreetly set up between Merrill Chief Executive Stan O'Neal and BlackRock Chief Executive Laurence Fink. Over canned grapefruit juice and a bowl of Raisin Bran, Mr. O'Neal explained his point of view." The Journal continues, "Unlike Morgan Stanley Chief Executive John Mack, Mr. O'Neal said he would be willing to combine the two companies' money-management operations in a way that would leave BlackRock with control of the new firm. … As long as Merrill still had a meaningful partnership role, Mr. O'Neal was willing to swap a business that produced 60% of the combine company's profits for just a 49% ownership stake. Now, with the Morgan Stanley talks stalling over control and price, Mr. Fink's plans began to change." The Journal adds, "That meeting kicked off what became known as 'Project Trident,' a $9.8 billion exchange that would transform BlackRock into one of the world's biggest money managers. It will also reshape how Merrill, which has the largest army of 15,160 brokers, sells the mutual funds that are the staples of household finances across the country. … For the deal-averse Mr. O'Neal, it represents the largest transaction in his four-year tenure, and the best chance to squeeze more growth from his $525 billion money-management unit, which offered its first mutual fund back in 1969."

Phone Company Control Of Internet Debated. USA Today (2/16) editorializes, "In the history of great ideas, the Internet will surely rank near the top. In a relatively short time, it has made vast amounts of information searchable, sortable and readily available with a few key strokes. … Much of the Internet's appeal is that no one controls it in the way that, say, a grocery store decides which brands to stock. Within its virtual walls, a start-up such as MySpace or Craigslist can surge to prominence entirely on the power of an idea." USA continues, "Now, some very old-school companies want to change all that. Using market dominance achieved through the relative scarcity of lines into people's homes, phone companies such as BellSouth, Verizon and AT&T are eyeing a system that would demand that operators of search engines, e-commerce sites and other Web applications pay them fees or be relegated to the slow lane." USA adds, "Competition might keep the phone companies from putting the squeeze on website operators. That would be the best outcome. But consumers in many parts of the country have little choice in broadband, so Congress is appropriately exploring legislation that would lay out a principle of "Net neutrality" that would require all websites to receive equal access. … Telecommunications companies say they are not altering the Internet, merely offering a new ultra-high-speed tier of service on top of it. Don't be fooled. Once they begin choosing search engines, auction sites and other applications for their premium service, they alter the entire competitive landscape. … In this new world, companies would have to spend more time kowtowing to the likes of AT&T and less time innovating. That doesn't sound like such a great idea."

In an op-ed in USA Today (2/16), Walter McCormick, president and CEO of the United States Telecom Association, writes, "Local telecommunications companies have a 150-year tradition of connecting people with each other. As we invest billions of dollars in new, advanced broadband networks, our commitment remains the same: We will connect you to whomever you choose, and we will not block, impair, or degrade any content, applications or services. The Internet freedom you have today, you will have tomorrow." McCormick continues, "Government has kept its hands off the Internet, and it has flourished. Telecom companies have not sought to hinder the Internet's growth — indeed, just the opposite: We have invested, grown and expanded the networks that make up this extraordinary resource. Today's DSL, cable, wireless and satellite companies vigorously compete to offer a faster, more robust Internet experience. … Consumers are in control via new pricing and service packages being made available everyday — witness AT&T's announcement of $12.99-per-month DSL access. Consumers expect and demand Internet freedom. If telecom companies don't provide it, they will do business with someone else." McCormick concludes, "No one in today's debate opposes Internet freedom. We differ only in this: We do not believe that now is the time to close the chapter on Internet innovation and progress by turning to government-managed competition and central planning, no matter how well-intentioned. … Those who invest in advanced fiber, wireline and wireless broadband networks should be free to offer new services, and new pricing and service options, in a marketplace characterized by robust competition and consumer choice."

ENVIRONMENT:

Pombo Opens Probe Of Oil Company Leases. The New York Times (2/16, Andrews, 1.19M) reports that Rep. Richard Pombo has begun a broad investigation of an Interior Department program "that is expected to give billions of dollars in benefits over the next five years to companies that pump oil and gas on federal territory." In a letter on Wednesday to Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton, Pombo "demanded memos, correspondence and data on the program and on the negotiations over the law that created it in 1996." Pombo "said he was beginning the investigation in response to an article published on Tuesday in The New York Times." He "made it clear that a primary purpose of his investigation was to attribute much of the problem to decisions by the Clinton administration to sweeten the incentives in 1998 and 1999. But Jennifer Zuccarelli, a spokeswoman for Mr. Pombo, said the letter to Ms. Norton 'is only the beginning of what the chairman believes will be a broad investigation.'"

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Using Tested Strategies In Alabama Church Fire Probe. WHNT-TV, News 19, Huntsville, AL (2/16, Woodard) reports, "The ATF has set up phone lines, hoping to get information on the Alabama church fires. Early Tuesday morning, agents got a tip from Choctaw County about a suspicious vehicle near a Baptist church and another involved in an accident. Tom Crowley of the ATF says, 'Everything fit, it looked promising, it was something that needed to be checked out, and we'll continue to check out anything that comes in.' … That tip turned out to be a false alarm." WHNT-TV continues, "Law enforcement at all levels have been asking for help since the church fires began back on February third. Ten Baptist churches in five Alabama counties have been damaged or destroyed by arsonists. ATF Regional Director Jim Cavanaugh says, 'We're not magicians, we're policemen, we have to work through it as we go.' … ATF used tips and a suspect call-in number to help solve the D.C. sniper case. The agents used a command post, like the one at the Tuscaloosa airport, to help capture and convict Eric Rudolph. They hope old strategies and new tips will lead them to the two white males in the dark-colored sport utility vehicle. Cavanaugh says, 'We're getting good calls, suspicious activity, matches the description, people calling in saying who the team is.'"

Probers Demonstrate Investigative Techniques. WAFF-TV, Huntsville, AL (2/16) reports, "To better explain how the ATF is investigating the ten Alabama church fires, one investigator walked WAFF 48 News through the steps they're taking to solve the crimes." WAFF-TV continues, "Caesar is a specially trained black Labrador retriever and one of the first agents inside a burned building. … With guidance from his partner in crime, Tony Deversa, Caesar knows exactly what to do. … Caesar searches high and low while investigators like Deversa take inventory inside and out. … Searching seemingly for the impossible, where every piece of evidence is burned beyond recognition." WAFF-TV adds, "The goal in every fire investigation is to find an area of origin, which can often indicate a potential ignition source. … For the church arsons, authorities used those same methods and determined the fires started at the pulpit area. … From there, investigators scan for the burned area that's lowest to the ground."

San Diego City Employees Facing Drug Charges Linked To Local Gang. The AP (2/15) reports that officials say two San Diego city employees arrested last month on drug and weapons charges were leaders of a local street gang. Ralph Briggs, 43, and James Woods, 38, "were arrested Jan. 17 on state charges of selling and possessing cocaine and weapons allegations as part of a six-month undercover investigation, according to Misha Piastro, a spokesman for the federal Drug Enforcement Administration in San Diego. Briggs and Woods worked in the San Diego Parks and Recreation Department's ground and maintenance division. Woods also is accused of selling marijuana on the job, prosecutor Damon Mosler said. … Briggs and Woods were the leaders of a local cell of the Syndo Mob, short for Syndicate, and their arrests eliminated the cell, Piastro said. The Syndo mob is affiliated with the Bloods, a nationwide street gang. … The two men, who are half-brothers, have been suspended without pay." More than 30 news outlets published in newspapers and/or posted on their Web sites the AP story, including The Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, New York Newsday, Kansas City Star, and San Jose Mercury News.

The San Diego Union Tribune (2/15) reports, "Nine people linked to a notorious street gang have been arrested after a six-month undercover probe into a suspected drug trafficking operation in San Diego, authorities have announced. Two of those arrested during raids over past weeks previously were publicly identified as San Diego Park & Recreation Department employees accused of using city vehicles to deal drugs." With the culmination of the probe, called Operation Southern Strike, John S. Fernandes, special agent in charge of the San Diego office of the Drug Enforcement Administration, "said he hoped it would send a strong signal that gang membership and drug dealing are dead ends. 'The DEA is committed to working hand in hand with local authorities to confront drug dealers and gangsters who perpetrate crime and violence in our cities,' he said. Recent criminal activities by the gang prompted the DEA to set up a task force comprised of DEA agents, members of the San Diego County Sheriff, District Attorney's Office, California Highway Patrol and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms to target the Syndo Mob and its associates."

Trial Begins For Philadelphia Drug Dealer Accused Of Murdering Witness. The Philadelphia

Inquirer (2/16, Slobodzian, 423K) reports former FBI most-wanted suspect Felix Summers, "already acquitted of two murders," went on trial yesterday "on charges involving the 1999 killing of a potential witness against him. Assistant District Attorney Carlos Vega called the murder of 39-year-old Charlotte Presley 'a crime that cuts to the core of the court system.' … Authorities say Summers…a former South Philadelphia drug dealer, was the gunman who went to Presley's third-floor apartment in…1999, and shot her. Defense attorney Jack McMahon told the jury Summers was the victim of mistaken identity compounded by the wrath of a 'woman scorned' -- a former girlfriend trying to get even by fingering Summers for a crime he did not commit. Complicating yesterday's first day of the retrial: Sherrie Hewett, the former girlfriend who gave Summers his nickname, failed to appear at court as subpoenaed."

DEA Helps Investigate One Of Michigan's "Longest-Running" Criminal Enterprises. Lansing (MI) State Journal (2/16) reports, "Authorities on Wednesday said they have dismantled a Lansing drug ring that had been dealing heroin and crack cocaine since the early 1980s. It was one of the longest-running criminal enterprises in the history of western Michigan, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Courtade, who headed the prosecution. The U.S. District Court's Western Michigan region encompasses Lansing and everything west, as well as the Upper Peninsula. 'It wasn't the biggest, but it was certainly one of the longest in existence,' he said, adding that it was run like a family business. Two Lansing men were convicted Monday in federal court for their roles in the ring that included at least a dozen others — many of them related. The organization supplied heroin and cocaine in the Lansing area for more than two decades. … Prosecutors said the close-knit nature of the relationship between the buyers and the family members selling them the drugs made the case difficult for authorities to break. The investigation was conducted by the ATF's Lansing office, Lansing police and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration."

WLNS-TV, Lansing, Michigan (2/16) reports on its Web site, "Lansing police say they've shut down a major heroin ring in the city, and just this week a grand jury indicted the last of fourteen dope dealers. The evidence of drugs and firearms show the magnitude of the operation. The Lansing Police Department says 14 people -- mostly from the same family -- have been delivering large amounts of heroine and cocaine for nearly four years."

WILX-TV, Lansing (2/16) reports on its Web site, "The ringleader, 49-year-old Lionel Beard of Lansing, was convicted this week of running a criminal operation, dealing drugs and for being a felon in possession of guns. His younger brother, 34-year-old Thomas Beard of Meridian Township, was convicted by the same federal jury for weapons possession and dealing. With the Beard ring out of action, police officials say they've noticed a dip in heroin trafficking in the city."

City Council In California Prevents Businesses From Distributing Medical Marijuana. The AP (2/15) reports, "San Marcos became the first city in San Diego County to ban businesses from distributing medical marijuana. The ordinance tentatively approved Tuesday by the San Marcos City Council allows the only medical marijuana dispensary in the city north of San Diego to remain open if it follows all applicable laws. But what those laws are remains unclear. Federal law bans marijuana, but in 1996, California voters approved Proposition 215, which legalized marijuana for medical purposes. San Diego County has defied the state-ordered program and filed a legal challenge to the voter-approved law. San Marcos' lone marijuana dispensary is owned by Legal Ease Inc., which said it only sells the drug to people with valid prescriptions from doctors." The AP adds, "In December, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration raided the business along with 12 others in San Diego after undercover agents said they were able to buy marijuana without a prescription. The DEA said Legal Ease remains under investigation."

Bolivian Coca Farmers Call For Expulsion Of US Anti-Drug Units. The Washington Times (2/16, Arostegui) reports, "A coalition of coca farmers led by Bolivian President Evo Morales is calling publicly for the immediate expulsion of U.S. counternarcotics units from the country, raising questions about the viability of U.S. programs. The move, placing further strain on tense relations with the United States, came late Tuesday at a meeting of six dominant coca-growing federations with Mr. Morales presiding. However, the president appeared to back away from the resolution in an address to the armed forces yesterday afternoon, saying, 'As long as Bolivia's sovereignty is respected, no international organism will be expelled from Bolivia.' The resolution would affect the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the State Department's Narcotics Affairs Section and the Alternative Development Program run by the U.S. Agency for International Development to help farmers develop alternative crops. … U.S. Ambassador David N. Greenlee met last week with newly appointed counternarcotics officials, including Felipe Caceres, the vice minister for social defense, and Felix Barra, who heads the Alternative Development Program, since renamed the Program for Coca and Integral Development. … Mr. Greenlee expressed satisfaction with his talks and said there was 'room for understanding.'"

Venezuela's Daily Journal (2/16) reports, "Bolivian President Evo Morales said he will not expel U.S. anti-narcotics agents, as sought by the coca growers who helped propel him to power, but warned foreign officials operating here to respect the nation's sovereignty and dignity. … The president said Wednesday that Bolivia should foster friendly international ties and that foreign officials should be allowed to continue operating in the Andean nation as long as they respect its laws. … Under a bilateral pact, the United States provides financial, material and technical assistance to Bolivia in battling the cocaine trade. Part of the program involves the presence of DEA agents in the central coca-growing region of Chapare. Sources at the U.S. Embassy in La Paz [said] the request by…coca growers to boot the DEA agents prompted the mission to cancel a scheduled meeting with Bolivian anti-narcotics officials."

Wisconsin Man Sentenced To Five Years For Racially-Motivated Church Arsons. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (2/10, 266K) reported, "A 22-year-old Oconomowoc man has been sentenced to five years and three months in prison for trying to burn down two African-American churches, one in Milwaukee and one in Michigan. Daniel L. Dropik pleaded guilty in October to two counts of racially motivated arson of a church. … At the sentencing hearing Friday in federal court in Milwaukee, U.S. District Judge Rudolph T. Randa said he believes Dropik's actions 'were motivated by deep psychological and psychiatric problems.' However, the judge also considered the seriousness of the offense, particularly that Dropik set out to burn churches with largely black congregations. In addition to the prison term, Dropik must spent three years on supervised release and pay $39,697 in restitution." The AP (2/10) also reported on the sentencing, drawing heavily on the Journal-Sentinel story.

Richmond, VA, Gun Show Comes Under Federal Scrutiny. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (2/16, Mussenden) reports, "A crackdown on illegal firearm sales at Richmond-area gun shows led to a congressional inquiry yesterday into whether federal agents trampled the rights of gun buyers." The Times-Dispatch continues, "The organizer of an August gun show at Richmond Raceway Complex told a House panel that a large team of federal agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and city, state and county police patrolled the two-day show, harassing law-abiding gun buyers while looking for illicit gun sales. … Annette Gelles of Showmasters, the organizer, told the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Crime that agents' aggressive tactics unnerved some attendees, and the visible presence drove away other customers. … 'hey impeded people's Second Amendment rights,'Gelles said after the hearing. ' think they were there trying to shut the show down. Why else would they bring that many officers? It scared away a lot of law-abiding people.'" The Times-Dispatch adds, "After noticing that guns purchased at shows -- which, unlike store sales, do not always require a background check -- were used to commit local crimes, the ATF, Richmond and Henrico County police and Virginia State Police joined to strengthen oversight of gun-show firearm sales. … Representatives of the four agencies were not invited to the hearing. … The ATF is scheduled to present its side of the story at a hearing Feb. 28, said subcommittee chairman Rep. Howard Coble, R-N.C."

New York Launches Strategy To Curb Gun Dealers. The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Marks) reports, "New York and other major cities are preparing to take on Congress and the gun lobby. … The reason: They're tired of their streets being flooded with guns bought somewhere else. In New York City, for instance, 85 percent of the guns used in crimes are bought legally in other states with far less stringent gun-control laws, most of them in the South." The Monitor continues, "Other East Coast metropolises, from Boston to Washington, face a similar gun influx. And so, despite a recent federal law that protects gun dealers and manufacturers from litigation, city leaders have signaled the start of a national movement to sue out-of-state gun dealers they consider 'bad apples' - those who knowingly sell to so-called straw buyers and others who traffic in illegal guns. … 'Right now, about 1 percent of gun dealers account for almost 60 percent of guns used in crimes nationally,' New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg said in his recent State of the City address. 'This year, we are going to launch lawsuits against these irresponsible dealers, and we are going to hold them accountable for the terrible damage their guns cause.' … That is a central part of his five-pronged strategy to attack gun violence in New York. It also includes toughening penalties for possession of illegal guns, intensive interrogating of suspects toting illegal guns so the source of the weapons can be better traced, and setting up a gun-offender registry similar to the ones set up for sex offenders so communities can know if a convicted gun offender lives in the neighborhood. … But the legal assault on gun dealers is the action expected to gain the most attention, and support, from other cities. Boston Mayor Tom Menino has already signaled he intends to join New York in its direct challenge to lawmakers in Washington."

ATF Bomb-Sniffing Dog Dies After Fall At Basketball Game. The Houston Chronicle (2/16, Hanson) reports, "An explosives sniffing dog died this morning after falling from a ramp at the George R. Brown Convention Center in downtown Houston." The Chronicle continues, "The dog, Mikey, was part of a U.S. Alcohol,

DOJ_NMG_0015506

Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives unit involved in a security sweep of the convention center in preparation for the NBA All-Star game, said Franceska Perot, spokeswoman for ATF." The Chronicle adds, "Perot said about 1:30 a.m. the unit was taking a break and the dog, a Labrador, was being put into the back of a truck when he suddenly bolted and went over the edge of a ramp. … The dog fell about 55 feet to the ground and was taken to a local veterinary clinic where he died. Perot said the dog, used for detecting explosives, may have seen a pigeon and instinct took over and he jumped at the bird."

Frist Calls Capital Gains, Dividend Tax Cuts "Non-Negotiable." In a Washington Times op-ed (2/16), Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist says the "one thing" that "must remain non-negotiable" in the conference for the tax cut bill is "an extension for the effective reductions in capital-gains and dividends taxes that Congress enacted in 2003." The "very existence of taxes on capital gains and dividends ranks among the worst provisions of America's labyrinthine tax system. Those who earn capital gains have already paid income taxes on their initial investments. When the government seizes a portion of profits earned as a company increases in value or issues a dividend, it penalizes saving, investment and risk-taking. The idea of taxing capital gains and dividends has deep flaws and, in time, we ought to eliminate both types of taxes altogether. For the moment, however, keeping them lower, longer appears a very good economic policy."

CQ (2/15, Schatz) reports Majority Leader Frist "warned the Senate's top tax writer Wednesday that he will reject the final $70 billion tax cut bill if it does not include an extension of the 2003 rate cut on capital gains and dividends." With formal conference negotiations "on the bill (HR 4297) set to begin, Frist also signaled that he would consider moving less controversial breaks separately — such as a "patch" to blunt the effect of the alternative minimum tax (AMT)." In a Feb. 14 letter to Finance Chairman Charles E. Grassley, R-Iowa, Frist said he "will not call up a conference report for Senate floor consideration if it does not include an extension of the capital gains and dividends tax relief."

Baucus Says 2006 AMT Fix More Important Than Expiring 2009 Provisions. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (2/16), Sen. Max Baucus says the Journal was "right on one count in your Feb. 9 editorial 'The Max Baucus Speed Bump': Cutting taxes is harder than it should be, at least when it comes to protecting America's working families from the alternative minimum tax. My so-called 'speed bump' on the road to extending capital gains and dividends cuts that do not expire until 2009 should be of little concern, compared with the brick wall toward which Congress is speeding: a huge 2006 tax increase for 17 million Americans the AMT should never snare. Congress should fix the AMT for 2006 now, and pass additional tax cuts Sen. Chuck Grassley (R., Iowa) and I have proposed for teachers, small businesses and individuals. Then we must work to repeal the stealth tax of the AMT altogether. I will gladly invoke Senate rules to keep Congress's eyes on the road toward immediate tax cuts for hardworking Americans who need them now."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

In TV Interview, Cheney Discusses Hunting Accident. Vice President Cheney, who has been criticized for his silence in the aftermath of his hunting accident, yesterday sat for an interview with Fox News' Brit Hume. Cheney took responsibility for the shooting of 78-year-old attorney Harold Whittington, and grew emotional when he discussed the accident and Whittington's injuries. As the CBS Evening News (2/15, lead story, 2:45, Axelrod) put it, for a "tough guy, not known for emotion, Dick Cheney looked somber and shaken." CBS also reported, "CBS News has learned that it was President Bush's political enforcer, Karl Rove, who finally got the Vice President to speak publicly about his hunting accident. And Rove pushed Mr. Cheney hard, worried that the story was moving from distraction to political problem."

While the coverage of Cheney's interview contains assessments of the White House strategy – and of Cheney's choice of Fox News for his interview – most stories are built around extensive excerpts of the Vice President's comments. Most reports this morning include this Cheney statement on Fox News' Special Report (2/15): "Ultimately, I'm the guy who pulled the trigger that fired the round that hit Harry. And you can talk about all of the other conditions that existed at the time, but that's the bottom line. And there's no -- it was not Harry's fault. You can't blame anybody else. I'm the guy who pulled the trigger and shot my friend. And I say that is something I'll never forget." Cheney also said "the image of him falling is something I'll never be able to get out of my mind. I fired, and there's Harry falling. And it was, I'd have to say, one of the worst days of my life, at that moment."

Cheney's explanation of why he didn't notify the White House press corps also gets a lot of play in the coverage. Cheney said on Fox News' Special Report (2/15), "My first reaction was not to think: I need to call the press. My first reaction is: My friend, Harry, has been shot and we've got to take care of him. That evening there were other considerations. We wanted to make sure his family was taken care of." Cheney added that Katherine Armstrong "suggested, and I agreed, that she would go make the announcement, that is that she'd put the story out. And I thought that made good sense." He added, "I had a bit of the feeling that the press corps was upset because, to some extent, it was about them -- they didn't like the idea that we called the Corpus Christi Caller-Times instead of The New York Times. But it strikes me that the Corpus Christi Caller-Times is just as valid a news outlet as The New York Times is, especially for covering a major story in south Texas."

Those two excerpts from the interview dominate much of the coverage. For example, USA Today (2/16, Jackson, 2.31M) reports a "somber…Cheney took full responsibility." Similar stories appear in the Baltimore Sun (2/16, Davis, 296K), which titles its report "Cheney Accepts Blame For Hunting Mishap" and Washington Post (2/16, A1, Baker, 744K), in a story headlined "Cheney Says Shooting Was His Fault." Reuters (2/16, Holland) reports Cheney "took the blame," adding that he acted "under pressure from Democrats and some Republicans to break his silence." The AP (2/16, Pickler, Brezosky) says "Cheney took the blame." Cheney "was soft-spoken and appeared shaken." Bloomberg (2/16, Rosenkrantz) and Knight Ridder (2/16, Hutcheson) run very similar stories.

The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Muskal, 958K), meanwhile, notes Cheney "praised" White House press secretary Scott McClellan "for how he handled the press. 'It's especially a tough job under these conditions and circumstances,' Cheney said." The New York Times (2/16, Sanger, Kornblut, 1.19M) reports Cheney "suggested in the interview that he had been advised by Mr. McClellan and Dan Bartlett, Mr. Bush's counselor and longtime communications adviser, to disclose what had happened more broadly and more quickly. 'I've got nothing but good things to say about Scott McClellan and Dan Bartlett,' Mr. Cheney said."

NBC Nightly News (2/15, lead story, 2:45, Williams) reported, "The Bush White House made an attempt at stopping the political damage by breaking four days of silence on the part of the Vice President." NBC (Gregory) added, "Until now, however, eyewitness Katharine Armstrong…and the White House have faulted Whittington for failing to alert Mr. Cheney that he was rejoining the hunting line after falling behind to search for a downed bird."

ABC World News Tonight (2/15, lead story, 2:45, Raddatz) reported, "The Vice President was unapologetic about the way this incident was handled. But he did take full responsibility for it." Raddatz: "Brit Hume, who conducted the interview, said the Vice President seemed shaken today, and found it difficult to speak about the accident." ABC added, "Cheney's description of what happened was markedly different in tone than the description offered Sunday by fellow hunter, Katharine Armstrong." The Washington Times (2/16, Sammon, 90K) also reports "the vice president's insistence on taking full responsibility for the accident marked a shift in strategy for the administration. Previously, the White House suggested that Mr. Whittington had violated a hunting 'protocol' by not making his whereabouts more clearly known to Mr. Cheney."

Most analysts agree the interview could go a long way toward defusing the growing controversy about the accident. ABC's News Nightline (2/15, Moran) called Cheney's interview on Fox News, "Personal, pained and decidedly unpolitical. … Tonight, many are saying the Vice President may have helped put out the political firestorm." GOP strategist Ed Rollins: "I think no one could have watched that interview, and would have seen the pain and anguish he has about shot accidentally -- a tragic accident. Shooting a friend. He has all the remorse anyone would expect."

The Financial Times (2/16, Daniel) disagrees, saying "Cheney's appearance on Fox News may be too late to limit the fallout. The accident, and his unapologetic stance, have become satirical fodder for late-night comedians. A man who prided himself on his hunting skills, he is now a footnote in the Texas hunting annals."

On ABC World News Tonight (2/15, story 2, 1:05, Vargas), correspondent George Stephanopoulos said, "The Vice President, if he had given this interview a couple days ago, would have prevented this story from exploding. He hit the right notes." Stephanopoulos added that as "long as his story is not contradicted by Mr. Whittington or the sheriff's report, and as long as Mr. Whittington doesn't take a turn for the worse, I think he's stopped the political damage."

On NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 2, 1:55, Williams), NBC Washington bureau chief Tim Russert said, "It depends on the health of Harry Whittington. If in fact he recovers fully and returns home, that will be very good news for everyone and probably will help end this story relatively quickly. If however, his health, God forbid, deteriorates, it will be ongoing." Democrats "have seized on this. They say it's a metaphor for the secrecy of the Bush White House, for the misjudgments made in Iraq and Katrina. Republicans have seized on it, saying it's a feeding frenzy by the White House Press Corps and it's time to move on."

The Washington Post (2/16, A1, Baker, 744K) reports, "White House aides and allies expressed hope that Cheney's public comments would defuse the uproar," but "Democrats continued to pound away. Even before the interview, the office of Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) issued a statement accusing Cheney of being 'unable, or unwilling, to level with the American people.' Sen. Frank Lautenberg (N.J.) added: 'Vice President Cheney had a chance to shoot straight with the American people, but he decided to stonewall and delay. Now that he feels forced to talk, he wants to restrict the discussion to a friendly news outlet, guaranteeing no hard questions from the press corps.'"

Under the headline "Accepting Responsibility, With An Asterisk," the Washington Post (2/16, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports, "President Bush in 2000 ushered in the Era of Personal Responsibility. Yesterday ushered in the Era of Qualified Personal Responsibility." Cheney "offered a stark claim of responsibility," but he also "admitted no fault in creating the four-day firestorm."

Other stories this morning focus on the "feeding frenzy" surrounding the incident. The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Feldmann, 61K) reports, "Right or wrong, the White House press corps has behaved like a dog with a bone over the story of Vice President Cheney's hunting accident." The Washington Times (2/16, Harper, 90K), meanwhile, runs a story titled "Critics Hit Cheney 'Feeding Frenzy,'" in which it says "Greg Mitchell of Editor & Publisher, a media journal, questioned the reporting. 'There was poor reporting early on. Too many journalists did not question those initial reports that the victim was OK. They did not treat it as a shooting. The joking started. Reporters were clowning on news shows, and it spread from reporters to senators.'"

Finally, the Wall Street Journal (2/16, Kronholz, 2.11M) analyzes the etiquette of quail hunting, "a genteel sport, where shooters with expensive guns and well-trained dogs hunt a skittish bird that is about the size of a fist and has the speed of a Little League pitch."

The Washington Post (2/16, A10, Romano, Balz, 744K) also reports on Whittington's past political activities, calling him "a well-known fixture on the Texas political landscape for half a century, a distinguished lawyer to whom governors have turned to help clean up messes, a Republican statesman before there was much of a Republican Party in the state." He and Cheney "were little more than acquaintances before last weekend, when the vice president accidentally sprayed him with birdshot, landing the 78-year-old in an intensive care unit in Corpus Christi. But friends say that Whittington is exactly the kind of man a host would include in a hunting party with the vice president of the United States." USA Today (2/16, Kiely, 2.31M) runs a story about local reaction to the shooting, titled "Incident No Big Deal In Tiny Texas County."

Cheney Reportedly In "State Of Meltdown" Over Accident. The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 3, 2:10, Borger) reported, "One source who is very close to the Vice President told CBS News today that Dick Cheney has been in what he calls a state of meltdown over this hunting accident. And another top White House aide also told CBS 'you can't imagine how upset the Vice President is.' In fact, he said, the Vice President is so upset, that the Whittington family is worrying about Dick Cheney."

McClellan Answer Said To Signal Tensions Within White House. The New York Times (2/16, Sanger, Kornblut, 1.19M) also says the interview "did not obscure the tensions that have riven the administration since the accident on Saturday, and in a sign of disagreement at the very top, the White House signaled that…Bush wished that Mr. Cheney had made the news public more quickly." The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Hitt, McKinnon, 2.11M) runs a similar report under the headline "Cheney Takes Blame For Shooting But Defends How It Was Disclosed," in which it reports, "Asked if the president was satisfied with Mr. Cheney's handling of the situation…McClellan yesterday repeated his statement from earlier in the week that 'you can always look back at these issues and work to do better in the future.' Asked if that was Mr. Bush's view, Mr. McClellan said he was 'speaking on behalf of the White House and the president.'" The Washington Post (2/16, A1, Baker, 744K) calls that McClellan comment "a sign of the extraordinary tension inside the White House -- evidently even between Bush and Cheney."

Bush's Handling Of Hunting Accident Contrasted With Cheney's. ABC World News Tonight (2/15, story 3, :30, Sawyer) reported, "I'm thinking of our conversation in the newsroom today, about President Bush and his one own hunting mishap." ABC (Vargas) added, "That's right. He wrote about it in his autobiography. In 1994, he shot a rare bird on a hunting trip of his own. He says he didn't know what to do. But then, decided to tell every single reporter who was accompanying him on that hunting trip. So, at least in that respect, you saw a very different way, a different version of how to handle this kind of crisis." Sawyer: "Different incident. But sharp contrast in the way it was handled."

Aftermath Of Hunting Accident Compared To Katrina Response. The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Brownstein, Wallsten, 958K) reports, "Throughout his presidency, George W. Bush has been admired for his ability to set clear goals and doggedly follow a path to achieve them." But "Bush and his White House often seem to struggle when pressed to react to unexpected events, a difficulty highlighted Wednesday by the continuing furor over…Cheney's hunting accident and a congressional committee's sharply critical report about the federal response to Hurricane Katrina." The Times adds, "One GOP fundraiser close to the White House said he thought the administration's response to the news that Cheney had mistakenly shot a fellow hunter Saturday so closely replicated the Katrina experience that he wondered, 'Is this a bad dream we are seeing again?'"

Whittington Remains In Intensive Care. CNN's The Situation Room (2/15, Lavendera) reported, "We understand that Harry Whittington is still being kept in the intensive care unit of this hospital in Corpus Christi, but that really has very little to do with his condition. They say that he's actually doing quite well and he is being kept in the ICU mostly for privacy reasons, because of this high-profile status that has kind of enveloped his situation here. Doctors have been releasing over the last couple of days a little bit of information about his condition saying that he is stable, alert, eating regular food. In fact, at one point, they say that he was planning on doing some of his law work. And that is carefully orchestrated and discussed with the family. Even though

Harry Whittington hasn't made any public comments or released any statements since he has been here at the hospital, they are releasing -- and through the wishes of the family, some of the updates to let people know that he is doing OK. By all means, they don't have to do that. They could have put the clamp down on any kind of information about his condition."

Cheney Could Face Charges. The AP (2/16, Curry) reports, "If the man wounded by…Cheney dies, the vice president could -- in theory at least -- face criminal charges, even though the shooting was an accident." Dallas defense attorney David Finn, "who has been a state and a federal prosecutor, said Wednesday that a Texas grand jury could bring a charge of criminally negligent homicide if there is evidence the vice president knew or should have known 'there was a substantial or unjustifiable risk that his actions would result in him shooting a fellow hunter.'" The AP adds, "To indict Cheney, the grand jury would have to conclude that a reasonable person in the vice president's place would say to himself, 'I am not pulling the trigger because this other guy might be in front of me,' Finn said."

Shays Says Administration Is Overly Secretive. Rep. Chris Shays said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/15) that the Whittington shooting is a "good example" of the Administration being overly secretive, adding, "It's like they don't learn. I mean, obviously this information's going to come out. So just let it come out. It had to have been one of the worst days of his life. It had to have been terrible for him and obviously the individual he shot and everybody who was there. But the information needs to be made public and be made public quickly."

Cheney's Choice Of Fox News Venue Criticized. Media analysts tended to be critical of Cheney's choice of Fox News for his interview. The New York Times (2/16, Stanley, 1.19M) reports, "Most V.I.P.'s in trouble choose the safe waters of Larry King on CNN to do damage control. Mr. Cheney chose what this administration views as the even more secure location of a Fox News interview."

Under the headline "Shoot a Pal, Complain About the Press," Paul Brownfield writes in the Los Angeles Times (2/16, 958K), "If you accidentally shoot a hunting buddy in the face, make it about the media. That was the message Vice President Dick Cheney got out Wednesday, courtesy of Fox News Channel and its most sober and decorated journalist, Brit Hume, who was summoned by Cheney for an exclusive interview and then left to play Cheney's press secretary, getting the veep's talking points out the rest of the day on Fox."

In his "Media Mix" column, Peter Johnson writes in USA Today (2/16, 2.31M), "Cheney's choice of Fox News Channel…had media types talking Wednesday, particularly among some competitors who view Fox News as sympathetic to the Bush White House. 'They're the house organ for the Republican Party,' said CNN political analyst Paul Begala, a former Clinton aide. 'It's like Khrushchev giving an interview to Pravda.'"

The Washington Post (2/16, C1, Kurtz, 744K) reports Mary Matalin, "a former Cheney aide and informal adviser who accompanied him to the interview in the vice president's ceremonial office, said the vice president likes Hume but that 'our objective was to get the whole story out in a consecutive way. He wanted a long form. We had no desire for anything other than comprehensive and hard questions.'" Matalin "said Cheney considered holding a news conference, but that 'would have meant a lot of grandstanding' by reporters." Fox News "is widely viewed as more sympathetic to the Bush administration than the other networks."

O'Reilly Says Press Despises Cheney. Bill O'Reilly said on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (2/15), "The press is making a big deal out of this because they despise Dick Cheney. Generally speaking the media feels that Cheney is arrogant and distant. But this hatred has gone too far. … Like Cheney or not, once it degenerates into hatred, there's no value. This incident is the best illustration I've seen in years of a media out of control."

More Commentary. Peggy Noonan writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.11M), "Right now in the White House they're discussing how to help the vice president get through his problem. They've already tried the wearing of orange ties, an attempt to take the sting out of the incident by showing they don't feel the sting. Duck! Ha ha! But what are they thinking that they're not saying? Here's a hunch, based not on any inside knowledge but only on what I know of people who practice politics, and those who practice it within the Bush White House. I suspect what they're thinking and not saying is, If Dick Cheney weren't vice president, who'd be a good vice president? They're thinking, At some time down the road we may wind up thinking about a new plan. And one night over drinks at a barbecue in McLean one top guy will turn to another top guy and say, 'Under the never permeable and never porous Dome of Silence, tell me...wouldn't you like to replace Cheney?'" Noonan adds, "It would have to be a man wildly popular in the party and the press. And it would have to be a decision made by Dick Cheney. If he didn't want to do it he wouldn't have to. If he were pressed -- Dick, we gotta put the next guy in here or we're going to lose in '08 and see all our efforts undone -- he might make the decision himself. He'd have to step down on his own. He's just been through a trauma, and he can't be liking his job as much now as he did three years ago. No one on the downside of a second term does, hate magnet or not."

Under the headline "Mr. Vice President, It's Time To Go," Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (2/16, 1.19M), "It's time for Dick Cheney to step down -- for the sake of the country and for the sake of the Bush administration. Mr. Cheney's bumbling conduct at the upscale Armstrong Ranch in South Texas seemed hilarious at first. But when we learned that Harry Whittington had suffered a mild heart attack after being shot by the vice president in a hunting accident, it became clear that a more sober assessment of the fiasco at the ranch and, inevitably, Mr. Cheney's controversial and even bizarre behavior as vice president was in order." Cheney "would do his nation and his president a service by packing his bags and heading back to Wyoming. He's become a joke. But not a funny one."

Mary Zeiss Stange, who teaches at Skidmore College and is a member of USA Today's board of contributors, writes in USA Today (2/16, 2.31M), "Cheney's errant shooting is a fitting metaphor for a gang that, all too apparently, can't shoot straight."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (2/16, 958K) says the way in which the Cheney shooting story was made public is a "serious reminder that when it comes to the executive branch's doings, Cheney is the bottleneck." The Times takes note of "two other secrecy-related stories…making headlines" on Wednesday. First, Australian public television "aired grotesque new images of prisoner abuse at Abu Ghraib." Second, the House Committee on Government Reform has been listening this week to "witness after witness describe how they suffered workplace retaliation after blowing the whistle on national security activities they thought were unethical or illegal." The Times adds, "We wouldn't know about the NSA program or even Abu Ghraib if Cheney had his way," and we'll be "living with the consequences of Cheney's tight lips long after this week's brouhaha fades."

David Brooks writes in the New York Times (2/16, 1.19M), "In normal life, people would look at this event and see two decent men caught in a twist of fate. They would feel concern for the victim and sympathy for the man who fired the gun. But we in Washington are able to rise above the normal human reaction. We have our jobs. We have our roles. So in the days following the Cheney-Whittington accident, liberal pundits had to live up to their responsibility to manufacture a series of unsubstantiated allegations while turning the episode into a Clifford Odets-style tale of plutocrats gone wild. 'Was he drunk? I mean, these are ultrarich Republicans, at a weekend, fun-time hunting,' the pundit Lawrence O'Donnell wondered on MSNBC. … Finally there is the Office of the Vice President, inevitably failing to surpass expectations. The vice president's role, on this as on all days, is to treat the press and the Washington community in general as a plague-ridden horde, from whom it is possible, upon the merest conversation or contact, to catch some soul-destroying disease. So, of course, the vice president was compelled to recreate his role as Voldemort, Keeper of the Secrets."

Jacob Weisberg, editor of Slate.com, writes in the Financial Times (2/16), "The Bush administration's aversion to openness reached the proportions of parody. … One could recount dozens of examples in which Mr Bush and Mr Cheney have spurned legitimate requests for information from all kinds of groups. In sum, these episodes represent more than the familiar tug and pull of the branches of government, mere hostility to the press, or the challenges to freedom in wartime. They are the arrogant expression of a deaf, imperial presidency that hears the phrase 'the public's right to know' as the public's right to 'No.'"

Cheney Says Vice Presidents Have Authority To Declassify Information. Vice President Dick Cheney was asked on Fox News' Special Report (2/15) about court filings that indicate that Lewis Libby was authorized by unidentified "superiors" authorized the release of some classified information. Cheney said, "It's nothing I can talk about. This is an issue that's been under investigation for a couple of years. I've cooperated fully, including being interviewed, as well, by a special prosecutor. All of it is now going to trial. Scooter is entitled to the presumption of innocence. He's a great guy. I've worked with him for a long time, have enormous regard for him. I may well be called as a witness at some point in the case and it's, therefore, inappropriate for me to comment on any facet of the case." Asked if a vice president has the authority to declassify information, Cheney said, "There is an executive order to that effect,' adding, "There is an executive order that specifies who has classification authority, and obviously focuses first and foremost on the President, but also includes the vice president."

The New York Times (2/16, 1.19M) reports that Cheney "said he had participated in decisions to declassify information, but he declined to say whether he had ever declassified information on his own. Mr. Cheney said he could not comment on the case of his former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby Jr., who was indicted on five counts of perjury and obstruction of justice in October after an investigation into the disclosure of the identity of an officer of the Central Intelligence Agency, Valerie Wilson. Mr. Cheney said he might be called as a witness."

The Washington Post (2/16, A10, 744K) reports, Libby told a grand jury that his 'superiors' authorized him to disclose in July 2003 the contents of a National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq, according to newly released court documents. Sources familiar with the matter have told The Washington Post that Cheney was one of those superiors, but it was unclear whether Libby meant classified or unclassified information."

DOJ Seeks Senate Panel Documents On Miranda Leak. The Hill (2/16, Bolton) reports Justice Department officials are "negotiating with the Senate's legal counsel over access to Judiciary Committee documents on the committee's investigation of a memo scandal that roiled the upper chamber two years ago, according to a source familiar with the situation." The Senate legal counsel is "in turn consulting with committee staff about the sensitivity of the documents to determine what can be turned over to the executive branch, decisions that could have an impact on how much access future administrations have over legislative documents." Lawmakers "will make the final decision about what is shared." The investigation "stems from the controversial publication in the fall of 2003 of internal Democratic memoranda that two former Republican committee aides admit to accessing on a computer server shared by Republican and Democratic members of the Judiciary Committee." The "uproar over the memos' publication resulted in the resignation of Manuel Miranda, then the top aide handling judicial nominations for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). Miranda admitted to accessing the documents. A junior Judiciary Committee aide who admitted to downloading and reading the Democratic files also resigned."

Supreme Court Said To Be In Transition. The New York Times (2/16, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports, "With the addition of two new justices in the last four months, the" Supreme Cour "is in the midst of a major transition." Justice Stephen G. Breyer, when he joined, "felt adequately prepared and had expected to move comfortably into his new role, he said, and was therefore surprised at how overwhelming he found it." Breyer spoke "only for himself, offering neither advice to nor commentary on Justice Alito or his other new colleague, Chief Justice Roberts. But coming from one who ordinarily projects an air of cheerful self-assurance, his comments were a reminder that the Supreme Court is a different world, even for those who may have spent a lifetime preparing for it."

Alito Chooses Time Warner Lawyer As Clerk. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Lattman, 2.11M) reports, "Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., whose ceremonial swearing-in as the 110th justice of the Supreme Court will be held today, has named as one of his law clerks a Time Warner Inc. lawyer who served as a top legal adviser to Attorney General John Ashcroft from 2001 to 2003." His appointment "is unusual because of Mr. Ciongoli's age and level of experience," as "most Supreme Court clerks…are recent law-school graduates with clerkship experience at the federal appeals courts."

The AP (2/16, Holland) reports, "Helping promote Samuel Alito's nomination to the Supreme Court has paid off for three conservative lawyers, including a one-time confidant of former Attorney General John Ashcroft. … The three have prize assignments as Alito's law clerks and the opportunity to help shape his early days on the court. They also have resumes that could add some firepower to the junior justice's chambers." The AP continues, "Alito, 55, has surrounded himself with solid conservatives and loyalists - all three clerked for him when he was an appeals court judge, dating back a decade. … Two of the new clerks, Jay Jorgensen and Hannah Smith, are previous Supreme Court clerks who traveled across the country as part of a public relations campaign on Alito's behalf last month. … The third, former Justice Department lawyer Adam Ciongoli, participated in so-called 'murder boards,'' mock sessions that got Alito ready for his Senate confirmation hearings." The AP adds, "Earlier, Jorgensen was among the conservatives who raised questions about the credentials of Bush's early court nominee, Harriet Miers. When Miers withdrew in the face of conservative criticism, Bush turned to Alito. Jorgensen also prepared a paper for the Federalist Society on the nomination of Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, a liberal member of the court. … 'I think what's notable is that he's picked individuals who are so defined on the right ideologically. That tells us who Samuel Alito is,'' said Erwin Chemerinsky, a liberal Duke University law professor.'

Bush Promotes Health Savings Accounts In Visit To Ohio. President Bush yesterday traveled to Dublin, Ohio, to promote his proposal for health savings accounts and amplify the consumer choice oriented healthcare message he delivered in his State of the Union address. Democratic critics reiterated that while the proposals would benefit younger and healthy workers, traditional insurance plans would be burdened by older, sicker workers. Bush also promoted the political fortunes of several Ohio incumbents, although Sen. Mike DeWine skipped the event.

The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Gerstenzang, 958K) reports President Bush talked "about good health, and his plan to help America pay for it, at the home office of the nation's third-largest purveyor of hamburgers and French fries." Bush "urged Americans concerned about healthcare costs to consider a fledgling government program built around high-deductible insurance for catastrophic illness or accidents and tax-free personal savings accounts to pay for routine medical needs." Health savings accounts, "or HSAs, offer participants choices in healthcare while holding down costs because the payments will come from a patient's savings account, Bush said." The Times adds the plan's "critics have argued that the program would attract the healthiest Americans, who would be able to put aside savings tax-free and spend little for healthcare, while traditional employer-provided plans would be filled with people whose health costs are the highest." Bush's "one-hour speech is part of a weeklong administration effort to draw public attention to its healthcare proposals." But the President's "message drew sharp criticism, and the location of the speech was too delicious for some critics to resist."

The Washington Post (2/16, A5, VandeHei, 744K) reports that as "part of a new White House campaign to promote incremental changes to the health care system this year, Bush is calling for new tax incentives to help millions of Americans purchase health care coverage for catastrophic illness and pay for out-of-pocket medical costs." In his "fiscal 2007 budget, the president proposed a mix of tax credits and deductions to increase the number of employers and employees using health savings accounts to both mitigate health care costs and begin transforming the traditional insurance system. Much as he did last year in a failed campaign to restructure the Social Security system, Bush is selling the accounts as a way to provide consumers more control over their money and to transition away from what he calls a costly and unsustainable program." About 3 million Americans "have opened HSAs, including 9,000 of the 40,000 employees at Wendy's, a fast-food chain that has been a big supporter of Republicans. Bush picked Wendy's because the company started offering the tax-free savings accounts in 2005 and has reduced its health care spending as a result."

The Columbus Dispatch (2/16) reports President Bush "said Wendy's was facing double-digit increase in health insurance costs when it decided to implement the health savings accounts. The company pays for a health insurance plan with a high deductible and also contributes to the health savings account that employees can use to pay any health costs. Bush said 9,000 full-time employees of Wendy's have the accounts, and 90 percent of them ended last year with a balance that is earning interest." Wendy's spokesman Denny Lynch said HSAs "allowed Wendy's to offer the same level of benefits for a slight rise in costs to the company, rather than the steep increase expected if the company had remained in a traditional health plan." About "100 of the 700 Wendy's headquarters employees were able to see the president's speech in person, with others viewing it by simulcast, Lynch said."

The AP (2/16, Riechmann) reports President Bush "mixed politics with his prescription for what ails the nation's health care system on a trip Wednesday to Ohio, which was a pivotal state in his re-election and one with key races in this year's midterm elections." The President "made his case for health savings accounts at Wendy's International Inc., where 9,000 employees have signed up for the accounts since the hamburger giant began offering them last year." But the Ohio trip "had a political component too. The Ohio governor's race and about a half-dozen House and Senate seats from the state are competitive in this year's election, and whether voters stick with Republican incumbents could foreshadow voter sentiment in 2008." Republican incumbents "running for re-election are trying to avoid fallout from an election-year scandal in the state, which helped put Bush over the top in 2004." Bush was "joined at the event by Taft, George V. Voinovich, R-Ohio, and Reps. Pat Tiberi, David Hobson and Deborah Pryce. Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, who is in a toss-up race against Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown, was invited but remained in Washington for a Judiciary Committee hearing."

Reuters (2/16, Bohan) reports Democrats "accused" the President "of offering recycled ideas that would worsen the health system." Bush "pointed to Wendy's as an example of a company that offered HSA plans to employees. But Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said, 'The president's most recent recycled health care idea will make the health care crisis worse.'" In an initiative "the White House estimates will cost $59 billion over five years, Bush would expand the tax breaks offered to those with HSAs and raise limits on contributions."

The New York Times (2/16, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports President Bush declared "his proposals were not just for the wealthy and would help some of the 45 million Americans who remain uninsured. In an hourlong speech in one of the most politically troublesome states for Republicans in this year's midterm elections, Mr. Bush took on critics of his plan, who say that poor or underemployed people cannot afford the accounts." Bush's plan "seeks to make the accounts more attractive by expanding their tax incentives and by increasing the amount of money that people may contribute to them each year." Democrats "criticized Mr. Bush's plan as a windfall for the rich and said that a fast-food cook making $15,000 a year could not afford to set aside $5,000 in a health savings account or pay $1,050 in medical bills."

The Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.11M) reports Bush "outlined his plan to confront rising healthcare costs by giving consumers more choice." He "pointed to laser-eye surgery as an example of how market forces can have a positive impact on the price and availability of medical procedures, when third-party payers aren't involved." Bush "touched on the problems encountered in the early stages of the new Medicare prescription drug program, but urged seniors to sign up for the plan, which he said will cut their costs."

Ohio Will Be Battleground In Struggle For House Control. Roll Call (2/16, Habte) reports that Ohio is expected to be a battleground in the struggle for control of the House in 2006. Roll Call adds, "With today's candidate filing deadline looming, the stakes are higher for the GOP which is battling to protect three Republican incumbents who Democrats boast are especially vulnerable: Reps. Bob Ney, Deborah Pryce and Steve Chabot. Many Democrats running in Ohio, and many of their surrogates in Washington, D.C., have honed an overarching campaign message that identifies the Ohio GOP with a 'culture of corruption.' … Not that the Democrats don't have their work cut out for them. The race in the 6th district, where Rep. Ted Strickland (D) is running for governor, is considered a tossup at this point. And in the heavily Democratic 13th district, which Rep. Sherrod Brown (D) is leaving to run for Senate, Republicans recruited their preferred candidate, Lorain Mayor Craig Foltin (R), into the race this week."

Bush Job Approval Rating Slips In Harris Interactive Poll. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.11M) reports that a recent Harris Interactive poll has found that President Bush's job approval ratings have slipped since January 2006 while Congress' ratings have remained about the same. The Journal adds, "Any benefit President Bush may have gained from his State of the Union speech didn't last long enough to be measured in the latest poll, as Mr. Bush's ratings are now 40% positive, down from a positive rating of 43% in January, and 58% negative, up from 56% negative. Elsewhere, approval of the way Congress is handling its job is mostly unchanged, with 25% of U.S. adults giving Congress a positive rating and 71% giving it a negative rating."

Gutierrez Says US Needs To Embrace Scientists. The San Jose Mercury News (2/16, Poletti, 268K) reports, "The Bush Administration wants to make math and science cool. Carlos Gutierrez, U.S. Commerce Secretary, visiting Silicon Valley and Stanford University on Wednesday, said that along with President Bush's recently announced American Competitiveness Initiative, there needs to be a change in American culture -- to embrace inventors and scientists, in the same way Americans worship athletes or pop stars." In an interview Gutierrez said, "We need to make those people just as cool as the athletes and we need to make that achievement something a student would strive for. … It is part cultural, it is part math and science, it's part what happens in the classroom. But it's also what we value as a society." Gutierrez told a group of Stanford University business students "that they are in the right place at the right time in American business, and they should 'let others do the hand-wringing' over whether the nation is losing its competitive edge to emerging countries such as India and China." Yet, "even after rattling off several statistics about strong U.S. economic growth in his lunch-hour speech, the first question posed by a student was about the 'big fear' that the United States is losing its creative edge to China and India." Gutierrez replied, "Let me repeat my speech. … We are dealing with it today, we are dealing with it successfully. We just need to stay focused."

More Claims Surfacing Of White House Interference With NASA. The New York Times (2/16, Revkin, 1.19M) reports, "Top political appointees in the NASA press office exerted strong pressure during the 2004 presidential campaign to cut the flow of news releases on glaciers, climate, pollution and other earth sciences, public affairs officers at the agency say." The Times adds, "Press officers, who were granted anonymity because they said they were still concerned for their jobs despite Dr. Griffin's call for openness, said much of the pressure in late 2004 was placed on Gretchen Cook-Anderson." She managed "the flow of earth science news at NASA headquarters." The story says she told colleagues "that Glenn Mahone, then the assistant administrator for public affairs, had told her that a planned news conference on fresh readings by a new NASA satellite, Aura, that measures ozone and air pollution, should not take place until after the election. In an e-mail message yesterday, Ms. Cook-Anderson… said, 'While I can't discuss these matters, I won't disagree with that description of what took place.'" The Times says Mahone did not return calls seeking comment and that "Dean Acosta, a political appointee who was then Mr. Mahone's deputy and is now Dr. Griffin's press secretary, said he had never pressed Ms. Cook-Anderson to cut back on news releases. … But archives of news releases on the NASA headquarters Web site show a sharp change in the number of such releases, to 12 in 2005 from about four dozen in 2004." The Times cites other complaints such as a "standing unwritten order from political appointees" to not use the term "global warming," but "climate change." The story closes, "David R. Mould, NASA's assistant administrator for public affairs and a political appointee, said none of the appointees had brought a political agenda to the agency. 'We've received no marching orders from anyone,' Mr. Mould said."

Griffin Likely To Face Questions On Subject In Today's Hearing. In his space news blog "The Write Stuff" (2/15) Orlando Sentinel space editor Michael Cabbage writes, "NASA chief Michael Griffin's scheduled appearance before the House Science Committee on Thursday will be lawmakers' first chance to grill him since the administration's 2007 budget request was made public. It also will be the first hearing since revelations about a hyper-partisan public affairs officer and a potential scandal involving the NASA inspector general. There are bound to be plenty of tough questions about cuts to NASA programs and whether some of the agency's political appointees have spun out of control. Put Griffin's blunt, straightforward style in front of lawmakers looking to score political points in an election year and this could get really interesting. The hearing begins at 10 a.m. EST and can be watched on the web."

NOAA Statement Acknowledges Dissent. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Regalado, 2.11M) reports, "Amid a growing outcry from climate researchers in its own ranks, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration backed away from a statement it released after last year's powerful hurricane season that discounted any link to global warming. A corrected statement, which says some NOAA researchers disagree with that view, was posted to NOAA's Web site yesterday. The change is part of a high-stakes fight over the issue of global warming, and what some scientists complain is a widening gap between what their research shows and White House climate policy." Scientists have been complaining about interference since December, the Journal says. "They gained force last week when James Hansen, a climate researcher at NASA Goddard Institute for Space Studies, again accused NOAA of censoring scientific communication. Dr. Hansen has said NASA public-affairs officials had tried to discourage him from presenting his views that human activities could lead to severe global warming."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Chaddock, 61K) reports, "Dissent often carries a price in official Washington, especially in the war years of the Bush presidency. Since the Sept. 11 attacks, the number of insiders alleging wrongdoing in government - either through whistle-blower channels or directly to the press - has surged, as have reprisals against them." The Monitor cites cases in the CIA and NSA and adds, "Outside the realm of national security, James Hansen, the top climate scientist at NASA, spoke out about efforts by the NASA press office to screen his speeches and limit his contact with the press. In response, Rep. Sherwood Boehlert (R) of New York, chairman of the House Science Committee, backed Dr. Hansen" and NASA's Michael Griffin "e-mailed all NASA employees, affirming that staff should not alter, filter, or adjust scientific work. But Hansen says the issue is not yet resolved, citing a pending investigation by the House Energy and Commerce Committee challenging the scholarship of other scientists working on global warming."

In a column about general White House communication strategy on the Seattle Post-Intelligencer (2/16) Marianne Means writes, "Recently a prestigious climate scientist complained that a young Republican hack at NASA had been muzzling him to prevent him from warning of global warming, a concept the administration refuses to confront."

Specter Earmarked $50 Million In Defense Funds To Firm Represented By Aide's Spouse. USA Today (2/16, Kelley, 2.31M) reports Sen. Arlen Specter "helped direct almost $50 million in Pentagon spending during the past four years to clients of the husband of one of his top aides, records show." Specter used "'earmarking' 13 times to set aside $48.7 million for six clients represented by lobbyist Michael Herson and the firm he co-founded, American Defense International. The clients paid Herson's firm nearly $1.5 million in fees since 2002, federal lobbying records show." Herson's wife, Vicki Siegel Herson, "is Specter's legislative assistant for appropriations. She deals with Specter's work on the Senate Appropriations Committee and its defense subcommittee, where all the earmarks originated. Siegel, who uses her maiden name at work, is a former lobbyist for defense contractors who has worked for Specter since 1999."

USA Today (2/16, 2.31M) listed the projects earmarked by Sen. Specter, which included "$20.9 million in the 2005 and 2006 budgets for projects at Drexel University in Philadelphia dealing with bioterrorism response and computer networking. Drexel has paid ADI $200,000 a year since 2002."

Earmark Reform Could Undercut Bipartisanship. The Hill (2/16, Cusack) reports the "building momentum for earmark reform could force lawmakers to cut back significantly on their beloved pork projects, and in the process reduce something that is in short supply on Capitol Hill: bipartisanship." Securing "federal money for local projects regularly unites conservatives and liberals from the same or neighboring states, but future funding for earmarks will probably be dramatically cut now that the anti-pork movement, led by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), has gained traction." Unlike "taxes, healthcare and ethics issues, Republicans and Democrats are careful not to criticize each other on earmark funding." Most lawmakers "put aside their philosophical differences and join forces with their political adversaries because most of what they do is aimed at winning the next election: fundraising, gerrymandering their districts and crowing about the local projects they fought for in Washington."

Hastert Wants Reform Proposal By March. CQ (2/15, Ferrechio) reports Speaker Hastert "wants to get the lobbying scandal behind House Republicans by the end of March — a deadline that would require him to resolve differences with new Majority Leader John A. Boehner over privately financed congressional travel." During a "closed-door GOP conference meeting Wednesday, Hastert told fellow House Republicans that they must reconcile their divergent views so that a bill can be taken up on the floor by the end of March." Hastert and House Rules Chairman Dreier "have proposed banning privately funded travel, tightening limits on gifts to members and staff and requiring additional disclosures about lobbyist-lawmaker interactions." But plans to "quickly introduce legislation hit a snag earlier this month, when rank-and-file members loudly voiced their opposition. Many called the tighter gift limits insulting and complained that a travel ban would eliminate useful trips with educational value."

Top GOP Leaders' Opposition Slows House Earmark Reform. The Washington Times (2/16, Dinan, 90K) reports the "push to end earmarks, which critics call pork-barrel spending, is bogged down in the House, thanks to a strong defense of the practice from top Republicans." House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis "said the Predator unmanned aerial vehicle, used for missile attacks on terrorist lairs, is a shining example of the best of earmarks. He said the Predator proved its success in Bosnia after he stuck an earmark into a spending bill in the mid-1990s, long before the war on terror." Other leaders "defend the practice by saying it's how they are judged at home." Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said, "The Buffalo News, which is my hometown newspaper, still believes I ought to bring home the bacon." The Times adds earmark "opponents have noticed the return fire." Rep. Jeff Flake said, "The empire is striking back." He said Mr. Lewis "tried to intimidate his bill's supporters by issuing a list of earmarks that each had requested."

Nonprofit Groups Oppose Proposals To Ban Private Congressional Trips. The Hill (2/16, Hearn) reports a "handful of nonprofit groups that sponsor travel for members of Congress are pushing back against recent proposals to ban privately funded trips, arguing that their activities are far different from the golfing and exotic foreign junkets that have been the centerpiece of recent lobbying scandals." Groups such as the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), the American Jewish Committee (AJC), the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism and the Council for Christian Colleges & Universities "have been quietly raising the issue with sympathetic members of Congress, hoping to convince lawmakers that their trips are valuable educational experiences and have not been abused by lawmakers or lobbyists." Meanwhile, Speaker Dennis Hastert and Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.), "whom Hastert tapped to marshal a reform package through the House, have received significant blowback from their own members since introducing a series of suggested reforms last month. A large section of the conference is opposed to a ban on privately funded travel that Hastert and Dreier proposed last month. The two leaders are hoping to work through the committees of jurisdiction to bring some reforms to the floor."

Lobbyists Frustrated By Failure Of Online Disclosure System. The Washington Post (2/16, A9, Birnbaum, 744K) reports, "Thousands of lobbyists, including the president of a lobbyists' trade association and the co-author of an authoritative lobbying manual, were unable to file their disclosure reports electronically this week as required by a new congressional system." Paul A. Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, and Thomas M. Susman, co-editor of the American Bar Association's "The Lobbying Manual," "tried to send their reports to the clerk of the House of Representatives via the Internet on Tuesday, the filing deadline. But, like many of their colleagues, they were frustrated to receive a return message that said 'Submission status: failed.'" Unable to "use the new filing method, they were forced to print out their reports and mail or fax them with a cover letter explaining that at least they had tried."

Lobbying Firms Report $36 Million Increase In Revenue In 2005. Roll Call (2/16, Newmyer) reports that despite "stormy times for the Washington, D.C., lobbying industry, the top firms in town are reporting steady growth for 2005." The top 25 firms 'collected $397.9 million in lobbying revenues — a $36 million jump from the fees reported by the 25 largest shops the previous year." That's an "8 percent climb from 2004 to 2005 — a solid recovery after a slow presidential election year, though still less than the 15 percent annual growth rates the sector chalked up in prior years." Officials at top-ranked firms "predicted that current rates of growth would continue, though they also sounded a note of caution for the coming year, citing a short legislative calendar and the looming prospect of new restrictions on the lobbying business."

The Washington Post (2/16, A25, Sarasohn, 744K) reports in its "Special Interests" column, "It is February 2006, but the results of the lobbying disclosures for the first six months of 2005 are just in at PoliticalMoneyLine, the online organization that tracks lobbying and campaign money: A record $1,164,586,968 was spent on lobbying Congress and the executive branch during the first six months. That amounts to '$194 million in spending per month, almost $6.5 million a day, or more than $540,000 an hour in a twelve-hour day."

Former Member Says Congress Should Crack Down On Crooked Lobbyists. In a Roll Call op-ed (2/16), former Rep. Bill Sarpalius says he has spent "the past 10 years as a paid lobbyist. My career has been built on garnering the support of elected officials on issues that were important to my constituents and that currently are important to my clients." Good lobbyists "do their homework and help Members of Congress understand the impact of legislation, the outcomes of which American citizens must live with every day." The "point is that not all lobbyists are bad or crooked, and they should not be blindly grouped with Jack Abramoff. What is bad is the method that some lobbyists, such as Abramoff, employed to influence Members of Congress." It is "unfortunate that individuals such as Abramoff, who apparently lacks any and all ethics, abused the system and his clients." Sarpalius adds, "Perhaps Congress should focus on those who abuse the system and who do not follow the reporting requirements."

NAS Creates Informal Embryonic Stem Cell Oversight Committee. The New York Times (2/16, Wade, 1.19M) reports, "To fill a void in federal supervision, the National Academy of Sciences is setting up a committee to provide informal oversight over research with human embryonic stem cells." The National Institutes of Health is "unable to specify what kinds of research are ethically acceptable" due to "the Bush administration's reservations about embryonic stem cell research," even though "contentious issues in biological research are usually handled by" it.

President's Bioethics Council Member Criticizes Bush Stance On Cloning. Michael Gazzaniga, director of the Center for Cognitive Neuroscience at Dartmouth and a member of the President's Council on Bioethics, writes in an op-ed in the New York Times (2/16, 1.19M), "I have not heard any outcry over" President Bush's "policy statement on cloning" from his State of the Union speech, and "I can only guess that this means the public doesn't care, or doesn't understand what Mr. Bush means." His "calling human cloning in all its forms an 'egregious abuse' is a serious mischaracterization," and using "the phrase 'in all of its forms'" is "a way of conflating very different things: reproductive cloning and biomedical cloning." Even "the president's own largely conservative Bioethics Council…made a big distinction between the two forms of cloning," but "the president rejected the advice of his own counselors and has kept his ban on federal financing of stem cell research for all but a handful of strains of existing lines." However, "This search for alternatives is costly not just in dollar terms but also in time not being spent on the best research possibilities. And it represents a perversion of the scientific process:… it is being used in the service of political goals."

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke Says Economy On Track For Continued Growth. ABC World News Tonight (2/15, story 8, :20, Vargas) reported, "The new Federal Reserve Chairman made his debut today on Capitol Hill. Ben Bernanke stuck closely to the script of his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, that the economy is on track for good growth this year. But there was one big difference, committee members said he was much easier to understand. Bernanke signaled that the Fed is ready to boost interest rates if needed to control inflation."

Reuters (2/16, Ahmann) reports Bernanke "said the US economy was running so near capacity that higher interest rates may be needed to quell the risk of inflation." The Fed chairman "appeared keen to establish credentials as an inflation 'hawk' in his first extensive comments since taking office two weeks ago by stressing the need to keep price pressures contained." The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Ip, 2.11M) also says :Bernanke demonstrated continuity with Alan Greenspan's interest-rate policies but broke with his predecessor's style.:

Knight Ridder (2/16, Hall) reports, "Unlike his predecessor Alan Greenspan, who was famous for convoluted public testimony, Bernanke was clear, concise and mercifully brief." He "erased any doubts that he, as a longtime academic, could handle the political hot seat. He answered tough questions with confidence, authority and an occasional gentle smile." The Financial Times (2/16, Balls) reports Bernanke "made an assured debut."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Trumbull, 61K) reports, "Often, a transition in leadership at the Federal Reserve is a rocky time for financial markets. Dips or dives for stock prices are not uncommon. For Ben Bernanke, it's so far so good." Bernanke "has sent signals that have done more to calm and encourage Wall Street than to rattle it."

The New York Times (2/16, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "He was calm and he was cool, and he most certainly was not Alan Greenspan." He "did three things on Wednesday that his predecessor usually did not: He gave short answers, generally free of twists and turns that could be interpreted in two or more ways. He simply refused to answer questions that would ensnare him in politically charged battles over tax cuts, spending cuts or the overhaul of Social Security. ¶He said nothing that rattled the financial markets."

USA Today (2/16, Kirchhoff, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) also emphasized Bernanke's "straightforward manner," while the Washington Post (2/16, Henderson, Irwin, 744K) runs a similar story under the headline "Bernanke Says Economy's Expansion Is On Track." The Washington Times (2/16, Hill, 90K) titled its report "Bernanke Optimistic On Economy."

Factory Output Rises Again In January. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Conkey, 2.11M) reports, "US factory output rose 0.7% in January from December levels, the fourth consecutive monthly increase and another sign of increasing economic momentum." The Federal Reserve "said overall industrial production last month fell 0.2% from the previous month, largely because of a 10.1% decline in utility output linked to unseasonably warm weather in many parts of the country."

Utility Output Declines. The New York Times (2/16, 1.19M) reports, "Industrial production unexpectedly fell last month as the warmest January in more than a century led to a record decline in utility use even as manufacturing strengthened, the Federal Reserve said yesterday. … Utilities generated less power as heating demand fell during the warmest January since records began in 1895. Utility production fell 10.1 percent, the biggest drop on record, the report said."

Foreign Investment Slows. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Walsh, 2.11M) reports, "Non-US investors made $56.6 billion in net purchases of U.S. securities during December, the smallest amount in seven months and a reminder of America's dependency on foreign capital to finance its trade deficit." While foreign investors "bought a strong $74.2 billion in US securities, Americans invested $17.6 billion in foreign securities, leaving a net capital inflow that was far less than Wall Street analysts expected."

Home Ownership Rate Appears To Be Leveling. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Simon, 2.11M) reports, "After climbing steadily for a decade, the nation's homeownership rate appears to have leveled off. New data released late last month by the U.S. Census Bureau put the homeownership rate at 69% in the fourth quarter of 2005, down from 69.2% a year earlier." While "the decline itself is too small to be considered statistically significant," it is "the third quarter in a row that the rate hasn't posted a year-over-year gain -- and it's the first time since 1994 that the rate at year-end hasn't increased from the previous year."

Meanwhile, says USA Today (2/16, Knox, 2.31M), "Home prices in the fourth quarter of 2005 posted double-digit increases in 72 metro areas -- a record number that likely marked a high point in this real estate cycle, the National Association of Realtors said Wednesday. Nationwide, the median sales price for an existing single-family house rose to $213,000 in the fourth quarter, up 13.6% from the October-December period of 2004. But David Lereah, the NAR's chief economist, cautioned that the market is rapidly cooling." The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Bater, Kerch, 2.11M) runs a similar story under the headline "Home-Price Growth Still Hot, But Pace Has Cooled Some."

Stocks Up. The New York Times (2/16, 1.19M) reports, "The Dow Jones industrial average gained 30.58 points, or 0.3 percent, to 11,058.97. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index climbed 4.47 points, or 0.4 percent, to 1,280. The Nasdaq composite index rose 14.26 points, or 0.6 percent, to 2,276.43." The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Patterson, 2.11M) also reports the stock numbers.

States Looking For Ways To Cut Medicaid Costs. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Solomon, 2.11M) reports that with Medicaid costs "now consuming about 17% of state general-fund budgets, and rising at more than twice the rate of inflation, state governments are scouring the health program for savings to protect their bottom lines. But changing a safety net for 52 million poor and disabled Americans involves delicate trade-offs -- and political risk." Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, a Republican who heads the National Governors Association, said, "A lot of governors are looking at what is being done out there, but looking with a cautious eye." The Journal adds some states, like Florida and Vermont, are "experimenting with limits on how the state will pay for Medicaid recipients' medical costs. Others, like Tennessee, have wound up cutting hundreds of thousands of individuals off Medicaid, prompting a backlash from residents and health-care advocates."

GOP Believes It Could Win Jefferson Seat If He Resigns. A front page story in the Washington Post (2/16, A1, Murray, Lengel, 744K) reports on Rep. William Jefferson, who federal investigators are targeting "for allegedly demanding cash and other favors for himself and relatives, in exchange for using his congressional clout to arrange African business deals. A former aide recently pleaded guilty to bribing Jefferson and is cooperating with authorities, and sources familiar with the case say a plea agreement with the lawmaker is being explored." The Post adds, "Jefferson's world is toppling. … Depending on Jefferson's fate, his central New Orleans district -- badly damaged by Hurricane Katrina and in need of effective representation in Washington -- could face a rowdy special election. The political scene is so chaotic that Republicans believe they could win the gerrymandered Democratic seat."

Kean Leads Polls In New Jersey Senate Race. Roll Call (2/16, Drucker) reports that New Jersey State Sen. Tom Kean Jr. 'is running against newly appointed Sen. Bob Menendez (D)." President Bush "lost New Jersey to Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) in the 2004 presidential race, but cut his defeat margin in half compared to the 16-point bath he took in 2000 against then-Vice President Al Gore. And, he raised his percentage of the vote from 40 percent to 46 percent. But Bush's job-approval numbers in the Garden State are down. A Strategic Vision poll conducted Feb. 3-5 showed that only 37 percent of likely voters approve of his job performance, with 57 percent disapproving. The survey had a 3 percent margin of error. The good news for Kean in this poll is that he led Menendez in a Senate matchup, 33 percent to 28 percent, even though 39 percent of respondents self-identified as Democrats, compared to only 28 percent who said they were Republicans. Thirty-nine percent of those surveyed were undecided, possibly leaving the answer to how this race turns out in the hands of undecided voters. A Zogby poll conducted Feb. 8-10 showed Menendez leading Kean 37 percent to 32 percent, with 30 percent undecided." Roll Call adds, "Menendez begins the race with a hefty financial edge, banking more than $4.2 million at the end of 2005, compared to $861,000 for Kean. … Running statewide in the Garden State is an expensive proposition because 76 percent of it is encompassed by the New York City media market, while 24 percent is covered by Philadelphia. New Jersey is a state light on retail politicking and heavy on mass media, so money will matter; it costs about $1 million per week to advertise effectively on television in the two markets."

Steele Called GOP's "Great Black Hope." Roll Call (2/16, Kurtz) calls Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, "the GOP's great black hope, the Republican with the best chance of winning a Senate election in Maryland since 1980." Roll Call adds, "It may be overly simplistic to say that Steele's strategy for victory is based solely on scrambling Maryland's normal political math — on picking off as many black voters as possible in a state where Democrats have routinely enjoyed 90 percent black support. But a recent day with Steele in the middle-class black enclave of Prince George's County shows just how potent a candidate he can be."

Steele Campaign Manager Resigns. The Washington Post (2/16, B4, Mosk, 744K) reports, "The man hired to run Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele's campaign for U.S. Senate has resigned, an internal move disclosed for the first time yesterday in the aftermath of an off-balance week for the Republican candidate. Campaign manager Graham M. Shafer made a quiet exit earlier this month, citing family obligations, a campaign spokesman confirmed yesterday. His departure highlighted a growing tug within the Steele campaign between the candidate's Washington advisers and his coterie of longtime loyalists from Maryland, of which Shafer was one." The Post adds, "One Washington figure who does know Maryland well, and who is taking a more hands-on role in the campaign, is national GOP Chairman Ken Mehlman, Steele confirmed during a brief interview at the State House yesterday. Mehlman is a native of Pikesville, a suburb north of Baltimore, and he ran President Bush's 2004 reelection campaign before becoming party chairman. He has made electing black Republicans a key goal nationally and has focused considerable personal attention on Steele."

Interest Group Director Criticizes Unions. Rick Berman, executive director of the Center for Union Facts, writes in an op-ed in the Washington Times (2/16, 90K), "Despite the anti-democratic tendencies, the hypocrisy, the corruption and the political machinations of their leaders, unions remain remarkably popular." They hire "temp workers" and "the homeless to picket" for them. "Needless to say, there's no health care or pension plan contributions for these folks." Also, "in 2005 alone, federal racketeering investigations resulted in 196 convictions against union officials and staff, as well as $187 million in fines." Organization now means "union representatives cajole, harass and intimidate workers to sign cards. As soon as half of them sign a card, all of them start paying the union to keep their jobs." Several "titans of American industry all went bankrupt, largely because union bosses were unwilling to back off from unsustainable labor contracts. American workers have been victimized one too many times by union executives. It's time for American workers to ask if they're getting their money's worth."

Venture Capitalists Investing In Education Entrepreneurs. The New York Times (2/16, Flanigan, 1.19M) reports, 'Venture capitalists of Silicon Valley, who have backed hundreds of high-technology entrepreneurs, are eagerly financing a new group these days: schoolmasters. 'We give education entrepreneurs money to start or to speed up building their companies,' said L. John Doerr, who over 26 years has helped start dozens of ventures, including Sun Microsystems, Amazon.com and Google. He help found the New Schools Venture Fund in San Francisco six years ago for a new breed of entrepreneur — the kind who doesn't have to produce a profit. … Recipients of the fund's investments are not whiz kids eager to become the next Bill Gates. Mainly, they are public school teachers with a passion to improve the ways poor children are taught. The companies they form are nonprofit charter school management organizations, capable of running publicly financed elementary and secondary schools that are freed from some rules and regulations in exchange for producing educational results better than those of the large urban school district. Almost all their students are eligible for free or reduced-price breakfasts and lunches."

Maine Subsidized Health Insurance Criticized. Tarren Bragdon, director of health reform initiatives at the Maine Heritage Policy Center, and Adam Brackemyre, assistant director of legislative affairs for the Council for Affordable Health Insurance, write in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.11M) that Maine Gov. John Baldacci's (D) Dirigo Health program, which "the governor claims has saved the state millions of dollars," will cause state taxes to "go...up." Dirigo "is levying a Savings Offset Payment, or SOP -- a remarkably innovative name for a new claims tax -- to 'recover' every dollar that the state says it has 'saved,'" as "without the SOP, Dirigo Health's high costs would bankrupt the program." However, "if Dirigo truly saved money, the program's benefits would exceed its costs." Now, the "legislature held a public hearing for a bill that would forbid insurers from passing along the cost of the SOP to policyholders," which "threatens the very financial viability of the private insurance market in Maine." Instead, "a better alternative for uninsured individuals in Maine is Health Savings Accounts."

Economist Calls For $2 Per Gallon Gasoline Tax. Economist Robert Frank writes in the New York Times (2/16, 1.19M) that a $2 per gallon gasoline tax "whose proceeds were refunded to American families in reduced payroll taxes" would "produce hundreds of billions of dollars in savings for American consumers, significant reductions in traffic congestion, major improvements in urban air quality, large reductions in greenhouse gas emissions, and substantially reduced dependence on Middle East oil." Frank adds, "Proposals of this sort have been advanced frequently in recent years by both liberal and conservative economists. Invariably, however, pundits are quick to dismiss these proposals as 'politically unthinkable.'" Frank adds, "The gasoline tax-cum-rebate proposal enjoys extremely broad support. Liberals favor it. Environmentalists favor it. The conservative Nobel laureate Gary S. Becker has endorsed it, as has the antitax crusader Grover Norquist. President Bush's former chief economist, N. Gregory Mankiw, has advanced it repeatedly. In the warmer weather they will have inherited from us a century from now, perspiring historians will struggle to explain why this proposal was once considered politically unthinkable."

WSJournal Lauds Suits Against "Wal-Mart" Laws. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.11M) editorializes, "America's retailers announced last week that they aren't especially keen to follow the steel, airline and perhaps the auto industries into bankruptcy court" with "two federal lawsuits filed by the Retail Industry Leaders Association against the state of Maryland and Suffolk County, New York. At issue are the "Wal-Mart" laws that both jurisdictions recently passed." This "unusual show of solidarity… suggests more companies are figuring out that organized labor's campaign against Wal-Mart is merely a warm-up to a broader assault" under the "union strategy…to force any competitive, non-unionized company to incur the same labor-induced costs as their own beleaguered employers." Still, "the good news is that the judiciary isn't likely to let such legal gerrymandering stand."

Bush Seeks $75 Million To Promote Democratic Reform In Iran. ABC World News Tonight (2/15, story 5, :45, Sawyer) briefly noted that after her testy hearing before the Senate Foreign Relations committee, "Secretary Rice announced a $75 million program to support democracy in Iran."

Fox News' Special Report (2/15, Rosen) reported, "Secretary Rice came to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee touting the Bush Administration's $100 million program to promote democracy in Iran and lamenting that country's claims to have restarted uranium enrichment." Fox (Rosen) added, "Rice and her aides all steered clear that the US is trying to pursue regime change in Iran. But she said the money will go toward supporting things like exchange programs, indigenous groups inside Iran that promote free thinking. $50 million of the money would subsidize around the clock Farsi language broadcasts inside of Iran."

Reuters (2/16, Hudson) reports, "Bush wants $75 million to try to spur democracy in its adversary Iran, expanding a program that skeptics say can have little effect in the Islamic republic." In congressional testimony Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "said the funds would be used to broadcast U.S. radio and television programs into Iran and help pay for Iranians to study in America, requested the money in a supplemental budget request for fiscal year 2006." $10 million has already been approved by Congress, but experts "are skeptical U.S. efforts to reach out to Iranians can work in a country where America is labeled the 'Great Satan' and believed to be anti-Muslim."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (2/16) reports, "The Bush administration will 'walk a fine line' in seeking punitive international sanctions against Iran's Islamic government over its disputed nuclear program, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Wednesday." Rice "detailed a two-track approach to Iran -- concerted international pressure to deter Tehran from building a bomb, and a newly robust attempt to seed democratic change inside the country with $75 million for broadcasts and aid to dissidents." Yet, "Rice ran into tough questions from lawmakers of both parties…underscoring congressional worries about administration policies throughout the Middle East."

The New York Times (2/16, Weisman, 1.19M) reports, "The scope of the administration's effort goes beyond the numbers. Until now, the United States has been cautious about supporting dissident groups, fearful that Iranians may view these efforts as an echo of past American meddling in Iran's affairs." The Times notes, "Until recently, the administration has been cautious about embracing the 'regime change' approach, but some conservatives at the Defense Department and Vice President Dick Cheney's office are known to be resigned to a nuclear-armed Iran and to argue that the best way to address that problem is by opening Iran to democracy and reform."

The Financial Times (2/16, Dinmore) said the Budget request was a signal the US was setting out "a tougher policy towards Iran." Rice "did not specifically use the words 'regime change'. But her testimony revealed a dual policy of isolating Iran on the international front, including sanctions and interdictions of prohibited shipments, while seeking to weaken the clerical regime from within." Experts "advising the Bush administration say the US has realised that significant opposition to Tehran is unlikely to be generated from exiles so it has sought ways to destabilise the Islamic regime from within." But it "risks damaging the diplomatic unity it has achieved at the United Nations in confronting Iran over its nuclear programme."

The Washington Times (2/16, Kralev, 90K) adds, "Rice said she might shift funds from other programs in the 2007 budget to boost the Iran democracy fund." Senior State Department officials "said Washington has been receiving more support from other countries on pushing democracy in Iran since President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad took office in August."

DOJ_NMG_0015520

The Washington Post (2/16, A1, Kessler, 744K) in a front page story says "Rice won bipartisan praise for her handling of negotiations on Iran's nuclear programs, but lawmakers from both parties raised objections to the overall thrust of the administration's Middle East policy."

Bloomberg (2/16, Zacharia) notes Rice "told the panel she plans to visit the Persian Gulf next week to talk about Iran. 'No one wants to see a Middle East that is dominated by an Iranian hegemony, particularly one that has acquired nuclear weapons technology,' she said."

US Threatens Iran With Sanctions. Reuters (2/16, Heinrich) reports, "Threatening new sanctions, the United States accused Iran on Wednesday of defying the world by resuming uranium enrichment for nuclear fuel without resolving suspicions it secretly wants to build atomic bombs." Meanwhile, "Russia urged Iran to change course to allow a compromise. It said Iran had to regain international trust before Moscow would back Tehran's declared right to enrich uranium on its own soil."

Meeting Between Iranian Minister, EU Panel Seen As Possible Return To Dialogue. The AP (2/16, Wielaard) reports, "Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki will meet Monday with the European Parliament's foreign affairs committee." The meeting was suggested by Iran "and showed a readiness in Tehran to 'return to a dialogue' with Europe," the panel's spokesman Thomas Bickel said.

Ahmadinejad Tours Nuclear Facility. The AP (2/16, Dareini) reports, "President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad visited the Natanz uranium enrichment plant Wednesday, a day after Tehran confirmed it had resumed small-scale enrichment there last week, the official news agency reported." His "visit to the plant in central Iran is widely seen as a gesture of support and a morale boost for scientists involved in Iran's uranium enrichment program."

Khamenei Also Has Role In Determining Iranian Nuclear Dispute. Time (2/16, MacLeod) in a web exclusive reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "does not determine Iran's foreign policy alone. It is ultimately in the hands of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, which reports to Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. And despite the Iranian president's defiant posture, the National Security Council has signaled its continuing interest in a negotiated settlement by announcing that an Iranian delegation will visit Moscow next week for talks on a proposed Russian compromise. But with Ahmadinejad turning the nuclear issue into a populist cause, it's far from certain that the more pragmatic heads will prevail."

Rice Defends Administration Middle East Policies. ABC World News Tonight (2/15, story 5, :45, Sawyer) reported Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "had a very rough day on Capitol Hill. Senators from both parties sharply criticized the Administration's policies on Iraq, then Iran, then the Palestinians. Republican Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, was especially blunt." Sen. Hagel: "I don't see, Madame Secretary, how things are getting better. I think things are getting worse. I think they're getting worse. I think they are getting worse in Iraq. I think they're getting worse in Iran." Secretary Rice: "I am optimistic that the United States is seeing Iraqis step up, take responsibility for seniority, take responsibility for controlling their territory."

CNN's The Situation Room (2/15, Blitzer) reported, "Rice took heat from Senators of both parties over the Administration's policies in Iraq, Iran and the Palestinian territories. It was Rice's first congressional testimony in months, and Senators accused the Administration of being too upbeat in its assessment of global hot spots."

Fox News' Special Report (2/15, Hume) reported that Rice got "an earful of criticism from both Democrats and Republicans." While Rice presented the Administration's plans for Iran, "many of Rice's questioners had a different focus. Democrats used the hearing to assail the Administration's conduct of the war in Iraq. … Two Democrats on the panel, Chris Dodd of Connecticut and John Kerry of Massachusetts, at times treated the hearing like a deposition or grand jury inquiry into the CIA leak case."

US Will Continue To Provide Aid To Palestinians, But Not Government. The Wall Street Journal/AP (2/16) reports that in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "provided new detail about the future of U.S. aid to the Palestinians under Hamas. … Rice said the U.S.…would not turn its back on such humanitarian programs as immunizing children against disease." In response to questioning by Sen. George Allen Rice said, "But no money will go to that government." Allen said, "I don't want a penny of taxpayer money going to Hamas." Rice replied, "Neither do I." She "reiterated that message later Wednesday in a private meeting with eight Jewish leaders she invited to the State Department to discuss Hamas and Iran."

Hamas Control Of Security Forces Uncertain. USA Today (2/16, Gutman, 2.31M) reports, "A key issue for the new government will be how to assert control over the Palestinian security forces. Preventive Security, the main intelligence outfit, is one of about 12 Palestinian security departments. All are currently in the hands of people connected to the ruling Fatah Party." And "Some in Hamas may harbor ill will toward security forces that often hunted them. And many of the security agents may balk at working for Hamas." USA Today notes, "If Hamas is unable to exert control over the security forces, it will result in 'significant civil strife,' says Jamil Rabah, director of Near East Consulting."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, Mitnick, 61K) reports that "a brewing dispute between the Islamic militants and the deposed Fatah Party is already calling into question the stability of a new government: How will authority be divvied up between the Hamas prime minister's cabinet and the higher-ranking post held by President Mahmoud Abbas?" On Saturday Abbas is expected to deliver a speech calling for Hamas "to embrace his vision for peace with Israel." But "Hamas is expected to remain steadfast in its opposition to Abbas's approach, deepening the divide between Fatah and Hamas lawmakers as negotiations begin to form the new government." One key concern "is who will control the 60,000-strong Palestinian paramilitary police." That may influence "whether the policemen will reinforce Abbas's preference of extending a year-long calm in violence with Israel, or possibly collude with militants to launch new attacks."

Hamas Nominates Members For Senior Legislative Posts. The Washington Times/AP (2/16, Barzak) reports, "The Islamic militant group Hamas said yesterday that it will put together the next Palestinian government by early March -- timing that could help Israeli hawks in parliamentary elections." Hamas' announcement it "would stack top government positions with its own people" may "trigger an Israeli boycott of the Palestinian Authority. Yesterday, Hamas nominated three members for senior legislative posts, including parliament speaker." The AP notes, "In addition to his legislative powers, the speaker would become caretaker president if the elected head of the Palestinian Authority -- Mr. Abbas -- were to die."

Three Protestors Killed In Pakistan During Anti-Cartoon Demonstration. NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 5, 0:10, Williams) reported, "In Pakistan, three days of protests against those controversial cartoons of the prophet Mohammed took a deadly turn again there today. Three people were killed, including an eight-year-old boy, when a massive demonstration turned into a riot."

The Washington Post (2/16, A18, Lancaster, 744K) notes, "Until this week, Pakistani protests over the cartoons had been peaceful and in many cases were supported by elected officials. But as the protests have started to get out of control, officials have changed their tune, warning they will crack down on violence."

Pakistani Politics Influence Protests. The New York Times (2/16, Masood, 1.19M) reports, "The protests have also become enmeshed with Pakistani politics as opposition parties and Islamic groups opposed to the president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, have led the protests and directed the anger over the cartoons into denunciation of General Musharraf's alliance with the West." In response to "mounting public criticism over what many protesters have described as a 'timid response' to the cartoons, the Pakistani cabinet on Wednesday tried damage control by reiterating a condemnation of 'sacrilegious material' in Western newspapers."

Musharraf Says Controversy Eroding Goodwill For West. NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 6, 2:40, Brokaw) reported, "Today's violent riots in Peshawar were another reminder of Pakistan's precarious state. An estimated 70,000 protesters took to the streets of the frontier city, the unofficial capital of Pakistan's radical Muslim movement, the gateway to the tribal region on the Afghan border where the Taliban continue to operate with the support of the local population. For his part Pakistan's President Pervez Musharraf says the cartoon controversy is canceling out much of the goodwill the West gained with its response to Pakistan's devastating earthquakes." Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf: "I think there is a terrible amount of anger. They have forgotten about all the good and they are just talking about this." Brokaw: "What can the West do?" President Musharraf: "There are many people who are voicing support over this. Please they should stop that."

Protests Have Roots In Past Muslim Grievances. The Washington Post (2/16, A1, Shadid, Sullivan, 744K) in an extensive front page story recounting the recent Muslim protests over cartoons reports that "the scope of the fallout tells only one story. The debate over the cartoons is replete with unintended consequences, some still taking shape this week. On one side is a defense of freedom of expression, on the other an unforgivable insult to a sacred figure. In between are potentially longer-lasting repercussions: a rethinking of relations between Europe and the Muslim world, and a rare moment of empowerment among Muslims who have felt besieged. Given the moral certainty pronounced by each party, some in the middle feel forced to take sides, blurring the diversity of religious thought that might offer grounds for compromise." The dispute "illustrates a broader collision of worldviews, often fueled by feelings of Muslim weakness and injury that date back long before the cartoons were published."

USA Today Raises Concerns Over Censorship. USA Today (2/16, 2.31M) editorializes that "the backlash in the Muslims street is driving an ill-considered response in the non-Muslim world, this one against free expression and free speech. Although the Western response is in the name of tolerance and preventing violence, it's a dangerous step toward censorship of ideas that give offense." USA Today notes, "religions have thrived for centuries and withstood the slings of non-believers. Those who would enshrine censorship in the name of tolerance don't give religions enough credit. They also invite censorship of their own beliefs if those who disagree come to power."

EU Leader Warns Core European Values Under Assault. The New York Times (2/16, Bowley, 1.19M) reports, "In the face of escalating attacks against foreigners in the Muslim world by violent critics of cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad, the European Union's chief executive said today that Europe had to fight for its core European values, including freedom of speech." European Commission president José Manuel Barroso "said in an interview that Europe had to defend its right to have in place a system that allowed the publication of the cartoons." Barroso "said European society was based on principles that included equality of rights between men and women, freedom of speech and a clear distinction between politics and religion."

Last MASH Unit To Complete Relief Mission In Pakistan. USA Today (2/16, Wiseman, 2.31M) reports, "The last of the U.S. military's legendary MASH units is completing its final assignment here in the quake-stricken Himalayas -- 3,000 miles from the frozen Korean countryside where Hawkeye Pierce and Trapper John mixed martinis, plotted practical jokes and pursued shapely nurses." Over "the next few weeks, the 212th Mobile Army Surgical Hospital will pull out of Pakistan, donate its Muzaffarabad field hospital to the Pakistani government and return to its home base at the Miesau Army Depot in Germany."

International Consensus Building For Ending Darfur Conflict. The Christian Science Monitor (2/16, McLaughlin, 61K) reports, "Amid new escalation in fighting in the troubled Darfur region of Sudan, with rebels shooting down a government helicopter Tuesday, there's fresh pressure on the international community to step in to help stop the three-year-old conflict." A "consensus is hardening in Western capitals and at the United Nations that the 7,000 African troops now in Darfur…are inadequate." Recently, "UN Secretary General Kofi Annan met with President Bush to push for US support on Darfur. Mr. Bush, who is under pressure from Christian conservatives to act, remained noncommittal. 'We did agree that we need a much more effective force on the ground' to replace AU troops, Mr. Annan said after the meeting, although he didn't mention specifics."

Congress Puts Pressure On Administration Over Sudan. The Hill (2/16, Mikhail) reports, "A bipartisan resolution denouncing both Sudan and the Arab League may place the White House in the difficult position of choosing between strategic and humanitarian interests." The Administration "will face tremendous pressure to support the measure, which expresses disapproval for the Arab League's holding its annual summit in Sudan, to bring attention to what has been deemed by many as genocide in the country's Darfur region. However, such support may undermine U.S. intelligence-sharing with Sudan as well as diplomatic efforts in Darfur and Iraq."

House Panel Criticizes Internet Companies For Aiding Chinese Censors. The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 11, 2:15, Schieffer) reported, "Officials of four of this country's biggest and richest Internet companies, Google, Yahoo!, Microsoft and Cisco, were called into Congress today and criticized for going along with censorship in China. It's the price of doing business." CBS (Hughes) added Rep. Christopher Smith likened "the four companies' cooperation with China to helping Nazi Germany." Rep. Christopher Smith, New Jersey: "If the secret police a half century ago asked where Anne Frank was hiding, would the correct answer to be to hand over the information?" Hughes: "Yahoo! officials admit to handing over information that sent Chinese dissidents to prison." Michael Callahan, senior vice president, Yahoo!: "Ultimately, American companies face a choice: Comply with Chinese laws or leave." Hughes: "But the incentives to stay are enormous, huge money from a huge population: More than 110 million Chinese Internet users and growing. But help for the Chinese web surfers may be on the way." But "apparently, China is feeling the pressure, too. In a rare move, the government tried to publicly defend its Internet controls, something American Internet companies had a hard time doing."

ABC World News Tonight (2/15, story 6, :45, Sawyer) reported, "And still on Capitol Hill, American Internet companies were called on the mat today, and accused of helping China crush dissent. Officials from Microsoft, Google, Yahoo! and Cisco, came under attack for complying with Chinese demands that they restrict Internet access and helping the Chinese government, which spies on its citizens." Rep. Tom Lantos: "My message to these companies today is simple -- your abhorrent activities in China are a disgrace. I simply do not understand how your corporate leadership sleeps at night."

The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Schatz, 2.11M) reports the high-tech executives "repeated arguments that staying in China and other repressive countries -- despite widespread Internet censorship -- does more good than harm for citizens there, as well as helping shareholders. The companies' arguments are similar to those used in the 1980s by companies criticized for doing business in South Africa."

Tech Firms Invite US Government To Provide Regulatory Remedies. The Financial Times (2/16, Kirchgaessner) reports, "Yahoo, Google, Microsoft and Cisco later responded to stinging criticism of their business practices – including accusations that they have 'enthusiastically volunteered for China's censorship brigade' – saying the issue was too big for the companies to tackle on their own and that the US government needed to take a leadership role."

The Washington Post (2/16, D5, Noguchi, 744K) reports, "All the companies invited the U.S. government to negotiate terms that would help them increase their services around the world while protecting the privacy of individual users." Yahoo General Counsel Michael Callahan said, "These issues are larger than any one company, or any one industry." Google vice president of global communications Elliot Schrage said the US "should make censorship a central part of trade negotiations."

The New York Times (2/16, Zeller, 1.19M) notes the request that lawmakers provide a legislative solution "divided members of the subcommittee over where blame lies if companies have gone adrift in China." Rep. Robert Wexler "asked if Congress ought not be ashamed itself, for having granted China trade status as a most favored nation. Mr. Wexler said that it was 'duplicitous' to blame the companies for doing what the government had legally sanctioned them to do, and that the firms were in a 'no-win situation.'" But that "drew an incredulous response from Dana Rohrabacher, a California Republican. 'Most favored nation status?' he said, 'Who lobbied for that? Come on. The corporations did.'"

Agreement Reached On New Haitian Leader. The New York Times (2/16, Thompson, 1.19M) reports, "The front-runner in last week's presidential election," René Préval "will be declared the winner as part of an agreement by leaders of Haiti's interim government to retabulate the votes, a high-ranking official of the Organization of American States said Wednesday night." The OAS official "said that loopholes in Haitian electoral law allow the government to discard an estimated 85,000 blank ballots included in the original tally. By excluding them, Mr. Préval's lead would increase from 48.7 percent of the votes to slightly more than 51 percent."

Election Materials Found At Dump. The Washington Post/AP (2/16, A22) reports, "U.N. police officers went to a garbage dump near the Haitian capital Wednesday to recover election materials, including numbered bags apparently used to carry results and tally sheets, as charges mounted that last week's presidential election was marred by fraud. Thousands of ballots, including some that were marked, were strewn over about an acre at the dump."

US Reestablishes Dialogue With Venezuela. Reuters (2/16) reports, "Venezuela and the United States have opened talks after they expelled diplomats this month in a dispute over charges that a U.S. naval attache was spying, U.S. officials said on Wednesday." A "private meeting on Tuesday between U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for Western Hemisphere Affairs Tom Shannon and Venezuela's ambassador in Washington came after fraying diplomatic ties between the two countries hit a new low." U.S. ambassador to Caracas William Brownfield said, "Without a doubt we have established a dialogue."

Bolton Opposes Venezuelan Bid For UN Security Council Seat. Reuters (2/16, Arieff) reports, "Venezuela is stepping up a previously low-key drive for a seat on the U.N. Security Council beginning next year, U.N. diplomats said on Wednesday, prompting criticism from U.S. Ambassador John Bolton." Bolton said, "I don't think it would be conducive to an effective and well-functioning Security Council."

Effort To Reform UN Human Rights Council Delayed. The Washington Times (2/16, Sands, 90K) reports, "A drive by a bloc of Islamic nations for a global ban on 'defamation of religions and prophets' has thrown a major kink into U.S. hopes for an overhaul of the leading U.N. human rights body." The Islamic proposal "states that 'defamation of religions and prophets is inconsistent with the right to freedom of expression' and that governments and the press have a 'responsibility in promoting tolerance and respect for religious and cultural values.'" But, "Jennifer L. Windsor, executive director of the human rights group Freedom Watch, said the OIC effort was one of a number of attempts by nations and blocs at the United Nations to 'dumb down the human rights standards.'"

EU Defense Agency Faces Funding Shortage. The Washington Times (2/16, Borowiec, 90K) reports, "The European Union's ambitious plan to create an independent defense force has stumbled into financial difficulties that are likely to delay, if not scuttle, the project. The EU defense agency is looking for an initial $60 million budget to begin weapons research, but contributions have not been forthcoming as some nations argue that NATO should remain the dominant defense pact and trans-Atlantic link, diplomats say." It "has led to an acerbic debate pitting Britain, a staunch NATO supporter, against France, the prime backer of a separate European defense capability."

Health Officials Issue Restrictions After Bird Flu Virus Arrives Early. The New York Times (2/16, Bernstein, Rosenthal, 1.19M) reports, "Health officials across Europe issued restrictions for commercial poultry farms Wednesday after reports that the deadly bird flu virus had turned up at a surprisingly early date in migratory birds in several Western European countries." While "91 people have died after picking up the virus from close contact with birds, the most immediate threat for Europe is an uncontrolled outbreak of the virus among domesticated fowl, which can rapidly decimate a national poultry industry."

Japan Could Be Model For US Energy Conservation. The Washington Post (2/16, A1, Faiola, 744K) reports, "As President Bush calls on Americans to break their addiction to oil and increase energy efficiency in the face of soaring prices, perhaps no people serve as better role models than the energy-miser Japanese." Japan "has set strict new energy-saving targets for 18 kinds of consumer and business electronics. Home and office air conditioners, for instance, must be redesigned to use 63 percent less power by 2008. The targets have sparked a gold rush among electronics makers, who are churning out record numbers of energy-saving -- but higher-priced -- consumer products." Currently "Japan's energy consumption per person is now almost half that of the United States" and Japan's philosophy is "rooted more in economics than environmentalism."

Indian Economic Progress Touted. Harvard professor Martin Feldstein, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Reagan, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.11M) writes, "When President Bush visits India next month, he will see a country that is making remarkable economic progress despite enormous structural problems. … In India he will not see the modern high-rises or the general level of prosperity that he has seen in urban China. But the progress in India is nevertheless real." Feldstein concludes, "The optimistic mood in India's business community, the desire for reforms by the top leadership of the government, and the growing number of relatively middle-class households provide a force for change and a source of support for new entrepreneurial activities. If the political leaders can now persuade the traditional opponents of reform that growth can benefit their constituents and that better new jobs will replace the old, India will see decades of remarkable achievement."

WSJournal Hopes Judge Will Allow Leniency For Cuban Refugees. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, 2.11M) in an editorial writes, "During the Cold War no one would have thought to send a child who had escaped East Germany back across the Berlin Wall. But today the U.S. thinks nothing of sending Cuban refugees intercepted at sea back to Fidel Castro's island tyranny." Fifteen recent refugees "learned that lesson the hard way." They escaped Cuba but "the Coast Guard promptly returned them, with the argument that because the old bridge was severed from the U.S. the Cubans hadn't technically made it to the land of the free. Under a policy invented by the Clinton Administration -- known as 'wet foot-dry foot' -- Cuban refugees who are not walking on land are repatriated." The Journal concludes that "the case may also be a first step toward reviewing a policy that reversed an American tradition of welcoming freedom seekers on the run from dictatorships."

The Morning Update

Today, President Bush will travel to the headquarters of U.S. Central Command at MacDill Air Force Base in Tampa, Florida. The President will receive a briefing on ongoing global operations in the War on Terror from senior military commanders. United States Central Command is focused on ongoing military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, defeating Al-Qaeda, denying terrorists safe havens, stemming the spread of extremism, and assisting nations in the Horn of Africa to secure their borders.

Following his briefing, the President will make remarks on progress being made in winning the War on Terror, the global coalition's actions to break up terrorist networks and disrupt plots, and the power of freedom and democracy which are leading millions to reject the terrorists' ideology.

From Today's Morning Headlines

President Bush Discusses The Need For More Transparency In The Nation's Health Care System. "President Bush argued Thursday that the United States needs a health care system in which patients pay more directly for their care, because that will turn them into comparison shoppers whose interest in a good deal will drive costs down. ... Bush also campaigned for medical records to be kept electronically, to cut down on inefficiency and cost, and for more information to be made available about the price and quality of medical procedures. All these things, he said, would encourage a 'consumer-based health care system.' 'When you go buy a car you're able to shop and compare,' he said. 'And yet in health care that's just not happening in America today.' <http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20060216/ap_on_go_pr_wh/bush;_ylt=Au1EZbTiFK_QTaPR9B.dMpRp24cA;_ylu=X3oDMTA5aHJvMDdwBHNlYwN5bmNhdA--> " (Deb Riechmann, "Bush Urges More Direct Health Care Choices," The Associated Press, 2/16/06)

Stanford University School Of Medicine Professor Scott Atlas Writes That Greater Transparency Can Cut Health Care Costs. "If a goal of health-care reform is to empower the patient, why is there such a mystery about medical prices? Instead of allowing government to set them, which is essentially the case for the great majority of medical procedures, the role of the government should be to make transparent the pricing of these procedures. ... The idea of informed consumers knowing prices and controlling their health-care dollar is an extremely powerful one. And in those few cases where patients have had to pay for procedures out-of-pocket, and have had information about price - for example, whole-body CT screening - the cost did indeed come down, rapidly and dramatically. The price of whole-body CT procedures declined by more than 75% in a few years! Ultimately, no commodity, no service industry, sells to consumers without openly disclosing prices. Doctors and hospitals might be forced to rethink their prices if they knew those prices would become part of the public domain. There should be no mystery to patients about what their own health care will cost. <http://online.wsj.com/article/SB114014766069076738.html?mod=opinion_main_commentaries> " (Scott W. Atlas, Op-Ed, "Doctors: Post Your Prices," The Wall Street Journal, 2/17/06)

The Administration Requests Additional Funding For Ongoing Operations In The War On Terror. "The Bush administration sent a request to Congress on Thursday for $72.4 billion in additional funds for the current fiscal year, largely to pay for military operations and reconstruction efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan. ... 'Obviously we're asking the Congress to move this one very quickly <http://www.nytimes.com/2006/02/17/politics/17military.html?_r=1&adxnnl=1&oref=slogin&adxnnlx=1140175408-w0oARIYZIc7oGmNrYZPJnQ> ,' Tina Jonas, the Pentagon's top budget official, told reporters, adding that funds for military operations nearly ran short last year because Congress was slow to act. Of the $72.4 billion request, $65.3 billion would go to the Defense Department to pay for military operations and $4.2 billion would finance reconstruction. Another $2.9 billion would be for intelligence agencies, according to Joel Kaplan, deputy director of the Office of Management and Budget. For training security forces in Iraq, the administration is asking for $3.7 billion for the rest of the fiscal year, as well as $2.2 billion for training troops in Afghanistan, Ms. Jonas said. Another $1.9 billion would go to research and fielding of equipment to help troops detect and defuse homemade bombs, the leading cause of American casualties." (David S. Cloud, "Billions Asked For Afghans And Iraqis," The New York Times, 2/17/06)

The Administration Requests Additional Funding To Support Gulf Coast Rebuilding. "Bush also sought $19.8 billion for the hurricane-battered U.S. Gulf Coast, which would push relief after Hurricane Katrina to some $90 billion. ... The additional money for hurricane rebuilding would be used for efforts to provide shelter and medical care to victims, as well as cleanup activities from the disaster <http://today.reuters.com/news/NewsArticle.aspx?type=politicsNews&storyID=uri:2006-02-17T052306Z_01_N16320151_RTRUKOC_0_US-IRAQ-SPENDING.xml&pageNumber=1&summit=> that killed about 1,300 people on the U.S. Gulf Coast. Louisiana would get $4.2 billion in block grants to improve housing and infrastructure. The state suffered the worst losses from Hurricane Katrina, which also destroyed portions of Alabama and Mississippi. The White House said nearly $1.4 billion would be spent to protect New Orleans from future storms. About $70 million would be spent on early-warning systems and other crisis communications equipment.
Federal facilities damaged by Hurricane Katrina, including a New Orleans veterans hospital, Coast Guard facilities and border protection, would be rebuilt with the emergency money." (Vicki Allen And Richard Cowan, "Bush Requests More War, Hurricane Emergency Money," Reuters, 2/17/06)

The New York Times Urges The Approval Of The Administration's Request For Funds To Help Meet The Housing Needs Of Louisiana Residents. "The Bush administration has made a commitment to rebuilding southern Louisiana. Congress must make sure this opportunity is not lost. On Wednesday, President Bush's Katrina czar, Donald Powell, called for $4.2 billion more to help Louisiana residents save severely damaged homes and, in some cases, rebuild in safer areas. Congress needs to approve this request quickly for New Orleans and the surrounding parishes to have a fighting chance at anything but a patchwork recovery. ... But by approving this modest but fair package, Washington could give Louisianans something to celebrate this Mardi Gras <http://www.nytimes.com/2006/02/17/opinion/17fri2.html> ." (Editorial, "A Chance For New Orleans," The New York Times, 2/17/06)

On The Road, Secretary Gutierrez Promotes The President's American Competitiveness Initiative. "U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez called Microsoft an example of a small company that used entrepreneurship to grow into one of the world's leading technology giants, on a tour Thursday to promote President Bush's competitiveness initiative. Gutierrez visited Microsoft's mock home of the future at the company's Redmond headquarters. There, he got a glimpse of technologies such as a kitchen counter that flashes recipes based on ingredients sitting on it, and a mirror that tells what clothes match a shirt held before it. He said he wanted to visit Microsoft because it is a great example

Construction Of New Homes Surges At Fastest Pace In More Than Three Decades. "Construction of new homes and apartments, defying forecasts of a housing slowdown, shot up in January at the fastest pace in more than three decades. That was the fastest construction rate since March 1973, but it was expected to be a one-time blip caused by unusually warm weather in January that prompted builders to start work on more homes." (Martin Crutsinger, "Housing Construction Soars in January," The Associated Press, 2/16/06)

The President Discusses Free Trade With Colombian President Alvaro Uribe. "On his visit to Washington, Uribe is leading stalled talks for a free trade deal - a key plank in the Colombian leader's re-election campaign. The two nations have been negotiating an agreement for the past 23 months. Bush said he told Uribe that the U.S. is interested in a trade agreement and would negotiate in good faith. 'I assured him that our trade negotiators will be fair in our approach,' Bush told reporters after the two leaders met in the Oval Office. ... 'All of us have come to this negotiation in good faith and I'm sure that we will see a conclusion,' said Uribe, who also met on Thursday with U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman. The Wall Street Journal Profiles Under Secretary Karen Hughes' Efforts To Enlist The Support Of Corporate America. "Henry McKinnell, chief executive of Pfizer Inc., got an unusual call last fall from the White House. Would he be willing to fly to an earthquake-wracked corner of Pakistan with Karen Hughes, President Bush's longtime confidante and now his chief of public diplomacy? The U.S. had won a rare surge of goodwill nearly a year earlier in Indonesia by sending warships to help in tsunami relief. Now the administration wanted to do something similar after the devastating Oct. 8 earthquake in Pakistan, but with U.S. business - and Mr. McKinnell - playing a starring role as fund-raisers.

2. PARAGRAPH 3 CONTAINS A SET OF MASTER TALKING POINTS

THAT YOU SHOULD USE AS YOUR "HOME BASE" WHEN DISCUSSING DETAINEE POINTS. THESE CONTAIN THE FIVE KEY TALKING POINTS YOU SHOULD USE WHENEVER DISCUSSING DETAINEE MATTERS. PARAGRAPH 4 CONTAINS A SET OF TALKING POINTS SPECIFICALLY RELATED TO THE GUANTANAMO BAY DETENTION FACILITY, AND PARAGRAPH 5 CONTAINS A SET OF TALKING POINTS FOR DISCUSSING RENDITIONS.

3. MASTER TALKING POINTS

-- UNITED STATES POLICY REGARDING DETAINEES IS CLEAR AND UNEQUIVOCAL: OUR PERSONNEL ARE REQUIRED TO COMPLY WITH ALL U.S. LAWS AND TREATY OBLIGATIONS IN THEIR TREATMENT OF DETAINEES. THESE INCLUDE A PROHIBITION ON TORTURE AND A PROHIBITION ON CRUEL, INHUMAN, OR DEGRADING TREATMENT. INSTRUCTIONS FROM THE PRESIDENT, THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE, AND THE CHAIRMAN OF THE JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF, AS WELL AS THROUGHOUT THE CHAIN OF COMMAND, MAKE THESE REQUIREMENTS CLEAR. GENERAL PETER PACE, CHAIRMAN OF THE JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF, HAS STATED, "I CAN TELL YOU CATEGORICALLY THAT ANY MALTREATMENT OF ANY DETAINEES BY U.S. FORCES OR COALITION FORCES IS TOTALLY UNACCEPTABLE. THAT OUR ORDERS HAVE AND WILL CONTINUE TO BE THAT WE WILL TREAT EVERYONE IN OUR CHARGE HUMANELY AND WITH RESPECT."

-- WHEN THERE HAVE BEEN ABUSES, SUCH AS THE SHOCKING MISTREATMENT OF DETAINEES BY A SMALL GROUP OF GUARDS AT ABU GHRAIB, THOSE VIOLATIONS OF OUR LAW AND POLICY ARE TAKEN SERIOUSLY, ACTED UPON PROMPTLY, INVESTIGATED THOROUGHLY, AND THE WRONGDOERS ARE HELD ACCOUNTABLE FOR THEIR ACTIONS. AFTER THE INVESTIGATIONS INTO ABU GHRAIB, ONE OF THE INDIVIDUALS RESPONSIBLE WAS TRIED AND SENTENCED TO TEN YEARS IN PRISON, ANOTHER TO EIGHT YEARS, ANOTHER TO THREE. THE COLONEL IN CHARGE OF THE MILITARY INTELLIGENCE

BRIGADE AT ABU GHRAIB WAS RELIEVED OF COMMAND, REPRIMANDED, AND FINED.

-- WE ARE CONSTANTLY WORKING TO IMPROVE OUR DETAINEE POLICIES AND PROCEDURES, BECAUSE THIS IS A NEW AND DIFFICULT CHALLENGE IN A VERY DIFFERENT KIND OF WAR. THE TERRORISTS WE ARE DETAINING ARE NOT A PART OF ANY ARMY; THEY DO NOT WEAR A UNIFORM OR REPRESENT ANY STATE OR COUNTRY. THEY INCLUDE THE ALLEGED 20TH HIJACKER FROM SEPTEMBER 11TH AND OTHER TERRORIST LEADERS AS WELL AS TERRORIST TRAINERS, BOMB MAKERS, RECRUITERS, AND FINANCIERS.

-- THE UNITED STATES HAS NO INTEREST IN DETAINING ENEMY COMBATANTS ANY LONGER THAN ABSOLUTELY NECESSARY. ON AN ONGOING BASIS, EVEN PRIOR TO THE ANNUAL REVIEW BOARD PROCESS, THE U.S. GOVERNMENT HAS REVIEWED THE CONTINUED DETENTION OF EACH DETAINEE AND CONTINUES TO DO SO. THE UNITED STATES RELEASES DETAINEES WHEN IT BELIEVES THEY NO LONGER POSE A THREAT TO THE UNITED STATES AND ITS ALLIES.

-- DETAINEES AT GUANTANAMO ARE PROVIDED WITH SHELTER, FOOD, CLOTHING, READING MATERIALS, MEDICAL CARE, AND THE OPPORTUNITY TO WORSHIP, INCLUDING PRAYER BEADS, RUGS AND COPIES OF THE KORAN IN THEIR NATIVE LANGUAGE.

4. GUANTANAMO BAY TALKING POINTS

-- DEALING WITH CAPTURED TERRORISTS IS A DIFFICULT CHALLENGE. THEY ARE NOT SOLDIERS. THEY DO NOT ADHERE TO THE RULES OF WAR. THEY DO NOT REPRESENT ANY STATE OR GOVERNMENT. AL QAIDA IS NOT A PARTY TO INTERNATIONAL TREATIES OR CONVENTIONS.

-- UNITED STATES PERSONNEL ARE REQUIRED TO COMPLY WITH ALL U.S. LAWS AND TREATY OBLIGATIONS IN THEIR TREATMENT OF DETAINEES. THESE INCLUDE A PROHIBITION ON TORTURE AND A PROHIBITION ON CRUEL, INHUMAN, OR DEGRADING TREATMENT. INSTRUCTIONS FROM THE PRESIDENT AND THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE COMMUNICATED THROUGHOUT THE CHAIN OF COMMAND, MAKE THESE REQUIREMENTS CLEAR. GENERAL PETER PACE, CHAIRMAN OF THE JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF, HAS STATED, "I CAN TELL YOU CATEGORICALLY THAT ANY MALTREATMENT OF ANY DETAINEES BY U.S. FORCES OR COALITION FORCES IS TOTALLY UNACCEPTABLE. THAT OUR ORDERS HAVE AND WILL CONTINUE TO BE THAT WE WILL TREAT EVERYONE IN OUR CHARGE HUMANELY AND WITH RESPECT."

-- THE FIRST PRIORITY OF ANY GOVERNMENT IS TO PROTECT ITS CITIZENS. THESE COMBATANTS HAVE NOT SURRENDERED. SOME MAY NEVER RENOUNCE THEIR DEVOTION TO TERRORISM AND ARE FANATICAL IN THEIR COMMITMENT TO KILL INNOCENT PEOPLE AND CAUSE GLOBAL INSTABILITY.

-- THE UNITED STATES DOES NOT WISH TO HOLD ANYONE LONGER THAN ABSOLUTELY NECESSARY. DETAINEES HELD BY THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE ARE SCREENED THOROUGHLY, BEGINNING AT THE POINT OF CAPTURE AND LATER AT THE THEATER DETENTION FACILITIES, AND THEIR INDIVIDUAL CASES ARE REVIEWED PERIODICALLY THEREAFTER. THESE PROCESSES ARE DESIGNED TO ENSURE WE ONLY HOLD THOSE WHO POSE A CONTINUING THREAT. ONCE AT GUANTANAMO BAY, EACH DETAINEE HAS HIS STATUS REGULARLY REVIEWED BY A MILITARY PANEL.

-- OF THE MORE THAN 10,000 COMBATANTS WHO HAVE BEEN IN COALITION CUSTODY OR CONTROL, ONLY A SMALL NUMBER HAVE BEEN SENT TO GUANTANAMO BAY.

-- APPROXIMATELY 490 DETAINEES REMAIN AT GUANTANAMO, AND MORE THAN 267 HAVE BEEN RELEASED OR TRANSFERRED.

-- THE DETAINEES BROUGHT TO GUANTANAMO BAY WERE CAPTURED WAGING WAR AGAINST US OR ACTIVELY SUPPORTING AL QAIDA OR THE TALIBAN OR BOTH. MORE THAN 700 OF TEHSE MEN WERE SO DANGEROUS THAT THEY COULD NOT BE SAFELY DETAINED IN AFGHANISTAN. THESE COMBATANTS INCLUDED TERRORIST TRAINERS, BOMB MAKERS, RECRUITERS AND FACILITATORS, TERRORIST FINANCIERS, BODYGUARDS FOR USAMA BIN LADEN, AND POTENTIAL SUICIDE BOMBERS.

WHO IS BEING HELD AT GUANTANAMO BAY?

-- TERRORIST TRAINERS, BOMB MAKERS, RECRUITERS AND FACILITATORS, TERRORIST FINANCIERS, BODY GUARDS FOR USAMA BIN LADEN, AND POTENTIAL SUICIDE BOMBERS. SPECIFIC EXAMPLES INCLUDE:

--- AN AL-QAIDA EXPLOSIVES TRAINER WHO GAVE INFORMATION ON THE- ASSASSINATION OF NORTHERN ALLIANCE LEADER MASOOD AND ON AL-QAIDA'S USE OF MINES.

--- A MEMBER OF A TERRORIST CELL IN AFGHANISTAN THAT TARGETED CIVILIANS, ESPECIALLY JOURNALISTS AND FOREIGN AID WORKERS, AND WAS RESPONSIBLE FOR A GRENADE ATTACK ON A FOREIGN JOURNALIST'S CAR.

--- AN AL-QAIDA MEMBER WHO DESIGNED A PROTOTYPE SHOE BOMB FOR DESTROYING AIRPLANES AND A MAGNETIC MINE FOR ATTACKING SHIPS.

--- A TRAINER IN THE USE OF EXPLOSIVES WHO WORKED ON A PLAN TO USE CELL PHONES TO DETONATE BOMBS.

-- SOME DETAINEES WANT TO CONTINUE TO FIGHT AS EXEMPLIFIED

BY THE FOLLOWING STATEMENTS OF SOME OF THE DETAINEES:

--- "I WILL ARRANGE FOR THE KIDNAPPING AND EXECUTION OF US CITIZENS LIVING IN SAUDI ARABIA. SMALL GROUPS OF FOUR OR FIVE US CITIZENS WILL BE KIDNAPPED, HELD, AND EXECUTED. THEY WILL HAVE THEIR HEADS CUT OFF."

--- "...THE PEOPLE WHO DIED ON 9/11/2001 WERE NOT INNOCENT BECAUSE THEY PAID TAXES AND PARTICIPATED IN THE GOVERNMENT THAT FOSTERS REPRESSION OF PALESTINIANS."

--- ANOTHER STATED THAT ACTS OF TERRORISM ARE A LEGITIMATE WAY FOR A MUSLIM TO WAGE JIHAD AGAINST THE US, EVEN IF INNOCENT WOMEN AND CHILDREN ARE KILLED. HE BELIEVES THAT MUSLIM JIHADISTS WILL WIPE OUT THE GOVERNMENT OF THE US WITHIN THE NEXT 20 YEARS.

-- OTHER DETAINEES HAVE HAD A CHANGE OF HEART WHILE UNDER US CUSTODY AS EXEMPLIFIED BY THE FOLLOWING STATEMENTS:

--- "AMERICANS ARE VERY KIND PEOPLE...IF PEOPLE SAY THERE IS MISTREATMENT IN CUBA WITH THE DETAINEES, THOSE ... SPEAKING ARE WRONG, THEY TREAT US LIKE A MUSLIM NOT A DETAINEE."

--- "...THE DEVIL SADDAM AND HIS PARTY HAVE FALLEN DOWN. HOW PEOPLE GO TO NAJAF AND KARBALA WALKING AND NOBODY PROHIBITS THEM? THIS WAS GRACE OF GOD AND THE USA TO IRAQI PEOPLE."

--- "THE FOOD IS GOOD, THE BEDROOMS ARE CLEAN AND THE HEALTH CARE IS VERY GOOD. THERE IS A LIBRARY FULL OF ISLAMIC BOOKS, SCIENCE BOOKS, AND LITERATURE ... ORT, READING, AND PRAYING, ALL OF THESE OPTIONS ARE NOT MANDATORY FOR EVERYONE, IT IS UP TO THE PERSON."

WHAT HAS BEEN LEARNED FROM THEIR INTERROGATIONS?

-- THROUGH INTERROGATIONS OF DETAINEES, THE COALITION HAS LEARNED ABOUT AL QAIDA AND TALIBAN RECRUITMENT AND HOW THEY FORM TERRORIST CELLS. WE HAVE LEARNED HOW THEY COMMUNICATE, TRAIN, RAISE FUNDS, AND TRAVEL.

-- ULTIMATELY, THE COALITION WILL WIN THE GLOBAL WAR ON TERROR THROUGH INFORMATION. INFORMATION ALLOWS US TO PREVENT FUTURE ATTACKS AND PROTECT INNOCENT LIVES. INTELLIGENCE OPERATIONS HAVE SAVED THE LIVES OF COALITION FORCES AND INNOCENT CIVILIANS.

WHAT ARE THEIR CONDITIONS?

-- ALL DETAINEES ARE PROVIDED:
FOOD: THREE MEALS PER DAY THAT MEET CULTURAL DIETARY REQUIREMENTS
SHELTER: CAMPS RANGE FROM RESTRICTIVE WITH 30 MINUTES OF EXERCISE TWICE A WEEK TO LESS RESTRICTIVE WITH OUTSIDE RECREATION SEVERAL HOURS A DAY. PLANS ARE UNDERWAY FOR EXPANDED COMMUNAL LIVING QUARTERS AND INCREASED OPPORTUNITIES FOR EXERCISE AND TEAM ACTIVITIES INCLUDING SOCCER, VOLLEYBALL AND PING PONG.

THE OPPORTUNITY TO WORSHIP: A COPY OF THE KORAN IS GIVEN TO THE DETAINEES PRINTED AS APPROPRIATE IN ONE OF FIVE LANGUAGES. (ARABIC, DARI, PASHTU, RUSSIAN, AND FARSI.) THEY ALSO RECEIVE PRAYER BEADS, PRAYER RUGS, AND OTHER READING MATERIALS

---THE MUSLIM CALL TO PRAYER IS PLAYED OVER CAMP LOUDSPEAKERS FIVE TIMES A DAY, GENERALLY AT 5:30AM, 1PM, 2:30PM, 7:30PM AND 9:30PM.

--- ONCE THE CALL TO PRAYER SOUNDS, DETAINEES RECEIVE 20 MINUTES OF UNINTERRUPTED TIME TO PRACTICE THEIR FAITH. THE GUARDS STRIVE TO ENSURE DETAINEES ARE NOT INTERRUPTED DURING THIS PERIOD.

--- STENCILED ARROWS POINTING IN THE DIRECTION OF MECCA ARE DISPLAYED THROUGHOUT THE CAMP TO ASSIST THE DETAINEES IN KNOWING IN WHAT DIRECTION TO PRAY.

--- READING MATERIALS (INCREASED ACCESS TO FOREIGN LANGUAGE MATERIALS IS PLANNED)

--- EXCELLENT MEDICAL CARE: DETAINEES RECEIVE MEDICAL TREATMENT THAT IS COMPARABLE TO WHAT US SERVICE MEN AND WOMEN RECEIVE. THE LIVES OF DOZENS, IF NOT HUNDREDS, OF INSURGENTS AND DETAINEES HAVE BEEN SAVED BY SUPERIOR MEDICAL TREATMENT PROVIDED BY US MILITARY PERSONNEL.

--- MAIL: DETAINEES CAN RECEIVE AND SEND MAIL. OVER A SIX-MONTH PERIOD IN 2004-2005, MORE THAN 14,000 PIECES OF MAIL WERE SENT OR RECEIVED BY DETAINEES.

ADDITIONAL BACKGROUND POINTS ON LEGAL PROCESSES AFFORDED DETAINEES AT GUANTANAMO

-- IN ADDITION TO THE SCREENING PROCEDURES IN PLACE AT THE POINT OF CAPTURE, THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE HAS CREATED THREE AVENUES FOR DETAINEES AT GUANTANAMO TO CHALLENGE THEIR STATUS: (1) COMBATANT STATUS REVIEW TRIBUNALS; (2) ADMINISTRATIVE REVIEW BOARDS; AND (3) MILITARY COMMISSIONS (FOR THOSE CHARGED WITH VIOLATIONS OF THE LAW OF WAR).

-- THE COMBATANT STATUS REVIEW TRIBUNAL (CSRT) IS A ONE-TIME PROCESS THAT PROVIDES THE DETAINEE WITH THE OPPORTUNITY TO HAVE HIS STATUS REVIEWED AND CONSIDERED BY A NEUTRAL DECISION-MAKING PANEL COMPOSED OF THREE COMMISSIONED MILITARY OFFICERS SWORN TO EXECUTE THEIR DUTIES FAITHFULLY AND IMPARTIALLY.

-- THESE PROCEDURES ARE MODELED AFTER ARMY REGULATION 190-8, WHICH GOVERN TRIBUNALS THAT DETERMINE THE STATUS OF ENEMY DETAINEES WHO ASSERT POW (PRISONER-OF-WAR) STATUS UNDER THE GENEVA CONVENTION. U.S. SUPREME COURT JUSTICE SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR CITED ARMY REGULATION 190-8 AS AN EXAMPLE OF A TRIBUNAL THAT COULD PROVIDE APPROPRIATE PROCESS FOR AMERICAN CITIZENS WHO ARE DETAINED BY THE MILITARY.

-- IN FACT, THE COMBATANT STATUS REVIEW TRIBUNALS PROVIDE GREATER PROCESS AND PROTECTIONS THAN ARMY REGULATION 190-8. IN ADDITION TO THE OPPORTUNITY TO BE HEARD IN PERSON AND PRESENT ADDITIONAL EVIDENCE THAT MIGHT BENEFIT HIM, A DETAINEE CAN RECEIVE ASSISTANCE FROM A MILITARY OFFICER TO PREPARE FOR HIS HEARING AND TO ENSURE HE UNDERSTANDS THE PROCESS. HE IS ALSO ASSISTED BY A CSRT RECORDER, WHO IS OBLIGATED TO SEARCH GOVERNMENT FILES FOR EVIDENCE SUGGESTING THE DETAINEE IS NOT AN ENEMY COMBATANT. MOREOVER, IN ADVANCE OF THE HEARING, THE DETAINEE IS PROVIDED WITH AN UNCLASSIFIED SUMMARY OF THE EVIDENCE SUPPORTING HIS ENEMY COMBATANT CLASSIFICATION.

-- EVERY DECISION BY THIS TRIBUNAL IS SUBJECT TO AN AUTOMATIC REVIEW BY A HIGHER AUTHORITY THAT IS EMPOWERED TO RETURN THE RECORD TO THE TRIBUNAL FOR FURTHER PROCEEDINGS.

-- IN ADDITION, PURSUANT TO THE DETAINEE TREATMENT ACT OF 2005, A CSRT DECISION CAN BE DIRECTLY APPEALED TO AN AMERICAN DOMESTIC CIVILIAN COURT-THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT.

-- TO OUR KNOWLEDGE, THESE PROCEDURAL PROTECTIONS ARE MORE EXTENSIVE THAN THOSE USED BY ANY OTHER NATION IN ANY PREVIOUS CONFLICT TO DETERMINE A COMBATANT'S STATUS.

-- EACH OF THE 490 DETAINEES WHO ARE CURRENTLY AT GUANTANAMO HAVE HAD A COMBATANT STATUS REVIEW TRIBUNAL. AS A RESULT OF THIS PROCESS, 38 DETAINEES WERE DETERMINED NO LONGER TO MEET THE CRITERIA FOR DESIGNATION AS ENEMY COMBATANTS. TWENTY-NINE OF THOSE HAVE BEEN RELEASED, AND THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE IS WORKING CLOSELY WITH THE STATE DEPARTMENT TO EFFECT THE RELEASE OF THE REMAINING NINE.

-- IN ADDITION TO THE CSRT, AN ADMINISTRATIVE REVIEW BOARD (ARB) REVIEWS A DETAINEE'S STATUS ANNUALLY TO DETERMINE THE EXTENT TO WHICH AN ENEMY COMBATANT AT GTMO MAY CONTINUE TO POSE A THREAT TO THE UNITED STATES OR ITS ALLIES, OR WHETHER THERE ARE OTHER FACTORS THAT WOULD SUPPORT THE NEED FOR CONTINUED DETENTION. AN ADMINISTRATIVE REVIEW BOARD CONSISTS OF A NEUTRAL PANEL OF THREE COMMISSIONED MILITARY OFFICERS SWORN TO EXECUTE THEIR DUTIES FAITHFULLY AND IMPARTIALLY. THE HOME GOVERNMENTS OF EACH DETAINEE ARE INVITED TO SUBMIT INFORMATION TO THE PANEL CONCERNING WHETHER THE DETAINEE SHOULD CONTINUE TO BE DETAINED.

-- BASED ON THIS ASSESSMENT, THE ARB PANEL CAN RECOMMEND TO A DESIGNATED CIVILIAN OFFICIAL THAT THE INDIVIDUAL BE RELEASED, CONTINUED TO BE DETAINED, OR TRANSFERRED WITH CONDITIONS TO THEIR COUNTRY OF NATIONALITY.

-- THE ARB PROCESS IS NOT REQUIRED BY THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS, OR BY INTERNATIONAL OR DOMESTIC LAW. THE UNITED STATES CREATED THIS PROCESS TO ENSURE THAT WE DETAIN INDIVIDUALS NO LONGER THAN NECESSARY.

-- THE FIRST ROUND OF ADMINISTRATIVE REVIEW BOARD DECISIONS WAS COMPLETED LAST MONTH.

-- MORE THAN 267 DETAINEES HAVE BEEN TRANSFERRED OUT OF GUANTANAMO BAY. SOME ARE IN PRISON OR UNDER SURVEILLANCE IN THEIR OWN COUNTRY - SOME WERE RELEASED.

-- UNFORTUNATELY, DESPITE ASSURANCES FROM THOSE RELEASED, IT IS BELIEVED THAT AT LEAST A DOZEN, AND POSSIBLY MORE, WENT BACK TO FIGHTING.

-- ONE,ABDULLAH MAHSUD, CLAIMED HE WAS AN OFFICE CLERK AND DRIVER FOR THE TALIBAN AND CONSISTENTLY DENIED ANY

AFFILIATION WITH AL QAIDA. HE SAID HE WAS FORCED INTO THE TALIBAN MILITARY AND HAD NOT RECEIVED ANY WEAPONS OR MILITARY TRAINING. AFTER HIS RELEASE, IT WAS REPORTED THAT HE ORDERED THE KIDNAPPING BY AL QAIDA-LINKED MILITANTS OF TWO CHINESE ENGINEERS.

-- ANOTHER RELEASED DETAINEE ASSASSINATED AN AFGHAN JUDGE.

SEVERAL OTHERS WERE KILLED AFTER GOING BACK TO FIGHTING.

-- THE THIRD LAYER OF PROCESS THAT WE AFFORD TO DETAINEES IS MILITARY COMMISSIONS. ALTHOUGH THE LAW OF WAR DOES NOT REQUIRE US TO BRING CRIMINAL CHARGES AGAINST AN ENEMY

COMBATANT IN ORDER TO DETAIN HIM, SOME DETAINEES ARE SUSPECTED OF WAR CRIMES, AND IT IS APPROPRIATE FOR US TO USE MILITARY COMMISSIONS TO TRY THEM.

-- SINCE THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR, THE UNITED STATES HAS USED MILITARY COMMISSIONS TO PROSECUTE ENEMY COMBATANTS FOR LAW OF WAR VIOLATIONS. MANY OTHER COUNTRIES THROUGHOUT HISTORY HAVE EMPLOYED MILITARY COMMISSIONS AS WELL, INCLUDING EUROPEAN NATIONS. EACH ACCUSED TRIED BY A MILITARY COMMISSION AT GUANTANAMO HAS THE FOLLOWING PROCEDURAL SAFEGUARDS: THE PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE; PROOF OF GUILT MUST BE BEYOND A REASONABLE DOUBT; THE RIGHT TO CALL AND CROSS-EXAMINE WITNESSES (SUBJECT TO THE RULES REGARDING PRODUCTION OF WITNESSES AND PROTECTION OF INFORMATION); NOTHING SAID BY AN ACCUSED TO HIS ATTORNEY, OR ANYTHING DERIVED THEREFROM, MAY BE USED AGAINST HIM AT TRIAL; NO ADVERSE INFERENCE FOR REMAINING SILENT; RIGHT TO APPEAL; OVERALL REQUIREMENT THAT ANY MILITARY COMMISSION PROCEEDING BE FULL AND FAIR. FINALLY, TO ASSIST HIM IN PREPARING A DEFENSE, EACH ACCUSED HAS A MILITARY DEFENSE COUNSEL PROVIDED AT NO COST. ALTERNATIVELY, THE ACCUSED MAY ALSO HIRE A CIVILIAN DEFENSE COUNSEL.

-- THE RULES OF EVIDENCE AND PROCEDURE ESTABLISHED FOR TRIALS BY MILITARY COMMISSION COMPARE FAVORABLY TO THOSE BEING USED IN THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL TRIBUNAL FOR RWANDA AND THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL TRIBUNAL FOR THE FORMER YUGOSLAVIA.

-- THE DETAINEE TREATMENT ACT OF 2005 PERMITS AN AMERICAN DOMESTIC CIVILIAN COURT-THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT-TO HEAR A DIRECT APPEAL OF A MILITARY COMMISSION DECISION.

-- TO DATE, THE PRESIDENT HAS DETERMINED THAT THERE ARE REASONS TO BELIEVE THAT SEVENTEEN DETAINEES MAY HAVE COMMITTED WAR CRIMES. THE APPOINTING AUTHORITY FOR

MILITARY COMMISSIONS HAS APPROVED CHARGES AGAINST TEN

INDIVIDUALS AND REFERRED THESE CHARGES TO MILITARY COMMISSIONS FOR TRIAL. PRELIMINARY PROCEEDINGS HAVE BEGUN IN SIX CASES.

---

5. RENDITIONS TALKING POINTS

-- THE UNITED STATES AND MANY OTHER GOVERNMENTS ARE ENGAGED IN A DIFFICULT STRUGGLE AGAINST A RUTHLESS ENEMY, TRANSNATIONAL TERRORISTS.

-- ALL GOVERNMENTS HAVE A RESPONSIBILITY TO PROTECT THEIR CITIZENS FROM HARM. THE UNITED STATES WORKS COOPERATIVELY WITH STATES AROUND THE WORLD TO ACHIEVE THIS OBJECTIVE.

-- WE ARE WORKING TOGETHER CLOSELY WITH ALLIES AND PARTNERS IN EUROPE AND GLOBALLY TO PROTECT OUR CITIZENS AGAINST A VICIOUS TERRORIST ADVERSARY.

-- THE WAR ON TERRORISM SOMETIMES INVOLVES THE CAPTURE, DETENTION AND QUESTIONING OF TERRORISTS. WE MUST QUESTION THEM TO GATHER SIGNIFICANT, POTENTIALLY LIFE-SAVING INTELLIGENCE.

-- OUR LAW ENFORCEMENT AND INTELLIGENCE COOPERATION HAS RESULTED IN FOILING A NUMBER OF DEADLY PLOTS AGAINST CITIES AND CITIZENS IN EUROPE AND ELSEWHERE.

-- AS SECRETARY RICE AND CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY DIRECTOR GOSS HAVE RECENTLY STATED, U.S. INTELLIGENCE AGENCIES HAVE HANDLED THE GATHERING OF INTELLIGENCE FROM A VERY SMALL NUMBER OF EXTREMELY DANGEROUS DETAINEES, INCLUDING INDIVIDUALS WHO PLANNED THE 9/11 ATTACKS.

-- UNITED STATES PERSONNEL ARE REQUIRED TO TREAT DETAINEES CONSISTENT WITH U.S. LAW AND TREATY OBLIGATIONS, INCLUDING A PROHIBITION ON TORTURE AND A PROHIBITION ON CRUEL, INHUMAN, OR DEGRADING TREATMENT.

-- WE WILL NOT CONFIRM OR DENY SPECIFIC INTELLIGENCE ACTIVITIES; WE CANNOT DISCUSS INFORMATION THAT COULD COMPROMISE THE SUCCESS OF INTELLIGENCE, LAW ENFORCEMENT, AND MILITARY OPERATIONS.

-- NO ONE SHOULD BE SURPRISED THAT INTELLIGENCE AGENCIES, BOTH IN AMERICA AND AROUND THE WORLD, ENGAGE IN INTELLIGENCE GATHERING ACTIVITIES.

-- WITH RESPECT TO THOSE DETAINED BY THE UNITED STATES IN THE WAR ON TERRORISM, THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT COMPLIES WITH ITS CONSTITUTION, ITS LAWS AND ITS TREATY OBLIGATIONS. THE UNITED STATES DOES NOT COMMIT, AUTHORIZE, OR CONDONE TORTURE.

-- THE UNITED STATES DOES NOT TRANSPORT DETAINEES FROM ONE COUNTRY TO ANOTHER FOR THE PURPOSE OF INTERROGATION BY TORTURE AND HAS NOT USED THE AIRSPACE OR AIRPORTS OF ANY COUNTRY FOR THE PURPOSE OF TRANSPORTING A DETAINEE TO A COUNTRY WHERE HE WILL BE TORTURED.

-- THE UNITED STATES HAS NOT TRANSPORTED ANYONE, AND WILL NOT TRANSPORT ANYONE, TO A COUNTRY WHERE WE BELIEVE THE PRISONER WILL BE TORTURED. WHERE APPROPRIATE, THE UNITED STATES SEEKS ASSURANCES THAT TRANSFERRED PERSONS WILL NOT BE TORTURED.

-- IN CONDUCTING RENDITIONS, THIS ADMINISTRATION HAS

RESPECTED AND WILL CONTINUE TO RESPECT THE SOVEREIGNTY OF OTHER COUNTRIES.

MINIMIZE CONSIDERED.

Contact: Brian Roehrkasse, Deputy Director, Office of Public Affairs (202) 514-2007

THE WEEKEND'S EXPECTED NEWS STORIES:

Briefs filed in Al Odah v. U.S and Boumediene v. Bush (OPA)
The U.S. filed a supplemental brief in the Al Odah and Boumediene detainee cases today in U.S. Circuit Court for Washington D.C. The brief argues that under the Detainee Treatment Act the detainee habeas case should be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.

Justice Department Announces Minnesota U.S. Attorney (OPA)
The Justice Department today announced the appointment of Rachel K. Paulose to serve as the United States Attorney for the District of Minnesota. Ms. Paulose will serve under an Attorney General Appointment. She will succeed Thomas B. Heffelfinger, who will resign from the position on February 28, 2006.

DEA Intelligence Division Designated 16th Member of Intelligence Community (DEA)
The Director of National Intelligence, John D. Negroponte, and the Attorney General, Alberto R. Gonzales announced the designation of the Office of National Security Intelligence, an element in the Drug Enforcement Administration's Intelligence Division, as the 16th member of the Intelligence Community.

Talking Points:

- The Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) has a long history of partnering with the Intelligence Community for purposes of identifying and disrupting illegal drug trafficking.

- This partnership has been successful in both the sharing of vital information and the leveraging of expertise.

- This designation does not grant DEA new authorities, but it does formalize the long-standing relationship between the DEA and the IC."

MONDAY/TUESDAY's EXPECTED EVENTS/RELEASES:

The Attorney General and Secretary Gale Norton will make remarks at the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church National Landmark Designation Ceremony on Monday, February 20, 2006 at 10:30 A.M. CST. The Attorney General and Secretary Norton will make remarks which will be followed by a brief media availability.

The Tax Division will tentatively have two releases for Tuesday.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Administration Seeks To Build Hill Support For NSA Wiretapping Program. The New York Times (2/20, Stolberg, Sanger, 1.19M) reports, "After two months of insisting that President Bush did not need court approval to authorize the wiretapping of calls between the United States and suspected terrorists abroad, the administration is trying to resist pressure for judicial review while pushing for retroactive Congressional approval of the program." The Administration "opened negotiations with Congress last week, but it is far from clear whether Mr. Bush will be able to fend off calls from Democrats and some Republicans for increased oversight of the eavesdropping program, which is run by the National Security Agency."

The Washington Post (2/20, A8, Babington, 744K) reports, "At two key moments in recent days, White House officials contacted congressional leaders just ahead of intelligence committee meetings that could have stirred demands for a deeper review of the administration's warrantless-surveillance program, according to House and Senate sources." In both cases, "the administration was spared the outcome it most feared, and it won praise in some circles for showing more openness to congressional oversight." But "the actions have angered some lawmakers who think the administration's purported concessions mean little. Some Republicans said that the White House came closer to suffering a big setback than is widely known, and that President Bush must be more forthcoming about the eavesdropping program to retain Congress's good will."

The AP (2/20, Riechmann) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, "standing firmly with the White House on the administration's eavesdropping program, said Sunday he doesn't think new or updated legislation is needed to govern domestic surveillance to foil terrorists. 'I don't think that it does need to be rewritten, but we are holding hearings in the Judiciary Committee right now,' Frist said on CBS' 'Face the Nation.'" Frist also "said he didn't think a court order is needed before eavesdropping, under the program, occurs." Meanwhile, speaking on "Fox News Sunday," Sen. Lindsey Graham "said there is bipartisan consensus on Congress to make FISA, which was written in the 1970s, more flexible, establish more congressional oversight into such surveillance and preserve judicial review, or the need for a warrant in certain cases." USA Today (2/20, 2.31M) also runs a brief report on Graham's comments.

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (2/20, Waterman, 90K) reports, "Another House Republican committee chairman has joined criticism of the Congressional Research Service for its legal analysis of the administration's program of counterterrorist electronic surveillance." Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican and chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, "wrote to the service's director, Daniel P. Mulhollan, earlier this month." In the letter, Sensenbrenner "says he asked two legal scholars to review the 44-page Jan. 5 CRS memorandum on the surveillance program -- which analyzed the administration's legal rationale for the program as laid out at that time and found it wanting."

White House Board On Civil Liberties Has Not Met. The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Schmitt, 958K) reports on "a little-known board" at the White House whose purpose is to "ensure that privacy and civil liberties are protected in the fight against terrorism." The board was created by the intelligence overhaul that President Bush signed into law in December 2004. But, more than a year later, the board "exists only on paper." The Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday "took a first step toward standing up the fledgling watchdog, approving the two lawyers Bush nominated to lead the panel. But it may take months before the board is up and running and doing much serious work. Critics say the inaction shows the administration is just going through the motions when it comes to civil liberties."

Specter Drafting Bill To Curtail Bush Surveillance Powers. The Washington Times (2/21, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter is drafting legislation to curtail President Bush's warrantless surveillance program that the president touts as a tool to stop and capture terrorists." Senate Select Committee on Intelligence Chairman Pat Roberts "said last week that the White House had reached an 'agreement in principle' with congressional leaders to include more lawmakers in the oversight of the program." But Specter's bill "would go further." He "wants to place the entire program under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) court, which is responsible for granting warrants for domestic surveillance in pursuit of foreign intelligence. He also has suggested that the program should expire without express congressional approval every 45 days."

Passaro Trial Could Shed Light On Detainee Tactics. The Miami Herald (2/21, Weaver) reports, "Abdul Wali was an Afghan man who U.S. authorities suspect launched rocket attacks against a military base in Afghanistan. David Passaro was an American hired by the CIA to interrogate detainees during the U.S. war in that country." The Herald continues, "On June 21, 2003 -- three days after surrendering to military authorities -- Wali was found dead inside a U.S. detention facility in Asadabad, near the Pakistani border. … Today, Passaro, a former CIA contract worker, stands accused of beating Wali so badly with a flashlight that he eventually died. Passaro, who faces up to 40 years in prison, is the first U.S. civilian to be charged in federal court with mistreatment of a prisoner overseas." The Herald adds, "Heading the government's case against Passaro is Michael 'Pat' Sullivan, a veteran Miami federal prosecutor. … For Sullivan, a hardened trial lawyer known for taking down major drug defendants, the Passaro case puts him on an international stage. He has the delicate job of defending the Bush administration's controversial detainee interrogation policy while prosecuting an alleged criminal affiliated with the CIA. … Passaro's indictment on four assault charges was announced with fanfare by Attorney General John Ashcroft in Washington on June 17, 2004. … The North Carolina man was indicted just weeks after pictures were broadcast worldwide that showed U.S. soldiers smiling and joking at Iraqi prisoners at Abu Ghraib near Bagdhad, who had been stripped naked, tortured and humiliated, purportedly to extract intelligence from them. Several male and female U.S. soldiers have since been convicted on charges of prisoner mistreatment at courts-martial."

9/11 Panel Aides Did Not Believe Cheney's Testimony. Newsweek (2/27, Thomas) reports in its cover story that Vice President Dick Cheney testified to the 9/11 Commission that on the morning of the attacks he spoke with President Bush before giving an order to shoot down a hijacked airliner that appeared headed toward Washington. A source "close to the commission…says that none of the staffers who worked on this aspect of the investigation believed Cheney's version of events. A draft of the report conveyed their skepticism." But the report was toned down after a "prolonged battle" with top White House officials, including chief of staff Andrew Card and then White House counsel Alberto Gonzales." Newsweek adds, "The factual narrative, closely read, offers no evidence that Cheney sought initial authorization from the president. … Legally, Cheney was required to get permission from his commander in chief, who was traveling (but reachable) at the time."

Hughes Calls Abu Ghraib Abuse An Aberration. The AP (2/19, Sukhtian) reports Under Secretary Hughes, in an Al-Arabiya interview given on arrival in Dubai Sunday, said "abuse of prisoners in Iraq was a crime and did not reflect US policies in the Middle East." Alluding to the Abu Ghraib photo controversy, Hughes "said the US should not be judged by the actions of a few." Last week in Doha, the AP said, Hughes "spoke out…against caricatures of the Prophet Mohammed that have sparked protests across the Muslim world but she condemned the violence that has broken out during demonstrations, leaving at least 45 people dead." In Sunday's interview, she "accused extremists of using the cartoon controversy to ignite a clash of civilizations." AP's coverage of the Al-Arabiya interview was the first significant U.S. press mention of Hughes' Middle East trip.

Hughes Defends Guantanamo Conditions, Calls Detainees "Warriors." The AP (2/20, Fam) reported on an interview Under Secretary Hughes gave to Al-Jazeera in which she "defended the conditions at the prison at Guantanamo Bay and said the detainees were not criminals, but warriors." Hughes "said the about 490 prisoners held in Guantanamo were arrested for waging a war against the United States or for helping al-Qaida or the Taliban in their wars." The AP said Hughes claimed the United Nations report condemning conditions and practices at the facility "was written by people who did not visit Guantanamo," and said Hughes defended the treatment of detainees there. Those detainees "were people who have made public their intention to kill as many Americans as possible and that the U.S. government had a right to defend its citizens. She added that some of those released from Guantanamo have immediately gone back to fighting and killing Americans."

ABC World News Tonight (2/20, story 4, Vargas) reported "television viewers in the Arab world are hearing a message from the United States. It comes in the person of Karen Hughes, President Bush's long-time close adviser," who is in the Middle East "to win hearts and minds." ABC said Hughes "believes a better relationship with the Arab media power house is critical to improving the US image," and called her "conciliatory" and her audiences "skeptical." Hughes was shown saying audiences "don't understand the reason behind the policy, in some cases." ABC reported, "But part of the problem, of course, is even when people in the Middle East hear the rationale or even understand it, it doesn't go very far. Most of her intended audience doesn't agree with it."

Carter Agrees With UN Report On Guantanamo Prison. Former President Jimmy Carter was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (2/20) if he agrees with a UN report which urges the US to shut down the prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba as quickly as possible. Carter said, "I've agreed with that since we first found out that torture and oppression was being perpetrated against the prisons at Guantanamo Bay." Carter added that "the best thing that the United States can do for our own reputation and for justice in the world and for the honoring of human rights is to shut down Guantanamo Bay prison, as was recommended by the United Nations."

More Commentary On UN Report. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.11M) editorializes, "We won't waste your time on the study itself, which largely rehashes factual and legal allegations we've seen and rebutted before, and whose authors never actually visited Guantanamo. … A more interesting question is why this report was produced in the first place: We are still waiting for the Commission's reports on the human-rights picture in, say, Syria. But there's no mystery here, since the only purpose the Commission actually serves is to deflect criticism of actual human-rights abusers by heaping invective on the US and Israel."

Navy General Counsel Opposed Policy On Torture. The New York Times (2/20, Golden, 1.19M) reports, "One of the Pentagon's top civilian lawyers repeatedly challenged the Bush administration's policy on the coercive interrogation of terror suspects, arguing that such practices violated the law, verged on torture and could ultimately expose senior officials to prosecution, a newly disclosed document shows." The lawyer, Alberto J. Mora, "a Republican appointee who retired last month after more than four years as general counsel of the Navy, was one of many dissenters inside the Pentagon." The Washington Post/AP (2/20, A3) runs a similar report.

More Commentary On Torture Issue. Gerald L. Zelizer, rabbi of Neve Shalom and a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors, writes in USA Today (2/20, 2.31M), "The conversion that many religions have undergone in upgrading their moral stance on torture can be instructive to governments such as our own." Torture "degrades the victim, but it also degrades the society condoning it. Rationales such as the greater good or self-defense are slippery slopes. The definition of self-defense becomes looser and looser, and the greater good more arbitrary."

Columnist Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (2/20, 1.19M), "Terrible things were done to Maher Arar, and his extreme suffering was set in motion by the United States government. With the awful facts of his case carefully documented, he tried to sue for damages. But last week a federal judge waved the facts aside and told Mr. Arar, in effect, to get lost. … If kidnapping and torturing an innocent man is O.K., what's not O.K.?"

Treasury Department Freezes Assets Of Islamic Charity. The Washington Post/AP (2/20, A5) reports, "The Treasury Department ordered U.S. banks to freeze assets of an Ohio-based group that the government says funnels money to the militant organization Hamas." The organization, KindHearts of Toledo, "was connected with the Hamas-affiliated Holy Land Foundation and the al Qaeda-affiliated Global Relief Foundation, the Treasury Department said yesterday."

Supporters Rally For Al Arian's Release From Jail. The St. Petersburg Times (2/20, Gershman) reports that on Sunday outside the Hillsborough County jail, over a hundred supporters of Sami al Arian protested his ongoing confinement after his acquittal "on eight of 17 charges related to financing and promoting Middle East terrorism." Civil rights advocates visited al Arian the jail and addressed the crowd, some of whom "held signs with messages such as 'McCarthyism Is Alive And Well In Tampa, FL' and 'If They Won't Free Him, What Was The Trial For?'"

Al Arian Says Ongoing "Persecution" Ignores Will Of Jury. In an interview with the University of South Florida Oracle (2/20, Blackburn), Sami al Arian denounced his continued incarceration saying, "They still want to spend the taxpayers' money and continue this persecution without any regard to what the jurors said and observed and commented. I'm disappointed in that, had I not been a Palestinian and a Muslim and an Arab, things would have been extremely different."

Germany Investigating Its Possible Role In Rendition. The New York Times (2/21, Van Natta, 1.19M) reports, "For more than a year, the German government has criticized the United States for its role in the abduction of a German man who was taken to an American prison in Kabul, Afghanistan, where he said he was held and tortured for five months after being mistaken for a terrorism suspect." German officials "said they knew nothing about the man's abduction," but yesterday "in Neu-Ulm near Munich, the police and prosecutors opened an investigation into whether Germany served as a silent partner of the United States in the abduction of the man, Khaled el-Masri, a German citizen of Arab descent who was arrested Dec. 31, 2003, in Macedonia before being flown to the Kabul prison."

Senior Al Qaeda Operative Profiled. The Washington Post (2/20, A1, Vick, 744K) reports on Louai Sakka, "a senior operative for al Qaeda and intimately linked to major terrorist plots in Turkey, Jordan and Iraq, where he had worked beside Abu Musab Zarqawi, a longtime confederate." He "showed up in Antalya last summer with tens of thousands of dollars in cash and a face altered by plastic surgery. After his arrest, he told investigators he had planned to die steering a yacht laden with explosives into a cruise ship he believed was filled with U.S. soldiers and which was already approaching across the turquoise Mediterranean." Sakka "played a role in the so-called millennium plot to attack hotels in Amman, Jordan, on Dec. 31, 1999." Turkish prosecutors also "describe him as the planner of the 2003 truck bombings that killed 57 people in Istanbul, financed with $160,000 in al Qaeda funds."

Report Examines Al Qaeda Employment Contract. Time (2/27) reports in its "Notebook" column on a report from the Combating Terrorism Center at West Point, which analyzes 29 al-Qaeda documents. Among the documents "is an employment contract that outlines for potential recruits the need for loyalty concerning 'legitimate duties like jihad' and also details such matters as vacation time (five days a month for bachelors), salary (700 rupees extra for every wife) -- even sick days. Is the document authentic? The Department of Defense and West Point have studied it carefully and believe it is."

CIA Intelligence Analysis Said To Be Politicized. In a Los Angeles Times op-ed (2/21), Danielle Pletka, vice president of foreign and defense policy studies at the American Enterprise Institute, comments on the volume of commentary on "how the Bush administration ignored internal predictions of post-war instability, terrorism and rising Islamism in Iraq. Intelligence, critics argue, was 'cherry-picked' to bolster the argument for war. What much of the public doesn't realize is that the CIA's Monday-morning quarterbacks, who originated many of the complaints, are themselves handpicking intelligence to boost their antiwar cause." The American people "should be certain that their democratically elected leaders are making decisions based on unbiased intelligence. They won't get that from today's CIA."

PATRIOT ACT:

Concerns About Privacy Drive Patriot Act Debate. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (2/21, Gibson) reports, "While police groups in Florida urge swift congressional renewal of the USA Patriot Act, some peace advocates have joined critics across the country who say the anti-terrorism law abuses civil liberties and stifles dissent." The Sun-Sentinel continues, "The Senate swept aside a filibuster attempt last week to clear the way for passage of the act, probably on March 1. The House is expected to add its approval quickly." The Sun-Sentinel adds, "Recent disclosures of domestic eavesdropping have clouded the debate over the Patriot Act. Forged in the fearful aftermath of the 2001 terrorist attacks, the act has become a test of how to secure the nation while preserving individual liberties. … 'I hope whatever they [members of Congress] pass is a good balance been privacy and public safety,' said David Murrell, executive director of the Florida Police Benevolent Association in Tallahassee, one of several police groups that support renewal of the act. … 'We are still a democratic society and should not operate like a totalitarian government. Maybe it [the original act] did go too far, as far as individual liberties and the right to privacy is concerned. But we all know it's a new world. Threats are out there, and things like the Patriot Act are needed to address a new situation.'" The Sun-Sentinel notes, "Some dissenting groups in Florida are convinced that government agents have infiltrated and spied upon them. The groups contend that the act reflects a pattern of repression designed to intimidate critics of the Bush administration. … 'I don't think the Patriot Act has protected us at all. It has circumvented our civil rights and made it more dangerous to be an American citizen because of your politics,' said Richard Hersh of Boca Raton, leader of The Truth Project Inc., a Palm Beach County group that tries to counter military recruitment in high schools. 'Spies can go in anywhere and report back to a highly politicized government about the activities of citizens when they are simply exercising their constitutional rights.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

White House Criticized Over Handling Of Port Management Company Sale To UAE Firm. The Administration is taking criticism from members of both parties for its handling of the proposed $6.8 billion sale of the firm that manages six US ports to Dubai Ports World, a firm controlled by the government of the United Arab Emirates. The story was the lead on ABC and CBS, which prominently quoted Democratic Sens. Charles Schumer and Robert Menendez and Republican Rep. Peter King, opponents of the deal, and Sen. Joseph Lieberman, who cautioned against rejecting the deal simply because of the firm's Arab ownership. ABC World News Tonight (2/20, lead story, 2:50, Raddatz) reported the proposed sale said has generated a "political firestorm," even though a "task force from 12 US agencies, including the Department of Defense, the FBI, and the Coast Guard, approved the $6.8 billion deal." Some "members of Congress say if the Administration does not listen to their concerns, they will try to have this contract frozen."

NBC Nightly News (2/20, lead story, 2:30, Williams) reported, "The Bush White House is being asked to reconsider its decision" that would allow the sale to Dubai Ports World. NBC (P. Williams) added Democratic Sens. Charles Schumer and Robert Menendez "now say it should be illegal to do what the Bush Administration has done, allow a company based in and controlled by the government of the UAE, the United Arab Emirates." The US "now considers" UAE "an ally in the war on terror, but those in Congress who oppose the deal note that some of the money for the 9/11 hijackers went through UAE banks and two of the hijackers were from there."

The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 4, 0:35, Schieffer) reported "there has been a storm of protests," and Sens. Hillary Clinton and Robert Menendez "said they will introduce legislation to bar any foreign company from operating a US port facility." Sen. Robert Menendez was asked on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/20) about legislation he plans to offer with Sen. Hillary Clinton to block the deal. Menendez said, "First and foremost, we want the President to say no to this deal. We have only to March 2nd, and that gives us 10 days. And the president can actually obviate this deal, and I think he should. And if he fails to do so, what our legislation will basically stand for the principle that the ports of the United States should not be in the control and operation of a foreign government."

Menendez said on MSNBC's Countdown with Keith Olberman (2/20), "This is a foreign government that owns this company, not a private company. … And in this particular case, the United Arab Emirates has a history that we should be concerned about, two of the hijackers on September 11th came from there. … This is the country that the 9/11 commission said was a fountain of resources for Al Qaeda. And lastly, and probably the most concerning, when we think about the issue of the port, this is the country in which the Pakistani scientist actually smuggled elements of nuclear components to Libya, to North Korea, and to Iran. If they can't do a good job in their own country, of making sure that there was security so it wouldn't become a transit point, why should we let them operate the ports of the United States?"

CNN's The Situation Room (2/20, Blitzer) reported that the Bush Administration is defending a deal to give a company based in the United Arab Emirates management of six major ports in the US. The Administration says the deal "was thoroughly vetted and that the UAE is a key ally in the war on terror." CNN (Henry) added that House Homeland Security committee chairman Peter Hoekstra is urging President Bush to block the deal. Fox News' Special Report (2/20, Garrett) reported that the company "would not provide security at any US port. That job is still in the hands of the Coast Guard, Customs and Homeland Security. The port employees will remain American long shore men, just as they were under the British operating contract. Even so, security questions persist."

USA Today (2/21, 2.31M) reports Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "defended on Monday the Bush administration's decision to allow an Arab company to take over operations at six major U.S. ports." But "two Republican governors questioned the decision and said they may try to cancel lease arrangements at ports in their states." New York Gov. George Pataki and Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich "expressed doubts about the acquisition of a British company, Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co., which has been running the US ports, by Dubai Ports World." Gonzales "said the administration has a 'very extensive process' for approving such deals." The Baltimore Sun (2/21, Cohn, Shaw, 296K) runs a story titled "Ehrlich Objects To Port Deal," and the Washington Times (2/21, Miller, Ward, 90K) also focuses on the governor's comments. The New York Times (2/21, Kirkpatrick, McGeehan, 1.19M), meanwhile, titles its report on the port issue "Pataki Joins Opposition To Takeover Of Ports."

Ridge Says There Should Be More Transparency About Port Deal. CNN's The Situation Room (2/20, Henry) added, "Republican Tom Ridge, Chertoff's predecessor told CNN there needs to be more transparency about the deal, but said he has confidence in his former Bush colleagues."

Local Officials Say Port Security Inadequate. ABC World News Tonight (2/20, story 2, 2:10, Thomas) reported, "Some local officials believe the government is not doing nearly enough to upgrade port security. Baltimore's Mayor wants more surveillance cameras and much wider use of technology to scan for weapons." Mayor Martin O'Malley: "I think it's appalling that the wealthiest nation on the planet would invest so little in port security." Thomas: "Since 9/11, the US has spent $18 billion improving aviation security. Over the same time frame, according to one congressional study, the US spent roughly $560 million to help cities secure sea ports. But some security analysts question whether throwing more money at the nation's ports will really make us safer."

Passage Of UK-Style Official Secrets Act Seen As Unlikely. Newsweek (2/27) reports in its "Periscope" column that in the wake of press disclosures about the NSA domestic surveillance program and CIA antiterror operations, there has been renewed talk "about the need for an American version of Britain's Official Secrets Act." House intelligence committee chairman Pete Hoekstra has called for a "'comprehensive law' to make it easier to prosecute leakers, and last week his Senate counterpart, Pat Roberts, said he, too, thinks new measures may be considered." Newsweek adds, "One key Capitol Hill official, who asked not to be identified because of political sensitivities, suggested the legislation was not likely to get much traction soon, at least in the Senate."

"Real ID" Said To Have Potential To "Empower" Citizens. Douglas McGray, a fellow at the New America Foundation, in an op-ed in the New York Times (2/21, McGray, 1.19M) writes, "As states get ready to comply with a law passed last May and roll out Real ID's…, it might be time to consider a national identification card." Though camps at either extreme of the argument currently "own the conversation," those in the middle "should find the idea of a national ID appealing." McGray goes on to say that a national ID could have positive effects in the areas of health care, voter empowerment, poverty, education, social welfare and immigration. Privacy concerns "are huge," however, the notion of a national ID created to empower citizens, rather than just monitor us and protect us from foreigners, might inspire progressives and centrists to design a card that works."

Energy Department Downgrading Intelligence Unit. The Washington Times (2/21, Gertz, 90K) reports, "The Energy Department is downgrading its counterintelligence unit in what officials say is a 'hostile takeover' by the intelligence office." Bush administration "officials say the reorganization is part of a plan led by Deputy Energy Secretary Clay Sell, a former Senate staff member. 'This [consolidation] is ostensibly for better efficiencies,' said one official who opposes the move. 'But counterintelligence will be less effective and less of a defensive program.'" The Times adds, "A second official said the counterintelligence office consolidation is part of a 'hostile takeover by Rolf Mowatt-Larssen,' head of Energy's intelligence office."

Lawmakers Call For Overhaul OF FEMA. Lawmakers yesterday called for an overhaul of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Speaking on ABC's "This Week," Sen. Joe Lieberman said FEMA should be replaced with something "better, stronger within DHS to take its place." Rep. Tom Davis, appearing on the same program, said FEMA should become a Cabinet department. Meanwhile, the AP (2/19, Daniel) reported that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff yesterday "warned against overhauling FEMA with hurricane season only three months away."

Reuters (2/20, Ahmann) also notes the differences in Lieberman and Davis' approaches. While Davis believes the agency should be pulled out of the Department of Homeland Security, Lieberman argues "that since Congress had given the Homeland Security Department statutory authority over both terror attacks and natural disasters, creating a free-standing FEMA would be the wrong way to go."

The Washington Times (2/20, Hudson, 90K) reports that Chertoff "says any tinkering this close to the storm season -- predicted by weather forecasters to be as severe as last year's -- would be a 'big mistake.'" Chertoff said on NBC's Meet the Press, "If FEMA is pulled out of the Department of Homeland Security, I will predict with virtual certainty that we will be much less prepared this hurricane season than we will be if we keep the department together and finish the job of integrating it."

The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Hook, 958K) reports, "Separating FEMA from the Homeland Security Department would remove a major function from the department, whose creation had been a cornerstone of President Bush's response to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. The department, which brought together the activities of 22 disparate agencies with more than 170,000 employees, was intended to centralize the government's programs involved in fighting terrorism and responding to natural disasters."

Chertoff Warns Against Removing FEMA From DHS. DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff was asked on NBC's Meet the Press (2/19, Russert) if he supports separating FEMA from DHS, Chertoff responded, "I think the last thing we want to do is to have a situation where we have two parallel agencies fighting over who manages a particular type of a disaster. … If FEMA is pulled out of the Department of Homeland Security, I will predict with virtual certainty that we will be much less prepared this hurricane season than we will be if we keep the department together and finish the job of integrating it."

NBC Nightly News (2/19, story 3, 1:55, Jordan) reported that Rep. Tom Davis says it is "time to pull FEMA out of the Department of Homeland Security," but Secretary Chertoff "rejected that assessment and said the country is better-prepared with FEMA inside DHS." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, from NBC's "Meet the Press": "I think the last thing that we want to do is to have a situation where we have two parallel agencies fighting over who manages a particular type of a disaster."

Lieberman Advocates Eliminating FEMA "As We Know It." Asked on ABC's This Week (2/19, Stephanopoulos) if he thinks FEMA ought to be "pulled out" of DHS "and made Cabinet status again," Sen. Joseph Lieberman said, "I believe that it's time for FEMA as we know it to go. … The fact is it's an emergency management administration but it's represented emergency mismanagement. I think it's time to dissolve it and rebuild it within the Department of Homeland Security because, to take it outside, would be to make a redundant organization."

Davis Suggests Establishing FEMA Outside Of DHS. Rep. Tom Davis, on ABC's This Week (2/19, Stephanopoulos), said, "I think FEMA has to be reorganized. I'm not sure it should stay in the Department of Homeland Security for this reason. They are competing for dollars. … I think they've got to be, just there at the right arm of the White House during any crisis."

Bush Names Chertoff Point Person To Work With Mexico On Border Violence. Reuters (2/21) reports, "US President George W. Bush named Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff as the US point person to work with Mexican officials to clamp down on increasing violence along the US-Mexican border, the White House said on Monday." During a phone call between Bush and Mexican President Vicente Fox, in which White House spokesman Scott McClellan said the leaders "talked about…increased border violence and…the importance of working together to improve our border security and stop the violence," it was decided that each government would "pick a high-level contact within each government to work together on the issue and Bush tapped Chertoff for the role." The AP (2/21) reports McClellan also said "Bush and Fox also talked about pending immigration legislation in Congress."

The Washington Times (2/21, Dinan, Seper, 90K) adds, "Concern over border violence is growing as violent encounters in Mexico increase, spreading rapidly throughout northern Mexico from the lawless confines of Nuevo Laredo, which lies across the Rio Grande from Laredo, Texas." Meanwhile, "there have been more than 200 assaults on US agents in the Tucson sector alone, and the Border Patrol has warned agents in Arizona of incursions by men dressed in Mexican military uniforms."

Success Of Expedited Removal Said To Depend On Word Of Mouth. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, B1, Jordan, 2.11M) tells the story of Isabel Guzman, who, "after three weeks in a detention center in the Arizona desert," was escorted "onto an MD-80 in Mesa, Ariz., bound for Guatemala City." Her "speedy repatriation is part of a new effort by the US government to cut the red tape in deportations of illegal border-crossers." The success of the expedited removal policy "depends on getting deportees to spread the message back home that the rules have changed, and that a failed border crossing will result in rapid eviction from the US." However, "anecdotal evidence and recent history suggest that no matter how risky, or costly, attempted illegal border crossings may be, economic incentives are often too powerful to dissuade people like Ms. Guzman from trying again."

Katrina Reports Spur Speculation Chertoff Could Lose His Job. U.S. News and World Report's (2/27, Marek) cover package examinees the federal response to Hurricane Katrina. A report released last week "from the Republican-dominated House committee that's been examining Washington's star-crossed response to Katrina," called the federal response a "litany of mistakes, misjudgments, lapses, and absurdities." US News adds, "More tough reviews are in the offing. Two major reports on Katrina failures -- one from a Senate committee and another from White House homeland security adviser Frances Townsend-- are due out in the next few weeks. And the Government Accountability Office…has promised its own assessment. The atmosphere has many in Washington wondering whether Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff…can save his job." Newsweek (2/27, Hosenball) examines e-mails provide to Congress by former FEMA Director Michael Brown. Brown "told NEWSWEEK he was frustrated because Chertoff tried to micromanage the disaster. 'I couldn't do my job,' he said. (Neither Chertoff nor the White House responded to requests for comment.)"

Official Says Levee System Will Be "Back To Where It Was." Also in its cover package, U.S. News and World Report (2/27, Hayden) reports that as this year's hurricane season approaches, "residents of New Orleans can be forgiven for wondering if their city's battered defenses will be ready should another killer storm hit." Walter Baumy, deputy director of Task Force Guardian, the Army Corps's $770 million program to repair the region's flood-protection system is charged with getting the system "back to where it was when Katrina rumbled through. Making New Orleans safer than before, well, that's another story. The decisions there will ultimately be made by Congress and carried out by the corps--which will issue a report on the subject by June."

New Orleans Recovery Efforts Examined. Also as part of its cover package this week, U.S. News and World Report (2/27) examines New Orleans' "heroic efforts to climb back out of the abyss" in Katrina's wake. A separate story in U.S. News and World Report's (2/27, Mulrine) cover package notes that "failure, or at least the distinct possibility of it, is very much a presence in this city's fetid streets and flood-damaged homes. … But spend some time talking with those to whom the real challenge of rebuilding will fall…and defeat seems a chimera, far from a given." A separate story in U.S. News and World Report's (2/27, Schulte) cover package on plans to rebuild New Orleans. Plans from Mayor Ray Nagin's Bring New Orleans Back Commission have "run headlong into the politics of race, class, and power, which, as in most places, translates to money." The plan "faces a host of daunting questions -- questions about flood protection, about controlling scattershot redevelopment, and about Washington's willingness to foot the bill to bring back the Big Easy. For now, all that seems certain is that the New Orleans of tomorrow will be smaller in size and population, most likely a whiter, wealthier city." Another story in U.S. News and World Report's (2/27, Tolson) cover package reports on fears that New Orleans will become a theme park "stripped of its low-lying, mostly poor, mostly black neighborhoods and reduced to a few tourist-enticing quarters like the Garden District or an even further Disneyfied Vieux Carre." US News' cover package also includes op-eds from noted New Orleans residents, musician Wynton Marsalis and chef Paul Prudhomme.

Blanco Proposes $7.5 Billion Katrina Rebuilding Plan. NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 8, 0:35, Williams) reported Gov. Kathleen Blanco has unveiled a "comprehensive rebuilding plan." The "$7.5 billion program would provide homeowners there with up to $150,000 each for repairs." While Gov. Blanco "says she expects to hear the sound of hammers in the not-too-distant future, the plan still has to be approved by state lawmakers and local officials and it will need money OK'd by Congress."

The New York Times (2/21, Nossiter, 1.19M) reports "Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco of Louisiana for the first time unveiled a real package of assistance on Monday, proposing to use federal money for loans and grants that aides said would spur rebuilding in devastated areas." New Orleans officials "said the state's $7.5 billion proposal, which offers up to $150,000 in grants to repair or rebuild, along with inexpensive loans, would not have been possible without the $4.2 billion in new money promised by President Bush last week, and $6.2 billion allocated last year." The plan "de-emphasized" buyouts, focusing on "a combination of cash, and low or no-interest loans with the purpose of encouraging repairing and rebuilding."

Barbour's Days As Lobbyist Seen As Boon For Post-Hurricane Mississippi. The New York Times (2/21, Dao, 1.19M) reports the "legendary" K Street reputation of former lobbyist Gov. Haley Barbour "has proved invaluable to…storm-rattled" Mississippi. Barbour said in an interview, "It is obvious that my experiences and relationships over the last 35 years helped me help the state at a time when it needed it more than ever." Meanwhile, though Democrats "commend Mr. Barbour's response to the hurricane, they say it seems stellar mainly compared with the often stumbling performance of officials in Louisiana, which suffered far more devastation."

Group To Aide Minority-Owned Businesses Affected By Katrina. The New York Times (2/21, Olson, 1.19M) describes the Katrina Urban Entrepreneur Partnership, which is to begin "this month, giving needy entrepreneurs intensive help to ensure that they get part of the cleanup and reconstruction work on the Gulf Coast. Concerns have been raised that minority-owned companies are not getting a fair share of the posthurricane business. … The foundation is renting office space in New Orleans, bringing in professional business coaches on a rotating basis and identifying federally certified minority enterprises — beginning with demolition, construction and rebuilding businesses — that can benefit from such assistance."

New Orleans Police Often Had To Choose Between Family, Duty. USA Today (2/21, Johnson, 2.31M) tells the story of Paul Schubert, a New Orleans police officer, who, having "his job just before Hurricane Katrina hit last August, and then not returning for four weeks," was fired. He "says he fled to Texas to save his disabled wife." His "case has come to represent the no-win situation that many officers faced when family and police obligations collided, says David Benelli, president of the Police Association of New Orleans, which represents about 1,100 of the department's 1,400 officers."

Senate Approves Expanded Relief For Hurricane Katrina Victims. The Senate last week passed a bill that would expand relief for Hurricane Katrina victims. CQ Weekly (2/20, Starks) reports, "The legislation (S 1777) would extend the limit on disaster unemployment benefits, to 39 weeks from 26 weeks, and would lengthen the period in which jobless workers could apply for assistance. … The bill is sponsored by Susan Collins, R-Maine, the chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee."

Engineers Say Corps Should Examine New Orleans Levee Oversight. An outside engineering group working with the Army Corps of Engineers says the Corps investigation into the flooding of New Orleans is overlooking organizational failures as a cause of the flooding. The New York Times (2/20, Schwartz, 1.19M) reports, "The corps is spending about $20 million to understand the physical causes of the levee breaches that left more than 75 percent of New Orleans flooded. But the engineering group said the corps should also be looking into 'discontinuity and chaos' in the creation and maintenance of the levees, according to a letter from the group to Lt. Gen. Carl A. Strock, the chief of the corps."

Smells Around New Orleans Noted. The Washington Post (2/20, C1, Weeks, 744K) reports that in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, New Orleans' air smelled of "flood sludge, refrigerator reekage and oil from cars and acid from batteries." Less than six months later, the floodwaters are gone and the air in much of the city is clear. In other areas, the smells "speak of New Orleans at the moment. From piles of debris along the sidewalks in the city and the suburbs rises a malodorous melange of fumes from sopping carpets, ancient linoleum, rancid bedclothes and abandoned appliances. … Some places smell the same as always: Tipitina's in Uptown is smoky, same as it ever was."

New Orleans Families Struggle To Return, Rebuild. The New York Times (2/20, Dewan, 1.19M) reports on the Baquets, a prominent New Orleans family displaced by Katrina. According to the Times, "As New Orleans struggles to pull its population back, even families with means like the Baquets, families who made New Orleans what it was, are struggling to return and rebuild."

Hard Hit Louisiana Parish Celebrates Mardi Gras. NBC Nightly News (2/19, story 4, 2:10, Williams) reported it is Mardi Gras season "in Louisiana and while it culminates in New Orleans a week from now, celebrations and parades are already underway. In one community, St. Bernard Parish, they celebrated today in front of crowds that were thin but thankful and determined to celebrate." NBC (Savidge) added, "Unlike other Mardi Gras parades that will march through the relatively unscathed French Quarter, this year's St. Bernard Parish parade partied through the rubble of its own neighborhoods, every home here, all 27,600 of them, flooded in water five-twelve feet deep. Before Katrina, 67,000 people lived in this predominantly blue collar area. Only 8,000 have come back."

Chertoff Says Katrina Failures Continue To Haunt Him. Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (2/19, Russert) if he has "considered stepping down," Chertoff replied, "When I took the job, I knew that we had a lot of work to do to mature the department. … I think my responsibility is to try to fix the department." Chertoff went on to say that the federal government's response to hurricane Katrina "does haunt me. … What does stick with me is the image of people who unnecessarily suffered because of delays in getting them evacuated. … I think we really fell short. And that's certainly something which I will always carry with me."

Chertoff Responds To Brown's Criticism. Asked on ABC's This Week (2/19, Stephanopoulos) to comment on criticism of him by former FEMA Director Michael Brown, Chertoff said, "I understand I removed Mike Brown. He's obviously not going to be happy with me. That's, kind of, human nature." Chertoff added that in the days after hurricane Katrina struck, "I couldn't get a hold of Michael Brown. He was flying around in a helicopter looking at damage; he was planning to go on Larry King or Rita Cosby."

Chertoff, on CNN's Late Edition (2/19, Blitzer), said, "I do want to respond to Mr. Brown's statement that I was wrong in making him go back to Baton Rouge. On Tuesday, he was flying around with politicians. He was doing interview shows. And the basic planning, which was getting buses to come into the Superdome and pick people up, had not been done."

WAR NEWS:

Lawmakers Said To Be "Chafing" At War Costs. The Christian Science Monitor (2/21, Chaddock, 61K) reports, "More than four years into the war on terror, Congress is chafing -- but not yet balking -- at a tab nearing $400 billion." President Bush's "latest emergency spending request, sent to Capitol Hill last week, includes $72.4 billion for the global war on terror. He also asked for another $19.8 billion for hurricane relief at home." The Monitor adds, "Few lawmakers care to risk not supporting US troops or first responders, making these must-pass bills. As such, they're attracting add-ons that lawmakers deem 'emergencies.' … Many Democrats plan to use the emergency spending request as a vehicle to address what they call urgent needs at home." The Monitor mentions comments along those lines by Democratic Sen. Patty Murray and Rep. David Obey.

Democratic Leaders Seen As Coalescing Around Plan For Quick Withdrawal From Iraq. The Boston Globe (2/20, Klein, 484K) reported, "After months of trying unsuccessfully to develop a common message on the war in Iraq, Democratic Party leaders are beginning to coalesce around a broad plan to begin a quick withdrawal of US troops and install them elsewhere in the region, where they could respond to emergencies in Iraq and help fight terrorism in other countries." The concept, dubbed "'strategic redeployment," is "outlined in a slim, nine-page report coauthored by a former Reagan administration assistant Defense secretary, Lawrence J. Korb, in the fall. It sets a goal of a phased troop withdrawal that would take nearly all US troops out of Iraq by the end of 2007, although many Democrats disagree on whether troop draw-downs should be tied to a timeline." Howard Dean, Democratic National Committee chairman, "has endorsed Korb's paper and begun mentioning it in meetings with local Democratic groups."

US Ambassador Warns Iraqi Shiites To Form Inclusive Government. US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad again expressed frustration with the majority Shiite coalition in Iraq for their failure to organize a government that includes minority Sunnis. Khalilzad suggested that US reconstruction aid may be withheld if the Shiites fail to appoint trustworthy leaders to head the nation's security forces, especially given reports of death squads targeting Sunnis.

The story was covered by CBS last night. The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 3, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "Iraqi politicians got an earful from the US Ambassador, who made it clear today that he is fed up with their failure to build a unified government for all Iraqis." CBS (Dozier) added Khalilzad sought to "steer" the Shiites "right" by "embarrass[ing] the heck out of them in public." Khalilzad said Iraq's "ruling Shiites are about to make a major mistake by appointing ministers, especially in the security services, that many Iraqis fear," and he "bluntly stated that the Shiites must choose more wisely or else." Ambassador Khalilzad: "We cannot invest billions of dollars in security forces if those forces are not trusted by the Iraqi people."

The Washington Times and USA Today (2/21, 2.31M) run an AP report on Khalilzad's remarks, while the New York Times (2/21, Tavernise, Worth, 1.19M) and Washington Post (2/21, A10, Hernandez, 744K) also note his comments.

Iraqi Highway Patrol Linked To Death Squads. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Moore, 958K) reports a "1,500-member Iraqi police force with close ties to Shiite militia groups has emerged as a focus of investigations into suspected death squads working within the country's Interior Ministry." Iraq's "national highway patrol was established largely to stave off insurgent attacks on roadways," but US military officials "say they suspect the patrol of being deeply involved in illegal detentions, torture and extrajudicial killings."

Suicide Bombings Kill US Soldier, Two Dozen Iraqis. NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 3, 0:25, Williams) reported that in Iraq, the "relative lull there has been shattered in a string of bombings today that left 24 dead, including an American soldier. The worst of the attacks occurred in Baghdad, where a suicide bomber killed 12 people onboard a crowded bus." The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 2, 0:10, Schieffer), meanwhile, reported the US soldier was "hit by a roadside bomb near the Shiite city of Karbala." The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Daragahi, 958K), among other sources, also reports on the attacks.

US Seeks To Change Strategy With Counterinsurgency Academy. The Washington Post (2/21, A10, Ricks, 744K) reports on the "COIN Academy" or counterinsurgency academy in Iraq organized by the US commander, Army Gen. George W. Casey. The school "seeks, as a course summary puts it, to 'stress the need for US forces to shift from a conventional warfare mindset' to one that understands how to win in a guerrilla-style conflict." The purpose "of the school north of Baghdad is to try to bring about a different outcome than the US military achieved in 2003-04, when Army commanders committed mistakes typical of a conventional military facing an insurgency." Again "and again, the intense immersion course, which 30 to 50 officers attend at a time, emphasizes that the right answer is probably the counterintuitive one, rather than something that the Army has taught officers in their 10 or 20 years of service."

Politics, Bureaucracy Contribute To Decline In Iraqi Oil Production. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Cummins, Hafidh, 2.11M) report political disputes and bureaucratic snags have contributed to a sharp decline in Iraqi oil production, "raising questions about the country's ability to keep its petroleum industry from spiraling further into disrepair." In January, "production sank to 1.5 million barrels a day. The deterioration deprives Iraq of revenue from oil sales and is one more black eye for American reconstruction efforts."

In 2000, Hall Said Iraq Was Military Threat. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (2/21, 90K) excerpts a statement released on April 24, 2000 by Rep. Tony Hall (D) after returning from Iraq. Hall said, "I remain concerned about the military threat Iraq continues to pose to its neighbors and the world -- and convinced that until progress is made on eliminating weapons of mass destruction, lifting sanctions would be irresponsible." Hall added that "if Iraq would show good faith in keeping the promises it made at the end of the Gulf War, perhaps that would prompt good faith measures by the United Nations."

Marine Corps Officer Is Only Active Combat Artist. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Phillips, 2.11M) reports Warrant Officer Michael Fay, the Marine Corps' official artist, a "rarity because he is both front-line warrior and front-line artist. He is, as far as he knows, the only active-duty combat artist in the world today." The result is "work that does in images what Ernie Pyle did in his World War II newspaper columns: Convey the experiences, both frightening and mundane, of the common man thrust into war."

New Bin Laden, Zawahiri Audiotapes Released. New audiotapes of al Qaeda leaders Osama bin Laden and Ayman al Zawahiri have surfaced in which bin Laden vows never to be taken alive by the US and al Zawahiri brags about having escaped a US airstrike in Pakistan meant to kill him. The story was the lead on CBS, while NBC ran a full segment and ABC ran a brief. The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 1, 3:15, Stewart) reported, "US officials still aren't certain what to make of it but in newly released excerpts from a message of al Qaeda's number two man, Ayman al-Zawahiri, the terrorist leader appears to acknowledge that the CIA came far closer than first suspected when it attacked this Pakistan border village last month." Zawahiri, "clearly in a taunting mood," also "claimed for the first time he was in the Tora Bora Mountains when US forces attacked the al Qaeda stronghold at the end of the Afghanistan invasion." Al Qaeda "also released a new version of Osama bin Laden's January audio message in which he pledged to never be taken alive," but it "had a voiceover in English, believed to be that that of this young man, Adam Gadahn."

NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 2, 2:10, Mitchell) reported, "Most likely recorded in January, Zawahiri invites President Bush to convert to Islam." Zawahiri (voice of translator): "Bush, despite all your crimes, foolishness, and black history, I offer you Islam." Mitchell: "An invitation, experts say, could actually be a warning." Ben Venzke, terrorism analyst: "We believe it is part of a greater warning cycle that we would see in the run-up to an attack." Mitchell: "On his newly released video, Zawahiri also takes aim at Pakistan's President Musharraf."

ABC World News Tonight (2/20, story 3, :25, Gibson) reported, "The comments are on an old audiotape. But new attention is called to them. Bin Laden says Iraq has restored the energy of those who carry out war against America."

Observers Worry Afghan Judicial Reform Could Be Destabilizing. The Christian Science Monitor (2/21, Baldauf, 61K) reports "a growing chorus of European and Western donor nations call on" the Afghan government "to reform and professionalize the judicial system - as required by the Constitution and the Afghanistan Compact signed in London on Feb. 1," the chief justice, Islamic scholar Fazel Hadi Shinwari, "says that Afghanistan will be governed by Islamic laws or tumble into violent civil conflict." Instability has "long been President Hamid Karzai's chief concern. But when a group of European diplomats brought a démarche, or diplomatic petition, to Mr. Karzai on Feb. 11, demanding reform of the Supreme Court, insiders braced themselves for the worst." Privately, "some officials worry that taking on religious conservatives like Shinwari could be severely destabilizing."

Kaplan Says Military's New Strategy Needs Diplomatic Component. In a New York Times op-ed (2/21), Robert Kaplan of the Atlantic Monthly says, "Because of a bloody counterinsurgency that no one in the military wants to repeat, Iraq has profoundly affected the Pentagon's deployment strategies as it shifts toward a greater emphasis on the Pacific Rim while still facing a profusion of terrorist-related threats not just in the Middle East but also in Africa and elsewhere." The goal "from now on is to get into a place fast, before a problem begins to fester, when there is leeway to experiment and thus to make mistakes without suffering a loss of prestige." But there is a "major omission: the civilian -- or non-Defense Department -- piece of it is entirely missing." In this "worldwide struggle the civilian piece associated with the State Department will be a vital, unconventional asset."

Strain From Afghan, Iraq Wars Seen As Showing On Home Front. USA Today (2/21, Zoroya, 2.31M) reports the situation at Robins Air Force Base in Georgia, "where thousands of workers repair military aircraft, is a case study on how the war overseas has affected those serving on the home front. Here, a different kind of strain and battle fatigue has surfaced, often in startling ways." The "wounded came not from engaging the enemy, but from scores of workplace injuries that increased as the war intensified. The low morale was measured in rises in drunken driving and domestic abuse, discrimination complaints and lost productivity. Most dramatic were the suicides — double the national rate in 2004 — and murders on the base, the first in Robins' 65-year history."

Officers Learn Middle East Culture In Army Program. The Washington Post (2/21, A13, 744K) reports on a US Army "pilot program that is sending 21 Army officers to graduate school to learn about foreign cultures, business practices and languages, including Arabic." The Army "wants its leaders armed with skills to help them navigate road signs, engineering plans and simple conversations."

DOJ:

Attorney Asks DOJ To Clear Name Of Deceased Michigan Official. The Detroit News (2/21, Egan) reports, "Edward H. McNamara's attorney said Monday he would like the U.S. Justice Department to issue a letter clearing his client of criminal wrongdoing now that McNamara has died. … McNamara, who was Wayne County Executive from 1987 through 2002, died Sunday of heart failure. He was 79." The News continues, "In the waning days of his administration, federal and state police officers raided McNamara's county and campaign offices and seized cartloads of paper and computer records. … But McNamara was never charged, and his attorney, Christopher Andreoff, said the Justice Department has never told him that McNamara was the target or even a subject of the probe. He has heard nothing from the FBI or Justice Department since receiving subpoenas for campaign records more than three years ago, he said. … 'I would hope that the government would come forward, but they may not,' Andreoff said. … 'I would like to have such a letter from them now that he's passed, but whether they will do that or not, they tend not to do that in any case, whether someone is deceased or not.'" The News adds, "Andreoff said he wants to discuss the issue with McNamara's widow and other family members before contacting U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy. 'Now is not the appropriate time,' he said. … The wide-ranging probe is related in part to possible links between campaign contributions and the awarding of county contracts."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Both Sides In Enron Case Try To Shape Jury's Opinions. The Washington Post (2/21, D1, Johnson) reports, "Everybody, it seems, has an opinion about Enron Corp. … But the one that counts will be reached by 12 people who will decide the fate of the energy trader's former leaders." The Post continues, "The jurors are an eclectic bunch: eight women and four men, three self-identified Hispanics and one Asian. It is a well-educated panel that includes an engineer, a courtroom manager, and employees of oil industry giants Royal Dutch Shell Group and Schlumberger Ltd. … Four alternates are standing by in case one of the regular jurors becomes ill or otherwise cannot continue through the trial of former chairman Kenneth L. Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling, which is likely to extend at least four months." The Post adds, "The way the Enron panel goes about its work will fuel a long-running debate about the ability of average citizens to assess responsibility for complex business frauds -- and will carry powerful implications for the way prosecutors bring future white-collar cases, according to experts on corporate crime. … 'Juries can understand lies, cheating and stealing,' said Ellen S. Podgor, a visiting law professor at Stetson University and co-author of a blog on white-collar cases. 'What they can't understand is complex accounting practices. You have to simplify it for the jury.' … That is exactly where the prosecution has focused its efforts. 'It is not about accounting. It is about lies and choices,' Assistant U.S. Attorney John C. Hueston told the jurors in opening arguments. … In contrast, defense lawyers have attempted to lead the jury down circuitous paths of accounting treatment, introducing audio and video clips full of arcane detail about complex business issues. … Defense lawyers also have signaled that they may make the jury itself the basis of appeals if the trial goes against their clients. Almost from the start, they raised questions about whether jurors from Houston, where thousands of workers lost jobs and retirement savings in Enron's collapse, could hear the case with open minds."

Ruling Curbs Executives' Chance To Accept Lucrative IPO Shares. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Siconolfi) reports, "Corporate executives, take note: The definition of improper stock trading in your brokerage account just got broader." The Journal continues, "A New York state court recently found former telecommunications executive Clark E. McLeod liable for receiving hot new stocks in his personal brokerage account. The rationale: His company was sending business to the same securities firm, Citigroup Inc.'s Salomon Smith Barney, that doled him the new stocks. … That is a big change. Previously, 'spinning' of initial public offerings of stock involved a direct quid pro quo. In a common form, securities firms allocated IPOs to the personal accounts of corporate executives, so the shares could then be sold, or 'spun,' for quick profits -- in exchange for business from the executives' companies." The Journal notes, "IPO shares are coveted because they often surge on their first trading day. Spinning has raised concerns among investors that the IPO market is rigged. … Bottom line: Senior executives now could skate on thin legal ice if they receive IPO shares from a Wall Street firm with which their company at some point does business, and don't disclose it to their board or shareholders."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Cotton Convicted In First Tennessee Waltz Trial. A federal jury on Saturday found Tennessee Waltz defendant William Cotton guilty of conspiracy and one of two counts of attempted extortion. Cotton was acquitted of the second extortion count. The AP (2/19, Poovey) notes, "Hours of secret FBI audiotapes and videotapes of encounters between Cotton," lobbyist Charles Love "and undercover agents posing as E-Cycle executives were the heart of the government's case." The Memphis Commercial Appeal (2/19, Perrusquia) observes, "The case illustrates the challenges other Waltz defendants…may face when confronted with hours of taped evidence in trials slated for Memphis later this year. … Although the Cotton case is one of the least complex of the Waltz cases, the volume of taped evidence and complexity of federal extortion law seemed to dazzle jurors."

Meanwhile, WTVC-TV Chattanooga (2/20, Fields) reports on the reaction of Chattanooga-area lawmakers to Cotton's conviction. State Rep. Chris Clem "likens the fallout of the Tennessee Waltz investigation to fighting a disease, 'I would say it's equivalent to being diagnosed with a treatable cancer. … You're glad you can do something about it, but the treatment is still rather painful.'" Sen. David Fowler, who was mentioned in the FBI tapes but not accused of accepting bribes, "says it's unfortunate the fallout from Tennessee Waltz has undermined the public's trust in lawmakers."

Defense Attorney To Seek Lenient Sentence. The Chattanoogan (2/20) reports defense attorney Hank Hill "said he will ask Federal Judge Allan Edgar for leniency," saying that Cotton "'played a fairly minor role' in the FBI 'Operation Tennessee Waltz' sting." Hill "said he will point out that Cotton 'is a decorated war hero. He received two Purple Hearts' in Vietnam."

Cotton Resigns Commission Seat. The AP (2/21) reports that in a letter to Hamilton County Commission Chairman Larry Henry on Monday, Cotton resigned his seat in the wake of his conviction. The AP notes, "The 'Tennessee Waltz' scandal led to a special session of the legislature this year, which passed a sweeping ethics reform bill creating an independent ethics commission, restricting lobbyists and capping cash political contributions."

Some Black Political Leaders Say FBI Investigation Racially Motivated. The AP (2/20, Poovey) reports, "Some black political leaders are saying the 'Tennessee Waltz' sting operation targeted blacks and represents an attack on the Senate campaign of U.S. Rep. Harold Ford Jr." State Rep. Ulysses Jones "said many people in his district believe federal investigators went after black leaders," and Hamilton County Democratic chairman Stuart James "said the investigation has prompted 'complaints from the black community as a whole.'" However, the lead prosecutor, Assistant US Attorney John MacCoon "said it was 'absurd' to suggest race or partisan politics were factors in the investigation."

FBI Scrutinized Memphis Lawmakers. Under the headline "FBI Had DeBerry, Hargett In Sights," The Memphis Commercial Appeal (2/19, Perrusquia) reports, "House Speaker Pro Tem Lois DeBerry and state Rep. Tre Hargett were among several Memphis-area politicians originally in the crosshairs of an FBI corruption sting, yet were never charged." In an FBI surveillance recording played at Cotton's trial, "an undercover agent says Hargett is one who should be approached because 'we did something for Tre,'" and adds that "DeBerry 'has agreed to co-sponsor' legislation favorable to E-Cycle Management." On Saturday, "Hargett said he was surprised and angered by the inference."

Bredesen To Return Contributions From FBI Probe Targets. The Knoxville News (2/21, Stambaugh) reports, "Gov. Phil Bredesen's campaign announced Monday it will return $22,300 in contributions given since 2001" by Harold Eugene Grooms, Kenneth Frazier and Cocke County business H-1 Auto Parts, after Bredesen became aware that they were targets of the Operation Rose Thorn investigation.

"Grooms has been under scrutiny by federal authorities since at least 2000, when two pilots were caught smuggling marijuana into East Tennessee and fingered Grooms as their boss. … H-1 Auto Parts has also been the subject of a federal search warrant," and Kenneth Frazier "has been identified by the FBI as the owner of the 440 Cockfight Pit." The AP (2/20) notes, "Grooms' home was raided last month by the FBI, Tennessee Bureau of Investigations and other agencies. Bredesen confirms knowing Grooms, but says he'll keep at 'arm's length' from him with his new troubles."

Gotti Racketeering Trial Begins Today. The AP (2/20, Neumeister) reports, "The latest attack on the Gambino family…begins Tuesday, when lawyers deliver opening statements in the racketeering case against John 'Junior' Gotti. The trial is a linchpin in the government's effort to permanently shut down the Gambino family, once a powerhouse in the gambling, loan sharking, labor union and extortion rackets." The AP notes that federal investigators have made significant progress against the Gambinos since "they infiltrated the family with an undercover FBI agent who was so well accepted that he was offered membership." The New York Post (2/19, Hamilton, Smith) adds that "a rematch of Gotti vs. the government won't be a simple replay of last year's trial, when a lone holdout juror derailed the bid to nail the ex-Gambino crime king for plotting to kidnap radio host Curtis Sliwa, loan sharking and extortion in the construction trade. This time, there's a new attorney for Junior, along with fewer witnesses against him, pared-down charges…and no co-defendants."

Gambino Case Built On FBI Wiretap, Informant, Undercover Agent. Under the headline "FBI Stalks The Gambino Crime Family In Westchester," The Westchester Journal News (2/19, O'Connor) reports on the FBI's surveillance of reputed Gambino crime family captain Gregory DePalma of Scarsdale. The Journal News notes that the case against DePalma is based on a listening device in DePalma's cell phone, "a member of DePalma's Westchester-based crew who was flipped by an agent from the FBI's White Plains office," and "an FBI mole" who "worked his way into DePalma's inner circle." The Journal News goes on to detail some of the recordings captured by the FBI wiretap.

Alleged Bonanno Boss Maintains Unconcerned Attitude As Trial Approaches. The New York Times (2/21, Rashbaum) reports on the trial of alleged mobster Vincent "Vinny Gorgeos" Basciano, set to begin Thursday, "where he stands accused of running the Bonanno crime family with a decidedly deadly hand." In pre-trial hearings, Basciano "has preened in his finely tailored suits and Ferragamo shoes" and "has been seen laughing and making jokes for the benefit of newspaper reporters." Although "the government has lined up 80 to 100 witnesses," Basciano "appears largely unconcerned. He sits in court listening intently, sometimes silently flashing a smirk to reporters, or an arched eyebrow." The New York Post (2/20, Haberman) notes that Basciano will "face an extraordinary number of Mafia turncoats. … 'There is not one trial in public consciousness that has seen as many rats,' one legal insider said. Former family godfather Joseph Massino, who was convicted in 2004 of committing seven rubouts but cooperated to skirt the death penalty, is expected to make his rat debut."

Congress Takes Up Dispute Over "Bad Check" School. The Washington Post (2/21, A1, Mayer) reports, "Prosecutors in some Maryland and Virginia counties have adopted a potent tactic to discourage check-bouncing: threatening writers with prosecution if they don't attend 'bad check school' run by private contractors." The Post continues, "It is a way for the counties to make money -- they get a portion of the fees the companies charge people who attend the courses -- and law enforcement officials say the practice saves resources for fighting more serious wrongdoing. … But critics say the private companies violate the law when they send out letters warning check bouncers to attend classes or face prosecution. The critics add that in most states, it is not a crime to write a returned check unless there is intent to defraud. And federal law bars debt collectors from making false threats." The Post adds, "Nine Maryland counties, including Prince George's, Howard, Anne Arundel and Frederick, have turned to check restitution companies for such services. Some jurisdictions in southern Virginia are using an outside company, and Loudoun County is about to do so. The District has no check-restitution program but is considering one. … Local prosecutors say the threat of prosecution for not participating is legitimate. … But the practice is being challenged in several lawsuits nationwide. … The dispute has moved to Congress, where prosecutors want check-restitution programs exempted from federal debt-collection laws. Proposed legislation, designed to eliminate key legal arguments in lawsuits challenging the practice, has been approved by the House Financial Services Committee. Consumer advocates and debt collectors -- typically adversaries -- are fighting it."

Rising Poker Popularity Leads To Robbery Risk. The Washington Post (2/21, A1, Vargas) reports, "The first time Doug Thomas looked up from his cards to see a gun pointed at him, the chips on the felt-topped poker table were piling up to about $100 a pot. The Texas Hold 'Em game was just revving up last month at the Manassas electrical shop when two masked men, armed with a semiautomatic handgun, ordered players facedown on the floor. … The second time was less than two weeks later and just a few blocks away. Nine players had paid $500 each for a seat at the poker game at his Manassas apartment, but Thomas wasn't making any money, other than the few bucks he skimmed off each pot to pay for food and drinks. The pizza and wings had just arrived when the police officers showed, weapons drawn." The Post continues, "As poker's popularity explodes, swallowing basements and living rooms in its wake, the danger also has increased, police say. No one tracks the number of poker-game heists because they are recorded simply as robberies, and many go unreported by hosts fearful of gambling charges. But police across the region and nation say private games are ripe for robberies. … The games' hosts acknowledge the danger and are reacting by keeping guest lists more exclusive and often risking serious criminal charges by taking money from players to pay for armed security. … For police, the mixture of a high-stakes game in a low-security spot such as a home is cause for worry. … Police say that in the past year and a half, calls about private poker games have increased steadily, including complaints from relatives worried about depleted savings accounts and from neighbors tired of watching cars clog cul-de-sacs the same night each week."

Groups Seek FEC Rules To Allow Ads Near Elections. Five groups, the AFL-CIO, the US Chamber of Commerce, the National Education Association, OMB Watch and the Alliance for Justice have petitioned the FEC to create new regulations that would allow them to lobby federal officeholders via TV ads in the days before a primary and general election. The Washington Times (2/20, Dinan, 90K) reports, "If the FEC does, it would be the first time the agency set standards for how groups can lobby without running afoul of the 2002 campaign-finance changes in the McCain-Feingold Act, named after Senate sponsors John McCain and Russell D. Feingold." In January, the High Court ruled in Wisconsin Right to Life v. FEC that grass-roots groups "have ways to lobby and mention the name of a federal candidate without being seen as actively campaigning. In their petition to the FEC, submitted last week, five groups said the court's ruling lets the FEC write regulations in time to govern the 2006 election."

High Court To Consider Vermont Campaign Finance Law. The Supreme Court next week will consider whether a Vermont campaign finance law violates the First Amendment. U.S. News and World Report (6/27, Halloran) reports that the case gives the court "its first opportunity to revisit the [1976 Buckley v. Valeo] money-is-speech precedent that defines unlimited campaign spending as a constitutional right. The outcome could have a dramatic effect on how far states can go in regulating campaigns in the future."

Families To Recover Art Taken In World War II. USA Today (2/21, Willing) reports, "She has pursued her family's stolen treasures for nearly eight years. … But Maria Altmann of Los Angeles, a 90-year-old widow and Holocaust survivor, says she never expected this: Austria's national gallery is preparing to send her and her four cousins five paintings worth an estimated $300 million, nearly 70 years after Nazis confiscated the artworks in her native Vienna." USA continues, "A long-shot victory by Altmann at the U.S. Supreme Court in 2004 and a win before an Austrian arbitration panel in January mean that the paintings, by early 20th-century Austrian master Gustav Klimt, could be headed to Altmann's three-bedroom home as soon as next month. … The Austrian government has declined to bid on the works, which include a gold-flecked portrait of Adele Bloch-Bauer, Altmann's aunt, that has been reproduced on thousands of souvenirs. In a statement, Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel said the nation could not afford the $300 million valuation placed on the paintings by E. Randol Schoenberg, Altmann's Los Angeles-based attorney." USA notes, "The Altmann case has had an impact on the art world, says Robert Jarvis, art law specialist at Nova Southeastern University in Fort Lauderdale. Public museums are re-examining the backgrounds of many of their pieces. Some, such as New York City's Metropolitan Museum of Art, have agreed to return some pieces to their nation of origin rather than risk losing them in a lawsuit."

Only 21 States Have Complied With Voting Reform Law. CQ (2/20, Zeller) reports that four years ago, Congress "wrote a law intending to clean up once and for all the sorts of Election Day messes that yielded Florida's presidential results fiasco in 2000." But a "recent study by the nonpartisan group Electionline shows that only 21 states have met all of the law's requirements as of the deadline, which was Jan. 1." The group "monitored compliance with the baseline provisions of the law, which also called for the adoption of uniform voter identification rules, statewide voter registration databases and modernized voting machines that could be used by people with disabilities." The "furthest behind, according to the Electionline report, is New York, which is presently under review by the Justice Department to determine whether its $220 million in federal funding under the law should be confiscated." Still, "new machinery is not an airtight fix for voting irregularities either, the report found: California is scrambling to replace its recently acquired electronic voting machines to address concerns about their reliability and security."

Delaware Session To Teach How To Recognize Victims Of Human Trafficking. The Wilmington (DE) News Journal (2/20, Billington) reports, "Human trafficking -- the modern version of slavery -- is a multibillion-dollar-a-year criminal enterprise, ranking behind drug trafficking in global crime statistics." The Journal continues, "Some victims of human trafficking are probably working in Delaware, experts say. … 'There's no doubt that there is human trafficking in every state in the union,' said Chief Assistant U.S. Attorney Douglas Molloy of Fort Myers, Fla. Molloy has prosecuted several human-trafficking cases. … 'If you have an agricultural industry, for example, or large numbers of undocumented workers, you have slavery.'" The Journal adds, "Delaware has a large agricultural sector and other businesses -- such as food service and construction -- that lend themselves to human trafficking, but there have been no specific charges brought to date in the state, U.S. Attorney Colm Connolly said. … 'Some local law enforcement agencies have brought matters to us that they thought could be human trafficking, especially in areas such as prostitution rings, but further investigation did not bear that out,' Connolly said." The Journal notes, "Despite the lack of evidence human trafficking is a problem in the state, one advocacy group is organizing a training session Wednesday in Dover to promote ways to recognize potential victims and signs. … Attendees at the event will include police, social workers, hospital personnel and others who come into contact with the state's immigrant population. It is not open to the public. … A number of experts have said that police and prosecutors are not trained well enough to recognize obvious signs and to deal with victims."

LAPD Suspensions, Firings Down Last Year Despite Rise In Misconduct Reports. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, McGreevy) reports, "Although complaints against Los Angeles police employees were up last year, 46% fewer officers and civilian staff members were fired or suspended than in 2004, according to a report released by LAPD Chief William J. Bratton." The Times continues, "Last year, about 6,400 complaints were filed against police employees, an increase of nearly 4%, according to Cmdr. Eric Lillo, head of the Los Angeles Police Department's Internal Affairs Group. … At the same time, a separate report by the chief — to be considered by the Police Commission today — said 421 employees were fired, quit under pressure or were suspended last year, nearly half the 784 staff members who were terminated or suspended in 2004. … The LAPD has 9,357 police officers." The Times notes, "Lillo said the drop in the number of discipline cases was probably due in part to efforts by Bratton to punish those engaged in misconduct. … Department officials note that, because of limited investigative staffing, fewer complaints that might have brought disciplinary action were resolved in 2005 than the year before. Because the department has had trouble meeting its recruitment goals, it has become more difficult to promote experienced officers to these investigative functions. … Civil rights attorney Samuel Paz, a member of the National Policing Accountability Project, called on the Police Commission to determine why complaints overall were up."

Los Angeles Jail Riots Underscore California's Racial Divide. The Washington Post (2/21, A1, Pomfret) reports, "A series of deadly racial attacks in the jails of this sprawling metropolis has cast a spotlight on long-simmering but little-discussed tensions between a shrinking black presence and an ascendant Latino one in California." The Post continues, "In almost every arena of public life -- schools, politics, hospitals, housing and the workplace -- African Americans and Hispanics are engaged in an edgy competition, according to interviews with teachers, students, politicians, researchers, government officials, civil rights lawyers, street cops and businesspeople." The Post adds, "Los Angeles's first Latino mayor since the 19th century, Antonio Villaraigosa (D), was elected last year with strong support from African Americans amid hopes of the creation of a true rainbow coalition in one of the world's most ethnically diverse metropolitan areas. But the reality, said Earl Ofari Hutchinson, a black radio talk show host who directs the Los Angeles Urban Policy Roundtable, is that 'the jail violence is only symptomatic of something larger.' … 'There is conflict and competition in all areas,' Hutchinson said. 'This city and this state is a caldron of racial issues. This thing is pulsating.'"

Efforts To Ban Gay Adoption Emerging Nationwide. In what USA Today (2/21, Stone, 2.31M) calls a "second front in the culture wars" over gay marriage, efforts to ban gays and lesbians from adopting children are emerging across the country. USA reports, "Steps to pass laws or secure November ballot initiatives are underway in at least 16 states, adoption, gay rights and conservative groups say. Some — such as Ohio, Georgia and Kentucky — approved constitutional amendments in 2004 banning gay marriage."

In a separate story, USA Today (2/21, Stone, 2.31M) adds, "The push against adoption by lesbians and gay men comes after successful campaigns in 11 states in 2004 to define marriage as a union between a man and a woman. At least six more states — Alabama, Arizona, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota and Wisconsin — may put marriage on the ballot in November."

Preschool Teacher Sues Catholic School After Losing Job Because Of Pregnancy. ABC World News Tonight (2/20, story 5, 3:00, Vargas) reported, "Polls show most American Catholics find abortion morally unacceptable. But a Catholic schoolteacher in New York says she was fired from her job because she decided not to have an abortion." ABC (Tapper) added Michelle McCusker taught at St. Rose of Lima, a Catholic school in Brooklyn, but "McCusker, who is Catholic and single, became pregnant. She decided to keep the baby. The school, backed by the Brooklyn Diocese, fired her." McCusker "and the New York Civil Liberties Union are suing the school, claiming gender discrimination," and "an anti-abortion group," Feminists for Life, "has sided with Michelle McCusker, claiming that the Catholic school was essentially encouraging abortion."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Will Not Charge Finnish Paper Maker With Price-Fixing. The AP (2/20) reports, "Finnish paper maker UPM-Kymmene Corp. said Monday that U.S. officials will not prosecute it over possible price fixing in magazine paper or antitrust related offenses in the American labelstock industry." The AP continues, "The world's largest magazine paper producer said the decision presupposes 'UPM's full and continuing cooperation with the U.S. Department of Justice antitrust division's investigations.'" The AP adds, "In August 2003, UPM received a grand jury subpoena in the antitrust division's investigation into the American labelstock industry. … Prompted by its own internal investigation of possible collusion, UPM in January 2004 contacted competition authorities in the European Union, the United States and Canada, which then gave the Helsinki-based company conditional full immunity concerning "certain conduct disclosed to the authorities." … In May 2004, European regulators raided several forest products companies in the investigation into alleged price fixing and cartel arrangements, based on UPM's information."

New Mexico Mulls Changes To Minimum-Service Rules. Inman News (2/20, Roberts) reports, "The New Mexico Real Estate Commission will meet this week to consider a controversial real estate regulation opposed by U.S. Justice Department antitrust officials." Inman continues, "Members of the state's Real Estate Commission had delayed their consideration of the rule change, which would require all real estate brokers in the state to provide a specified level of services to consumers, after receiving a letter from the Justice Department in November." Inman adds, "The meeting will be held on Wednesday and Thursday this week in the Las Cruces, N.M., real estate brokerage office of David Steinborn, president of the Real Estate Commission -- which is about 230 miles away from the commission's office in Albuquerque, N.M. The meeting data and location were not publicized on the commission's Web site as of Friday morning, but is now listed at the site. … The Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission have opposed laws and regulations in several states that have sought to heighten the level of services that real estate professionals must perform for clients. The federal agencies have charged that such measures can deny consumers the right to choose which services they want and do not want in a real estate transaction, and can potentially lead to higher costs for real estate services and a smaller field of real estate business models." Inman notes, "Proponents, including state lawmakers, real estate regulators and Realtor trade groups, have endorsed the laws as efforts to eliminate agents' confusion in real estate transactions involving a brokerage company that offers limited representation, and to ensure that consumers will receive all of the services that they need. … Opponents, including real estate professionals who offer low-cost limited-service options for consumers, have said that they are just giving consumers what they want, and they question the motives of such industry-backed efforts."

Electolux May Seek Acquisitions During Consolidation. Bloomberg (2/20) reports, "Electrolux AB, the world's largest appliance maker, may make acquisitions as the industry consolidates, Chief Executive Officer Hans Straaberg said. … 'We have clear evidence that Electrolux has been the predator and not the prey, and we intend to stay the predator,' Straaberg, who has a moose head trophy in his Stockholm office, said in an interview today." Bloomberg continues, "There are 'add-on' acquisitions that would be 'of interest' to Electrolux, the 48-year-old CEO said, declining to comment on any potential targets. The company was named Sweden's likeliest takeover target by newspaper Dagens Industri in December, based on interviews with 100 analysts. … Electrolux, the maker of AEG stoves and Frigidaire refrigerators, will lose its top ranking if Whirlpool Corp., the maker of KitchenAid appliances, succeeds in with its $1.68 billion purchase of Maytag Corp. Benton Harbor, Michigan-based Whirlpool last week agreed to delay that purchase so that the U.S. Justice Department can have more time to review the transaction."

BlackBerry Patent Fight Coming Down To The Wire. The AP (2/20, Stoughton) reports, "Say what you want about patent infringement lawsuits, but at least the BlackBerry case has drama." The AP continues, "A federal judge, clearly impatient with the long-running case, could issue an injunction as soon as this week on U.S. sales and service of the wireless e-mail device." The AP adds, "Most patent lawsuits are dismissed or settled long before they reach this stage. Remarkably, neither BlackBerry maker Research In Motion Ltd. nor tiny patent holder NTP Inc. have shown signs of backing down. In effect, they're daring each other to blink first and settle. … Governments, businesses and individual users are growing unnerved by the standoff. Although the odds of an actual shutdown are low, conflicting opinions about the possible outcomes and the spin from both sides have created a confusing picture. … James R. Spencer, a no-nonsense U.S. district judge widely respected in the legal community, now finds himself in the unusual position of weighing an injunction against RIM even as the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office is expected to finally rescind NTP's patents. … But the system doesn't necessarily work in a timely fashion. Spencer has signaled that he is unwilling to delay his proceedings while awaiting final word from the patent office, which lags far behind the court system. A case that could change the practice of granting injunctions in patent cases, eBay Inc. v. MercExchange, will be taken up by the Supreme Court, but no decision is expected until the spring at the earliest. Spencer, meanwhile, has scheduled a hearing for Friday on the injunction and damages."

Maryland Power Company Seeks To Keep Lawmakers Out Of Merger. The Washington Post (2/21, B1, Mosk) reports, "Maryland's largest power company has launched a discreet but aggressive lobbying campaign to prevent the legislature from intervening with its plans to merge with a Florida utility to create one of the nation's largest electricity suppliers." The Post continues, "Constellation Energy Group has bulked up its roster of lobbyists in Annapolis, and the company's executives have been meeting with top lawmakers in recent days to try to dissuade the legislature from taking steps that would scotch the $11.5 billion deal with FPL Group, based in Juno Beach, Fla. … 'This company is launching a lobbying blitz in the halls of the legislature to speed this merger through,' said Sen. Leo E. Green (D-Prince George's). 'We need to step on the brakes.'" The Post adds, "Green and other top lawmakers predict a fierce legislative battle over the proposed merger, which they worry could mean sizable rate increases for the 1 million Maryland customers of Constellation's subsidiary Baltimore

Gas & Electric Co. … The merger comes as state caps preventing rate increases are set to be lifted in July. And Senate Finance Committee Chairman Thomas M. Middleton (D-Charles) said he worries that Maryland customers would end up paying the costs of repairing FPL Group's hurricane-battered power lines."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Bush Outlines Energy Proposals In Michigan And Wisconsin. President Bush traveled to Michigan and Wisconsin yesterday to promote his alternative energy proposals. Of the networks, only NBC reported on the President's trip. NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 7, 0:35, Williams) reported Bush "spent this holiday Monday outlining some of his plans to wean Americans off what he has called this nation's addiction to foreign oil. He toured a Wisconsin plant that makes batteries for alternative-powered automobiles and he praised both hybrid technology and ethanol, a fuel usually made from corn. Critics, however, also say the President also needs to push the car industry for better fuel efficiency and push drivers to use less oil."

Most print reports note that the President framed the oil dependence issue as a "national security problem." The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (2/21, Content, Barrett, 266K) notes Bush also said it is "a challenge to the economy and Americans' quality of life. The president, who like his father worked in the oil industry before entering politics, said, 'I know it came as a shock to some to hear a Texan stand up there in front of the country and say, we've got a real problem, America is addicted to oil. But I meant it, because it's a true fact, and we've got to do something about it now.'" Knight Ridder (2/21, Hutcheson) reports "the former Texas oilman said he's ready to try everything from wind power to nuclear energy to break what he calls the nation's addiction to fossil fuels." White House "advisers hope that the president's focus on energy will reassure Americans that Bush shares their concerns over high gasoline prices and home heating bills. Critics dismissed the trip as a publicity stunt and questioned the president's sincerity."

Bloomberg (2/21, Murray) quotes Bush saying, "We will start building nuclear power plants again by the end of this decade." Reuters (2/21, Zakaria) says Bush "pointed to France having built 58 nuclear plants since the 1970s, and China having 8 nuclear plants in the works, with plans to build at least 40 more over the next two decades." Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid "said Democrats were willing to work with Bush on alternative energy, but last year's energy legislation suggested Bush had different priorities. 'We need more than just rhetoric from a president who let Big Oil write our energy policies,' he said."

The New York Times (2/21, Bumiller, 1.19M) sees a political component to Bush's trip, reporting that it "dovetailed with his campaign travels. Wisconsin, Michigan and Colorado have races important to the White House this year, but of particular concern is Colorado, where a recent poll shows a Republican candidate for governor, Representative Bob Beauprez, trailing Bill Ritter, a Democrat and former Denver district attorney." Although Bush "did no overt politicking in the three states, the view of the White House is that his appearances are helpful to Republican candidates because they motivate the party's most faithful supporters."

Bush's statement that the country is on the verge of great technological breakthroughs also receives extensive coverage this morning. The AP (2/21, Riechmann) reports Bush said such breakthroughs "would 'startle' most Americans," while UPI (2/21) says Bush "outlined several such advances, including the lithium ion battery at the Wisconsin plant, wind-driven electrical generation and solar power."

The Detroit Free Press (2/21, Gray) reports, Bush "toured an Auburn Hills company that produces high-tech batteries and solar panels, saying the work being done at United Solar Ovonics could someday change the way Americans live their lives." Bush "met with United Solar Ovonics officials privately for about an hour and toured the plant with the company's president, Subhendu Guha. During the tour, he met with company employees and spoke to the media briefly." The Detroit News (2/21, Heinlein) says United Solar "is one of the most promising ventures of Energy Conversion Devices, the Michigan company which for decades has pioneered a wide range of alternate energy technologies."

The WisPolitics.com (2/21, Wise) reports that in Wisconsin, Bush also "pushed for increased use of ethanol as a way to meet the energy demands of a country 'addicted' to oil. 'You've got a lot of it in Wisconsin,'' Bush told an invitation-only audience of some 250 people gathered at Johnson Controls in Milwaukee."

The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Gerstenzang, 958K) reports that the President, "sounding more like a salesman for hybrid autos, said the combined gas-electric vehicles were 'a good deal for the American people, and consumers have begun to figure it out.'" He "said he was looking ahead to the day when solar panels are built into roofing materials, and houses can send to the electric grid the energy they create but do not use. 'We want solar power to be commonplace by 2015,' Bush said."

In its analysis, USA Today (2/21, Benedetto, 2.31M) says the trip was part of Bush's "drive to cut what he called the nation's addiction to oil." Today, in Golden, CO, "the president visits the National Renewable Energy Laboratory, a federal research facility that develops new energy technologies and helps move them to practical application in private business and industry." The Denver Post (2/21, Human, Gonzalez, Crowell) reports Bush "landed Monday evening at Aurora's Buckley Air Force Base on the last leg" of his three-city tour. Moments "after striding off Air Force One, Bush shook hands with Gov. Bill Owens and US Sen. Ken Salazar and teased both men for not wearing warm coats." Bush's appearance on the tarmac at Buckley "lasted less than 10 minutes. He grabbed the hand of Pete Beverly, 70, an Aurora resident who has spent about 2,000 hours volunteering with Habitat for Humanity of Metro Denver."

The Washington Post (2/21, A3, VandeHei, 744K) reports that as Bush spoke, "crude oil prices rose as a result of rebel attacks in Nigeria that reduced output by Africa's largest producer, underscoring the volatility of the oil market."

Energy Department Comes Up With Funds To Restore Jobs At Colorado Lab. The Washington Times/AP (2/21) reports that while Bush "is highlighting his budget proposals to help wean America from foreign oil," the Colorado lab he will visit "is meeting a $28 million shortfall by cutting its staff by 32 persons, including eight researchers." But this morning, Reuters (2/21, Doggett) is reporting the Energy Department "said it has come up with $5 million to immediately restore jobs cut at a renewable energy laboratory…Bush will visit on Tuesday, avoiding a potentially embarrassing moment as the president promotes his energy plan." Bush "proposed spending millions more dollars in renewable energy research. However, Democratic lawmakers and environmentalists questioned the administration's commitment when jobs were being eliminated at the National Renewable Energy Laboratory (NREL) in Golden, Colorado." Bush "will visit the lab on Tuesday to tout his proposal for more renewable energy research funding."

Congress Said To Be Close To Lifting Bans On Offshore Drilling. The Washington Post (2/21, D1, Blum, 744K) reports, "For decades, drilling for oil and natural gas off of much of the US coastline has been off limits." But "this year, with Congress facing high energy prices and a fresh lobbying push from oil companies and their supporters, even drilling opponents acknowledge that they may lose their fight to keep bans in place." The Post adds, "A flurry of legislation from members of both parties would allow drilling for oil and natural gas in new areas of the Outer Continental Shelf -- land that lies under federal waters that surround the United States and typically stretch from three to 200 miles offshore."

Supreme Court Eminent Domain Case Generates National Controversy. The Supreme Court's decision in Kelo v. City of New London, which upheld the Connecticut city's use of eminent domain to condemn private property for economic development, has generated a national debate over the use of the power. The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 8, 2:45, Schieffer) reported the decision has "sent more than 30 state legislatures into action to try to undo what the court did." CBS notes the case of Norwood, Ohio, where homeowners such as Carl and Joy Gamble are fighting "city officials who agreed to a local developer's $125 million plan to replace their middle class neighborhood with offices, condos and shops" in state courts.

Legislators Move To Limit States' Use Of Eminent Domain. Lawmakers in nearly every state are pushing bills and constitutional amendments to limit the government's use of eminent domain to seize private property for economic development. The New York Times (2/21, Broder, 1.19M) reports, "The measures are in direct response to the United States Supreme Court's 5-to-4 decision last June in a landmark property rights case from Connecticut, upholding the authority of the City of New London to condemn homes in an aging neighborhood to make way for a private development of offices, condominiums and a hotel."

USA Today (2/20, Cauchon, 2.31M) reports, "Bills to restrict eminent domain have moved forward in Georgia, Virginia, Indiana, Kentucky and several other states, but none has become law yet. In New Mexico, the state Senate and House both approved limits, but the Legislature adjourned before final approval."

Supreme Court To Hear Arguments On Clean Water Act. The Supreme Court today will hear arguments over which bodies of water fall under Federal oversight under the Clean Water Act. The Christian Science Monitor (2/21, Richey, 61K) reports, "that two cases consolidated for oral argument today question "just how far upstream the Clean Water Act (CWA) extends federal jurisdiction. … At the center of the dispute is a discrepancy between the words Congress used when it wrote the CWA and the regulations the US Army Corps of Engineers and Environmental Protection Agency wrote later to enforce the clean water law. Congress said US jurisdiction would extend over all 'navigable waters.' EPA and Corps of Engineers regulations interpret the law as extending far upstream, even to waters with no hydrologic connection to a tributary of navigable waters."

The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Savage, 958K) reports, "Federal regulators read this measure as protecting tens of thousands of small streams and hundreds of millions of acres of wetlands that flow toward larger waterways, even if they are far from the nearest river or bay. But to the surprise of environmentalists, the high court agreed to hear a direct attack on that broad view of the law. Farmers and developers say it is far-fetched to describe low-lying farm fields, or even dry creek beds in the West, as part of the nation's navigable waterways."

The New York Times (2/20, Barringer, 1.19M) reports that if the court supports the developers, more than "half of the nation's streams and wetlands could be removed from the protections of the federal Clean Water Act." The central question "is where federal authority ends along the network of rivers, streams, canals and ditches. Does it reach all the veins and arterioles of the nation's waters, and all the wetlands that drain into them? Does it end with the waterways that are actually navigable and the wetlands abutting them? Or is it some place in between?"

Clean Water Act Said To Be In Jeopardy. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (2/20, 958K) discusses two cases -- Rapanos vs. United States and Carabell vs. Army Corps of Engineers -- that the new Supreme Court will hear when it comes back to session on Tuesday. The paper argues the two cases "pose serious challenges to the 1972 Clean Water Act," the law which gives the Federal Government authority to regulate "navigable waters" in the U.S. Tuesday's cases "concern wetlands that are (or may be) connected, but not adjacent, to navigable bodies," the question being does the Federal Government have the authority to regulate these types of wetlands.

NYTimes Says Clean Water Cases An Important Test For New Justices. An editorial in the New York Times (2/21, 1.19M) says the Clean Water Act cases are ""an important test of the legal philosophy of John Roberts Jr., the new chief justice, and Samuel Alito Jr., the new associate justice. If they take a hard-line states' rights stance, it will be a sign that they agree with ultraconservatives who want to restrict Congress's power to regulate critical national matters like environmental protection, public health and workplace safety. … These cases may give the American people the first clear indication of just how judicially modest the new justices intend to be."

Identity Issues Color Plan To Protect Florida Panther. The Washington Post (2/21, A3, Whoriskey) reports, "The Florida panther, the feline carnivore that roams what's left of the state's cypress swamps and other wilds, enjoys almost mythic status here." The Post continues, "Its image adorns license plates. The National Hockey League franchise is named for the cat. And it is, officially, the Florida state animal. … But now a new plan for saving the vaunted predator is reopening awkward questions for the animal's admirers: What, exactly, is a Florida panther?" The Post adds, "Scientists believe there are only about 80 left in Florida. And given the shortage of habitat in the cat's rapidly developing namesake state, the draft recovery plan for the Florida panther, issued recently by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, proposes to export some of the predators out of state -- and names potential sites in Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Georgia and Alabama. … The Florida panther roamed those states long ago, wildlife biologists said, and reintroducing it there could enable it to establish populations large enough to ward off extinction. … But the proposal to expand the range of the predator, which is being met warily from officials in other states, where farmers fear attacks on livestock, is also restarting debates about whether the Florida panther, officially considered an endangered subspecies, is for all practical purposes identical to the cougar, a far more common animal that lives in much of western North America."

Grassley Looks To Private Sector For Help With Rainforest Project. CQ (2/20, Adams) reports a "pet project that Republican Sen. Charles E. Grassley has had on the drawing board for more than two years" concerns "the construction of an enclosed rainforest on about five acres in Grassley's native Iowa — with a foil-wrapped exterior towering some 20 stories high." The "artificial rainforest — which has the working name of the Environmental Project — first won a $50 million earmark in the fall of 2003." But Grassley "raised the stakes for Iowa's private investors," and the "law now mandates that businesses or local governments cough up a match of $50 million in the next two years, or else be forced to give back whatever federal money hasn't been spent by Dec. 1, 2007."

Consumer Advocates Urge Ban On Carbon Monoxide Treated Meat. The meat industry has been spiking meat packages with carbon monoxide to give the meat a bright pink color that lasts weeks. Consumer advocates are urging the FDA to ban the practice, saying the agency violated its own rules by allowing the practice without a formal evaluation of its impact on consumer safety. A front page story in the Washington Post (2/20, A1, Weiss, 744K) reports, "The legal offensive has the meat industry seeing red. Officials deny their foes' claim that carbon monoxide is a 'colorant' -- a category that would require a full FDA review -- saying it helps meat retain its naturally red color."

Tribes, Casino Operators Rely On Cash To Influence Lawmakers. The Chicago Tribune (2/21, Dorning) reports, "Along with tawdry tales of bribery, money laundering and sham charities, the corruption scandal surrounding former lobbyist Jack Abramoff has thrown new light on the rising tide of gambling money pouring into the nation's capital." The Tribune continues, "As more states have moved to legalize gambling in one form or another and Indian tribes have turned to casinos as a lucrative source of income, the gambling industry's annual revenues have swelled to more than $78 billion. And with that wealth has come a determination to deploy larger sums to influence decisions made in Washington that can affect the bottom line." The Tribune adds, "Federal campaign contributions from the gambling industry have jumped more than 27-fold, from $478,000 in 1990 to more than $13 million in 2004, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, a non-partisan watchdog group. Washington lobbying expenses disclosed by the industry have nearly doubled in six years, from $6.1 million in 1998 to $11.4 million in 2004, according to the Center for Public Integrity, another monitoring group. … One California tribe, the Morongo Band of Mission Indians, rents a $1,500-a-night luxury suite at Washington's MCI Center that it lends out for fundraisers benefiting members of Congress friendly to their casino interests, including at least once to Rep. Jerry Weller (R-Ill.). … During the 2004 Republican National Convention, casino tribes helped foot the bill for an after-hours Wild Wild West Saloon party for a congressional committee chairman, Rep. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.), at a New York nightclub. The party featured a mechanical bull and music by big-name bands including the Charlie Daniels Band, .38 Special and Otis Day. … At least three of President Bush's premier Pioneer fundraisers were gambling industry chief executives. For years, the industry paid to fete senior congressional staff with annual three-day trips to Las Vegas, where casino operators made their case on legislative issues."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Speaks At Dedication Of Alabama Church. The AP (2/21) reports, "The church where four black girls died in a racist bombing in 1963 was honored as a national landmark Monday, with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales recalling their memory amid a new string of attacks against churches in Alabama." The AP continues, "Speaking at the pulpit of Birmingham's Sixteenth Street Baptist Church, Gonzales compared the deadly bombing of the old brick building to a string of arson fires that have hit rural Baptist churches since Feb. 3. … The fires, Gonzales said, are a reminder 'there is still work to be done' in ensuring equal justice and fighting discrimination." The AP adds, "Gonzales called the building 'a catalyst for the cause of justice' as he referred to the children killed when a Ku Klux Klan bomb went off at the Sixteenth Street church on Sept. 15, 1963. … 'We protect this place for them,' Gonzales said during a ceremony where Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton signed a proclamation adding the church to a list of about 2,500 places that carry the title of National Historic Landmark." The AP notes, "The audience included relatives of the four girls who were killed — Addie Mae Collins, Carole Robertson and Cynthia Wesley, all 14, and Denise McNair, 11. … Sixteenth Street Baptist Church was an important meeting place for activists during the civil rights era, and the bombing became a worldwide symbol illustrating the depth of racial hatred in the South at the time. Three Klansman were convicted in the blast, the last in 2002. … Gonzales also was briefed during his trip on a string of fires that has scores of federal and state agents in Alabama checking out hundreds of leads. Investigators have said there does not appear to be a racial motive to the church fires. Some of the churches have had white congregations and others black memberships. … Ten rural, Baptist churches were damaged or destroyed by arsonists in central and west Alabama between Feb. 3 and Feb. 11, and investigators believe at least nine of the blazes were set by two suspects identified as men in their 20s or 30s. … Gonzales called the fire investigation a 'very intensive, collaborative effort.'"

WBRC-TV Birmingham (2/19, 5:03 p.m.) said that the "16th Street Baptist Church is in the spotlight. Tomorrow, US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Interior Secretary Gale Norton will be in Birmingham for an event, declaring the church a national, historic landmark. White racists bombed the church in 1963, killing four young girls." The station added that in the 60's, the "church was used for rallies and marches during the civil rights movement." WAAY-TV Huntsville (2/19, 10:05 p.m.), WXTX-TV Columbus, Georgia (2/18, 9:59 p.m.), WIAT-TV Birmingham (2/17, 9:59 p.m.), WTTO-TV Birmingham (2/17, 9:01 p.m.), and WCFT-TV Birmingham (2/17, 6:09 p.m.), also covered this story.

Agents Probe New Fire At Alabama Church. The AP (2/21) reports, "A suspicious fire did minor damage to the exterior of a small church, but authorities said Monday they don't know whether it was linked to a string of suspected arsons that have damaged or destroyed 10 rural churches in Alabama." The AP continues, "Johnny Chambers, acting chief of the Glencoe Police Department, said members of the joint federal-state task force investigating the cases were still reviewing a blaze that happened early Sunday at Chapman's Chapel. … Like the other ones that burned, the church is small, with fewer than 20 members, and isolated. … But the church is about 75 miles northeast of the nearest of the previous fires, and the fire began outside the building near the ground. The earlier blazes were started inside, mostly near the pulpit."

"Dr. Wu" Gets 11-Year Sentence. The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/18, Soto) reports "Dr. Wu" was hunted by DEA agents for more than two decades. Wu, "a drug trafficker who authorities say ran an international operation while living in a trailer parked near North County beaches was sentenced to 11 years, three months in prison [Friday]. … His legal name is now Baron Michael Angelo Suarez-Rothschild, but he was born Michael Grabarek 55 years ago, authorities said. … He was the centerpiece of 'Operation Dr. Wu,' which led to the arrests of about 30 people on drug trafficking, money laundering and weapons charges in Southern California, Hawaii and elsewhere." Authorities said the drugs, "trafficked through San Diego, were delivered to users in Las Vegas, Detroit, and cities in Florida and Hawaii, as well as Singapore."

More Meth-Related Violence Said To Be Moving Into Dallas. The Dallas Morning News (2/18, Meyer, Trahan) reports that as border violence moves into Dallas, police "are turning up the heat." Michelle Deaver, a spokeswoman for the DEA in Dallas, "said Friday that authorities are investigating more meth moving into the Dallas area from the border. As U.S. lawmakers have made it increasingly tough to acquire a key ingredient in methamphetamine – pseudoephedrine…fewer people north of the border are 'cooking' the dangerous drug. That means more imports."

California City May Face Lawsuits After Outlawing Marijuana Dispensaries. The North County Times (2/19) reports that San Marcos has joined California's "short list," outlawing marijuana dispensaries. The "move sets the city up for lawsuits similar to those leveled on other cities that have enacted bans." San Marcos on Tuesday "became the first city in San Diego County to enact a ban on future dispensaries; one in operation now can stay. The decision came after a December raid by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration turned the spotlight on the Legal Ease Inc. medical marijuana dispensary. The raid was conducted after undercover agents bought marijuana without valid recommendations from a doctor."

16 Charged In Prescription Drugs Investigation. The AP (2/19) reports, "More than a dozen people have been charged with illegally selling prescription drugs, some of which have turned up in several western New York high schools. Officials with the federal Drug Enforcement Administration announced the charges against 16 people accused of selling OxyContin, hydrocodone and other prescription drugs to young people, many of them high school students. Authorities say most of those arrested are in the 19-to-21 age range."

Former Florida Basketball Assistant Sentenced In Cocaine Case. The Tampa Tribune (2/21) reports Former University of Florida basketball staff assistant Major Parker "was sentenced to six months of house arrest Friday after pleading guilty to drug charges. … Parker and Farrah Stephanie Moise were arrested Dec. 7, 2004, for allegedly trying to sell about a pound of cocaine to an undercover Gainesville police officer. According to police reports, Parker and Moise had been the subject of an investigation by the city police and Drug Enforcement Administration agents since November."

The AP (2/18) and Orlando Sentinel (2/18) also reported on this.

Three Arrested In Florida In Opium Investigation. The Naples (FL) Daily News (2/20) reports Moeen Mehri and two other men "were arrested recently after a confidential informant and an undercover investigator set up a drug buy in a Fort Myers hotel room." It was all part of an undercover sting that authorities "said involved the sale of $300,000 worth of opium." According to an affidavit, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration "received a tip from its Boise, Idaho, office about an opium source in Southwest Florida. The Idaho agents had developed an informant who said he could purchase large amounts of the illegal drug from Mehri."

Virginia Meteorologist To Testify Before Federal Grand Jury In Heroin Case. The Roanoke (VA) Times (2/18) reports, "News Director Shane Moreland confirmed that meteorologist Jamey Singleton will testify before a federal grand jury in the ongoing investigation into a heroin organization that allegedly supplied former WSLS-TV weatherman Marc Lamarre with drugs. Lamarre, 36, suffered a near-fatal heroin overdose on the evening of Feb. 2 and is recovering. … Gilbert Dennis Hadden, 21, of Detroit, is being held on federal charges of conspiracy to distribute heroin and distribution of heroin in connection with Lamarre's overdose."

In a separate story, the Roanoke (VA) Times (2/18) also reports, "Not one, but two WSLS (Channel 10) meteorologists -- Marc Lamarre and Jamey Singleton -- have struggled with a heroin addiction in recent months, according to an interview with Singleton that aired on WSLS's late-night newscast Friday.

Report: Syringes, Antidepressants Found During Raids At Turin Olympics. The AP (2/21) writes, "Italian police seized 100 syringes, 30 packages of antidepressants and asthma medication during Saturday's raids at the Austrian biathlon and cross country teams' private lodging at the Turin Olympics. … State broadcaster ORF, citing Italian prosecutor Raffaele Guariniello, said authorities also found equipment used to conduct blood tests and perform blood transfusions."

Reuters (2/20) reports, The International Olympic Committee and Italian police on Monday remained at odds over two anti-doping raids at the quarters of Austrian athletes competing in the Turin Winter Olympics. The IOC says it only found out about the raids on the same evening they took place, but Italian police insist it was a joint operation with the IOC."

The Los Angeles Times (2/21) reports, "The unprecedented weekend police search of Austrian Olympic skiers' quarters could signal a tough new approach in the campaign to eradicate doping in international sports. Authorities seized 30 packages of antidepressants, asthma medication and 100 syringes, some used, Italian state prosecutor Raffaele Guariniello told Austrian television. It was the first time police in an Olympic host nation had raided athletes' quarters during the Games in a search for performance-enhancing substances; until now, enforcement has been handled by sports authorities."

Network TV Coverage. The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 11, 1:55, Pizzey) reported, "Acting on a tip from Olympic officials, Italian paramilitary police raided the quarters of the Austrian cross-country and biathlon teams and suddenly the Winter Olympics were looking more like CSI Torino. An Italian prosecutor said more than a 100 syringes and 30 packs of drugs, including asthma drugs and anti-depressants, were found in the quarters outside the official Olympic Village. The search was sparked when anti-doping officials spotted this man, Walter Mayer, listed as the Austrian team's trainer in spite of being banned from this Olympics and the 2010 games after having been found guilty of doping offenses in Salt Lake City." Dick Pound, chairman, World Anti-Doping Agency: "It's incomprehensible. I mean, I can't understand why a country would have somebody like that identified so publicly with their team." Pizzey: "In a bizarre twist, Mayer drove hundreds of miles back to Austria before the raid. When police found him asleep in his car, he took off again, knocking down a policeman and ramming a roadblock before being caught and sent to a psychiatric hospital for examination. Athletes involved with Mayer were drug tested and if the results from this lab are positive, the dopers will not just be kicked out of the games, they could be charged with a criminal offense under Italian law."

NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 11, 0:30, Williams) reported, "Back here in Torino, a story that continues to get a lot of attention here, the doping scandal involving the team from Austria. The latest bizarre twist in this, the Austrian ski coach, who wasn't supposed to be at these games in the first place, and who then bolted after a surprise raid on the Austrian coaches' housing, well he is now in a psychiatric hospital. Authorities put him there yesterday after he rammed his car into a police roadblock in Austria."

Outgoing Utah US Attorney Pushed Gun Prosecutions. The Salt Lake Tribune (2/21, Gehrke) reports, "When Roosevelt Police Chief Cecil Gurr was gunned down in 2001, state prosecutors went after the gunman. But federal investigators set their sights on Michael Nelson Swett, a convicted felon who had provided the triggerman with the assault rifle used to kill the chief." The Tribune continues, "Swett was convicted of his role in Gurr's death, and sentenced to 10 years in prison. It was an early victory in a major dragnet aimed at cracking down on weapons crimes and getting guns out of the hands of felons, an effort that was the prime focus of U.S. Attorney Paul Warner, who announced this month that he is leaving the post." The Tribune adds, "During seven years in office, Warner's drive to cut down on gun crime resulted in the filing of more than 1,450 weapons-related cases. There was an elevenfold increase in the number of individuals charged with breaking firearms laws in his first three years in office, according to an analysis by The Salt Lake Tribune of Warner's record as U.S. attorney for Utah. … 'You couldn't swing a dead cat and not hit a convicted felon with a gun when we started the program,' Warner said in an interview. 'We've scooped most of the scum off the top of the bucket.'" The Tribune notes, "The program - begun as Project CUFF (Criminal Use of Firearms by Felons) in March 2000 and now called Project Safe Neighborhoods - was prompted in part by a shooting spree at Columbine High School in Colorado that killed 15. President Clinton's attorney general, Janet Reno, sought to make weapons crimes a national priority, and the emphasis continued after President Bush was elected, Warner said. ..In his first full year in office, 1999, Warner's office prosecuted 33 individuals for weapons crimes. By 2003, the number had skyrocketed to 362, a nearly 11-fold increase, according to an analysis of Justice Department data by the Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse at Syracuse University."

Government Said To Be "Throwing Money" At Failing Drug War. A Wall Street Journal editorial (2/21, Melloan) says the war against drugs "rages on with little mainstream challenge of its basic weapon, prohibition." Economist Milton Friedman "predicted in Newsweek nearly 34 years ago that Richard Nixon's ambitious 'global war against drugs' would be a failure. Much evidence today suggests that he was right. … The drug war has become costly, with some $50 billion in direct outlays by all levels of government, and much higher indirect costs, such as the expanded prison system to house half a million drug-law offenders and the burdens on the court system. … That reflects government's tendency to throw more money at a program that isn't working."

IMMIGRATION:

Groups Criticize Speedy Deportations. The New York Times (2/20, Swarns, 1.19M) reports, "As the Bush administration rapidly expands its efforts to detain and deport illegal immigrants, human rights groups warn that people fleeing persecution are increasingly vulnerable to being deported to their home countries." In 2005, "a bipartisan federal commission warned that some immigration officials were improperly processing asylum seekers for deportation. The commission made recommendations to ensure that the system of speedy deportations, known as expedited removal, had adequate safeguards to protect those fleeing persecution." But "one year later, only one of the commission's five recommendations has been put into effect. Meanwhile, domestic security officials have expanded the expedited removal program, in which illegal immigrants are swiftly deported without being allowed to make their case before an immigration judge."

US Cancels More Visas In Fight Against Corruption. The Miami Herald (2/19, Bachelet) reports, "Indicating a sharp increase in visa cancellations, the US Consular Affairs bureau estimates that about 250 senior foreign officials have lost their visas since a January 2004 presidential proclamation to stop the entry of 'persons engaged or benefiting from corruption' went into effect. Many more officials, politicians and relatives have had their visas canceled under older provisions linked to drug trafficking, money laundering and human rights abuses. One State Department official with knowledge of the program said that number was in the 'hundreds.'"

TAX:

Frist Says Capital Gains Tax Cuts Increased Revenue. In a USA Today op-ed (2/21), Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist touts the "supply side" revenue enhancements generated by tax cuts. Frist says, "Ever since the Senate approved the last major tax relief bill, in 2003, revenues have increased every year. In 2004, they went up 5.5%. Last year, they rose 14.5%, the largest increase in nearly 25 years. Total government collections, in fact, increased more after President Bush's 2003 tax cuts than they did after President Clinton's 1994 tax hikes." Frist adds that Republicans' "decision to reduce taxes on capital gains and dividends provides a good case study in effective tax policy."

WPost Criticizes Dynamic Scoring Of Tax Cuts' Budget Impact. The Washington Post (2/21, A14, 744K) reports says in an editorial that while Vice President Cheney touted the supply side argument, he "is the one who needs to reexamine his evidence. Yes, tax policies can help promote economic growth. But no matter how many times the vice president and his tax-cutting allies proclaim their belief in the tax-cut fairy, she doesn't exist. Tax cuts do not magically pay for themselves, bringing in more revenue than they deplete from the treasury." Proponents of "the magic tax cut have long argued that, if only the growth-enhancing effects of cuts were accounted for in the budgetary equation, this cost-free boon would become clear. Trouble is, responsible economists who have attempted to engage in this kind of 'dynamic analysis' haven't come up with the unalloyed positive conclusion the administration wants -- much less the proof of pay-for-themselves tax cuts."

USA Today Criticizes GOP For Seeking Tax Cuts. USA Today (2/21, 2.31M) says in an editorial that the Federal budget deficit "will be in the range of $400 billion this year. That means roughly $1 in every $6 spent by the government will be borrowed money. So a few weeks ago, with great self-congratulatory fanfare, Congress passed and the president signed what was billed as a $40 billion, five-year deficit reduction. Now Congress is weighing tax-cut packages that would wipe out those projected savings almost twice over." But "Uncle Sam doesn't have the money to do any of this." The "fiscally responsible policy would be to roll back some of the tax cuts, particularly those for the wealthiest Americans, or let them expire. But no. Bush and congressional Republicans won't hear of it."

NYTimes Says Bush Budget Omits Negative Information. The New York Times (2/21, 1.19M) says in an editorial that President Bush's "spending and taxing proposals are a mass of missing information. The cost of keeping the military in Iraq and Afghanistan isn't included. Neither, as it turns out, are the usual projections of the long-term effects of proposals to cut $183 billion from domestic programs other than entitlements." But specialists from the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, "an independent watchdog organization," have "backtracked through tables of opaque data and deduced the following: Over five years, veterans' benefits would be cut 13 percent, or $10 billion. Despite all the political talk about energy research and alternate fuels, $4.4 billion would be cut from energy programs. Environmental spending, including for national parks, would be cut 22 percent, or $28 billion; housing, fuel, child care and nutrition programs for the poor and elderly would lose 13 percent, or $24 billion. Topping this surreal concoction is a 13 percent cut — $53 billion — in education and job programs by 2011."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Media Continue To Comment On Cheney's Hunting Accident. Vice President Cheney's accidental shooting of Texas attorney Harold Whittington continued to draw media attention over the weekend, including the covers of two newsweeklies and several of the weekend talk shows. NBC Nightly News (2/19, story 6, 2:35, Seigenthaler) reported the coverage is "focused more on Mr. Cheney's role in the White House." Evan Thomas, Newsweek: "I think it's turning into a story, as so many stories do, of blue states and red states. I mean, the blue states think that Cheney was either slightly a comical figure or somebody who really did something wrong. The red states think this is a press confection, that, you know, the media is just out to get poor Dick Cheney." Seigenthaler: "According to a new 'Time' poll, 52% of the American people approved of the way the Vice President handled the aftermath of the shooting, and his overall job approval number remains largely unchanged at 29%." NBC correspondent David Gregory apologized on Meet the Press for speaking sharply to White House spokesman Scott McClellan, but he "and other Washington journalists contend the White House could have been more forthcoming. Longtime Cheney advisor Mary Matalin disagrees and insists that's only an issue inside the Beltway."

The New York Times (2/20, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports in its "White House Letter" column that Matalin said it had been "a horrible week. She also took blame for the pounding [White House Press Secretary Scott] McClellan took in the briefing room. 'I don't buy that we did it wrong,' she said. 'But I do understand that every day over there is like walking up a mountain with bricks in your backpack, and when something starts the beasts not just growling but flinging themselves against their cages, I feel bad about that, and it's not a good day for him.'"

Meanwhile, in his "Media Notes" column in the Washington Post (2/20, C1, 744K) Howard Kurtz writes, "Nothing makes journalists madder than the feeling that they're not getting the full story -- and the Bush administration has been giving them plenty of practice. On one controversy after another, the White House has been the gang that couldn't shoot straight, buying itself additional rounds of bad publicity by suppressing or delaying embarrassing information."

Degree Of Cheney's Independence From White House Control Sparks Commentary. Vice President Dick Cheney's hunting accident is the cover story in two major news magazines this week. While both magazines provide lengthy reports on the sequence of events before and after the incident, they also tend to focus on Cheney's power in the Bush Administration. Newsweek (2/27, Thomas), which reports that the incident "once again drew attention to the unusual nature of Cheney's power. He remains by far the most powerful vice president in history, and one of the most secretive and mysterious public officials to ever hold such high office in America." A report in Time's (2/27, Gibbs, Allen) cover package agrees, noting that the accident exposed "in the most public way yet the extent to which Cheney runs an independent operation and raise the question of how much the White House can control him -- or wants to. Cheney makes his own rules; he decides what intelligence matters, what secrets are worth keeping and what force is worth using, and he defends his positions with a breathtaking indifference to consequences and to complaint from those who disagree." A separate story in Time's (2/27, Cloud) cover package reports that "there are some unanswered questions about that day. For instance, why hasn't the Secret Service released its report? And why hasn't the local sheriff released the text of the depositions his office conducted?"

Bush, Cheney Teams Seen As Divided. As part of its cover package, Time (2/27, Gibbs, Allen) reports that "even six years in office together has not integrated the Bush and Cheney teams; in fact, in some ways they have grown further apart. … Many on Cheney's staff see Bush's aides as too liberal, while some Bush aides view the vice-presidential staff as wing nuts."

Aides Said To Be "A Little Scared" Of Cheney. In its cover story, Newsweek (2/27, Thomas) reports that Cheney's official staff is "a little afraid of him. NEWSWEEK once asked his press secretary (there have been seven of them since he became vice president) if Cheney went to church on Sundays. The spokesperson confessed she really couldn't ask the veep; the question was just 'too personal.'"

Hunters Raise Questions About Cheney's Actions. A separate story in Newsweek's (2/27, Tuttle) cover package that hunters around the country agreed last week that Cheney "broke a cardinal rule: in that exhilarating moment when the birds scattered up all around him, he didn't check to make sure his line of fire was clear before he pulled the trigger." Newsweek adds that Cheney's admission to having a beer with lunch sparked anger among some hunters, who "follow an iron rule of no drinking at all on the day of a hunt." Some "also complained that Cheney got off with a warning for hunting without a required $7 quail stamp. An ordinary Joe, they said, would have been hit with a stiff fine at least, especially if he had shot someone."

Carter Criticizes Administration's Handling Of Cheney Hunting Accident. Former President Jimmy Carter was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (2/20) about the Bush Administration's handling of Vice President Dick Cheney's hunting accident. Carter said, "Obviously now everybody in the White House, maybe not in the Vice President's office, agrees that they would have been much better had the information about the hunting accident been revealed immediately. Because that's a main concern, I think. Hunting accidents happen all over the world. I regret very much that this one did happen. But to conceal it for almost a full day, obviously -- and then, at first, to blame Mr. Whittington for the accident, I think were two mistakes that were made. And I'm sure almost everyone agrees that it could have been done better."

65% Say Cheney Should Have Taken Immediate Responsibility For Hunting Accident. CNN Live Today

DOJ_NMG_0015591

(2/20, 12:18 p.m.) reported, "Americans are divided over the way Vice President Dick Cheney handled the fallout from that shooting incident. In a Time Magazine poll, 65 percent said the Vice President should have taken immediate responsibility for accidentally shooting a fellow hunter. About half the respondents say they approve of the way the Vice President handled the incident. 42% say they disapprove. When asked of the Vice President is too secretive, 58 percent said yes compared to 33 percent who said no."

Cheney Approval Rating Down To 29% In Time Poll. William Schneider said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/20) that a Time Magazine poll has found that Vice President Dick Cheney's job approval rating "is down to 29 percent. That's down from 51 percent just before the 2004 election. Cheney's disapproval numbers have not changed much."

Bush Braves Subfreezing Temperatures For Bike Rides. President Bush took two bike rides in subfreezing temperatures this weekend. The AP (2/20) reports, "On Saturday, Bush pedaled about 90 minutes at a Secret Service training facility in Beltsville, Md. It was even colder on Sunday when the president, after church, braved temperatures in the low-20s." The AP also reports that Bush watched some of the Winter Olympics while onboard Air Force One on Friday. White House spokesman Trent Duffy said Bush watched the US-Switzerland curling match.

White House Says Bush Enjoyed Olympic Curling. NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 14, 1:00, Williams) reported, "Some long overdue recognition for a sport that is finally growing in popularity. The White House made a point of saying this weekend that while traveling on board Air Force One President Bush watched and enjoyed live coverage of the men's curling competition. By the way, the US beat Switzerland 7-3."

Stevens Said To Anchor "Center-Left Bloc" On High Court. A front page story in the Washington Post (2/21, A1, Lane, 744K) examines the influence of Supreme Court Justice John Paul Stevens, reporting, "At a time of conservative ascendancy on the court, he anchors a four-justice center-left bloc that would probably shrink to three if President Bush could appoint his successor." Stevens's influence "has grown in recent years. He has a knack for building coalitions across ideological lines, and he makes shrewd use of his prerogatives as the senior associate justice."

Snow Urges Congress To Increase Debt Limit. The Washington Post (2/20, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Treasury Secretary John W. Snow told Congress last week that it had begun to use the TSP's government securities fund to keep from hitting the $8 trillion debt limit. He called on congressional leaders to increase the debt limit by mid-March, suggesting that was when the Treasury might not be able to meet its financial obligations. Snow also indicated that TSP investors should not worry about his decision to suspend reinvestment of some TSP assets on a daily basis. In a letter to Capitol Hill leaders, Snow said G Fund participants 'are fully protected and will suffer no adverse consequences from this action.'"

Coburn Seeks Crackdown On Government Conferences. CQ (2/20, Zeller) reports Republican Sen. Tom Coburn "is calling for a broader-ranging crusade against what he sees as a more routine sort of honest graft within the federal government" than the lobbyist-funded junket, the "generously padded professional conference circuit." According to Coburn's research, "federal spending on conferences has gone up 66 percent in the last five years, to at least $294 million in fiscal 2005 — not including expenses from the Interior, Commerce and Veterans Affairs departments, which did not participate in Coburn's study." One of the "chief offenders, as Coburn sees it, is the Health and Human Services Department, which spent $68 million on conferences last year."

Only Fraction Of Low-Income Seniors Signed Up For Drug Plan. The Washington Post (2/21, A1, Connolly, 744K) reports in a front page story that the Bush Administration's "$400 million campaign…to enroll low-income seniors in prescription drug coverage that would cost them just a few dollars per prescription has signed up 1.4 million people, a fraction of the 8 million eligible for the new coverage." By "some calculations, the government is on track to spend about $250 for each person it enrolls, and even then it would have only 2 million poor senior citizens taking advantage of what is perhaps the most generous government benefit available today."

Some Seniors Reject Medicare Plan Because Of Cost. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Fuhrmans, 2.11M) reports that after "weighing the specific plans available to them under the new benefit, some seniors are concluding that they'll end up paying more for the medications they currently take than if they continue with no coverage at all. Taking into account monthly premiums and co-payments -- which under some policies can run as high as 50% to 75% of a drug's retail price -- they think they can get a better or equal deal doing what they've always done: asking doctors for samples and ordering from pharmacies in Canada."

Efforts To Reconcile Pension Reform Bills Proving Contentious. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Schroeder, 2.11M) reports on efforts to reconcile the House and Senate versions of pension reform. The Journal reports, "Even naming the conference committee has been contentious. The Senate is fighting internally over the size of its contingent, with Democrats seeking an extra slot. Because much of the final language will be decided by the committee in closed-door meetings, Senate and House members are being barraged by lobbyists pushing their positions."

Congress Cool To Bush Call For Line Item Veto. The AP (2/21, Abrams) reports President Bush's "request for broad, and constitutionally questionable, authority to control spending by vetoing specific items in larger bills is drawing limited interest in Congress." Bush said line-item veto power "and a movement to curb lawmakers' appetite for special projects, or earmarks, would provide a one-two punch in reducing government spending." But "many lawmakers" are "reluctant to cede more power, particularly to an administration they see as not always treating Congress as an equal partner."

Lobbyist Sought Majority Interest In Contract After Seeking Earmark. The Washington Post (2/21, A3, Babcock, 744K) reports defense contractor Brent Wilkes, who has been implicated in the Randy Cunningham bribery scandal, told San Diego manufacturer Randy Beck that Congress had earmarked "$25 million in the military budget for the Navy to develop an acoustical system. He promised he could win the government contract to develop the system for Beck's Horizon Sports Technologies, according to allegations in a lawsuit." Wilkes "wanted $1.5 million up front to cover his lobbying expenses and a 51 percent interest in a new company they would set up to collect the government cash." Although it is "common for lobbying firms to charge clients large fees to pursue earmarks, Wilkes's demand for a majority interest in the resulting contract is highly unusual, experts said."

Democratic Senators Urge Higher Military Pay Raise Than Proposed By Bush. Ten Democratic Senators have urged the Senate Budget Committee to provide a pay raise too military personnel that is higher than the 2.2 percent increase proposed by President Bush. The Washington Post (2/21, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The senators, in a letter organized by Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), call President Bush 's pay proposal 'a paltry increase' that 'neglects the value of their service and the very real challenges of recruiting and retaining an all-volunteer military in time of war.' … The senators did not propose a specific pay increase for the armed forces next year but urged the Budget Committee to support 'a pay increase that meets the needs' of military personnel."

Administration Accused Of Not Taking Responsibility For Mistakes. The New York Times' Paul Krugman (2/20) writes that the top figures in the administration are not "mensches," which he defines as "an upstanding person who takes responsibility for his actions." Krugman adds, "Officials in this administration never take responsibility for their actions. When something goes wrong, it's always someone else's fault.'

Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac Spent $23 Million On Lobbying In 2005. Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac spent almost $23 million on lobbying last year as Congress considered measures to tighten oversight in response to accounting scandals at the two companies. The Washington Post (2/20, D1, Shin, 744K) reports, "Freddie Mac spent $12.6 million on lobbying, down from $15.44 million in 2004 but still enough to place it 11th among corporations that so far have filed lobbying disclosure forms for 2005, according to the Web site PoliticalMoneyLine. … Fannie Mae spent $10.1 million, up from $8.78 million in 2004 -- an increase that puzzled some campaign finance experts given Fannie Mae's pledges to cut back its extensive lobbying network."

Disclosure Seen As First Step Towards Lobbying Reform. The Washington Post's Jeffrey Birnbaum (2/20) writes that one lobbying proposal that has significant bipartisan support, which is: "Citizens should be able to find out easily who's lobbying their elected representatives."

According to Birnbaum, "A growing number of people in both parties are pushing for a mega-disclosure provision as part of an effort to revise the capital's ethics laws." Cited as supporters of such a proposal are: House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas, and Sen. John McCain.

Protesters Gear Up For Rove Appearance At West Virginia Fundraiser. The Charleston (WV) Daily Mail (2/20, Thompson) reported, "Controversial presidential adviser Karl Rove is coming to Charleston this week, and local protesters are gearing up for his visit. Rove will be here Thursday for a $50-a-ticket fundraiser for the" state GOP at the Charleston Civic Center." Carrie Swing, president of Patriots for Peace, an anti-war organization, "said more than 100 members of the group will gather" outside of the convention center. The group "will display a wall of remembrance, a series of plastic panels containing names of the 2,273 soldiers who have died in the war."

Debate Over Anonymous Sources Reflects Tension Between Officials, Media. The Washington Post (2/21, A13, Lee, 744K) reports on the use of anonymous sources by reporters. The Post notes the debate over anonymous sources reflects the "tension between federal officials and the press at a time when the media's credibility is under assault, in part because the public believes journalists rely too heavily on anonymous sources in reporting and writing articles about Washington. … The demand for anonymity by officials leaves journalists grappling with an unpleasant trade-off: use the information and risk alienating readers with more unnamed sources, or leave it out and risk having a less informative article that fails to match those done by competing news organizations." The Post notes, "Agencies cite any number of reasons for keeping names out of the press: allowing lower-level officials to be quoted might steal the spotlight from the Cabinet secretary or other high-ranking official; the briefers are policy wonks who are uncomfortable talking to reporters; the agency is involved in an issue, but in a supporting role; the officials are there to provide context or technical explanations as a courtesy, not to be the face of an agency. … 'The vast majority of the Justice Department's briefings are on the record with the only exceptions being briefings that require the department's attorneys to explain highly technical and complex legal issues that require wordy responses not conducive for reporters to use on the record anyway,' Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, wrote in an e-mail response to questions. He added that most of those briefings 'take place after a DOJ official has already spoken on the record.'"

Cohen Says Administration Intimidating Potential Leakers. Richard Cohen writes in the Washington Post (2/21, A15, 744K) that the Bush Administration used its secrets "to construct a false case for war. … And now the administration is pursuing a policy of chasing down leaks by chasing down the reporters who get those leaks." Cohen adds, "It used to be that the government went to some pains to avoid asking a journalist about his sources. No more. … The result can only be a further sense of intimidation -- a message to potential sources that they had better keep their mouths shut."

Marcus Says White House Prefers "Its Own Truth." Ruth Marcus writes in the Washington Post (2/21, A15, 744K) that recent developments, including Vice President Dick Cheney's hunting accident and the Administration's handling of Hurricane Katrina "have reinforced and broadened the image of "an insular White House headed by an incurious president. … This White House prefers its own truth to the inconvenient facts. Layer onto that a chain of command mentality and a CEO-delegator president and, when reality hits -- whether in the form of a difficult war, a killer storm or a misfiring veep -- it's not terribly surprising that the White House has a hard time adjusting."

Kristof Says Cheney, Rumsfeld Should Resign. Nicholas Kristof writes in the New York Times (2/21, 1.19M) that President Bush can "rehabilitate himself to some degree -- if he acts quickly and decisively to reshuffle his administration and approach to governing." Among the changes recommended by Kristof are the resignations of Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Kristof adds that Bush should nominate a Democrat to replace Rumsfeld.

Critics Say State Department Reorganization Used To Demote "Disloyal" Officials. The Washington Post (2/21, A4, Kessler, 744K) reports a State Department "reorganization of analysts involved in preventing the spread of deadly weapons has spawned internal turmoil, with more than half a dozen career employees alleging in interviews that political appointees sought to punish long-term employees whose views they considered suspect." Senior State Department officials "deny that and say an investigation has found that the proper personnel practices were followed. But three officials involved in the reorganization, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to comment publicly, acknowledge that a merger of two bureaus reduced the influence of employees who were viewed by some political appointees as disloyal to the administration's policies." The employees "who say that they have been targeted once had a back channel to then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell and his deputy, Richard L. Armitage, who they said would on occasion ask them to bypass their superior, John R. Bolton, now the ambassador to the United Nations."

Historians Criticize Efforts To Reclassify Documents. Intelligence agencies have been removing thousands of historical documents from public view under a seven year old secret program at the National Archives. The New York Times (2/21, Shane, 1.19M) reports that the restoration of classified status to the documents began in 1999 but "because the reclassification program is itself shrouded in secrecy…it continued virtually without outside notice until December." The Times adds that historians "say the program is removing material that can do no conceivable harm to national security. They say it is part of a marked trend toward greater secrecy under the Bush administration, which has increased the pace of classifying documents, slowed declassification and discouraged the release of some material under the Freedom of Information Act."

Activist Says Congressional GOP Has Given Up Trying To Stop Government Growth. The Washington Times (2/21, Hallow, 90K) reports on M. Stanton Evans, who has been "at the center of the slowly building force of conservatism for half a century." Evans 'is fed up with a Congress that he has struggled for years to populate with Republicans. 'The Republican Party in Congress basically has given up on stopping the growth of big government,' he says. 'They're adding to the problem almost daily with their earmarks and their pork.'"

Conservative Authors Offering Opposing Assessments Of Bush. Michiko Kakutani writes in the New York Times (2/21, 1.19M) that conservative authors Bruce Bartlett and Fred Barnes offer opposing views of President Bush in their new books. Barnes "views Mr. Bush as 'a president who leads,' an action-oriented 'visionary,' an executive who combines 'F.D.R.'s cool optimism' and Teddy Roosevelt's 'pugnacity and determination.'" Bartlett "sees Mr. Bush as a 'pretend conservative' – 'a partisan Republican, anxious to improve the fortunes of his party' but 'perfectly willing to jettison conservative principles at a moment's notice to achieve that goal.'"

Dionne Says Government Should Expand Opportunities For Disadvantaged. E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (2/21, A15, 744K), "Ron Sims, the county executive in Washington state's King County, believes government's job is 'to help create wealth more efficiently.'" His view "reminds Democrats that a commitment to active government is not simply about redistributing wealth. It is also rooted in the historically sound insight that effective government has always been essential to robust economic growth. Government, in the Sims formulation, should be a dynamic player in our nation's economic life." An Urban Institute Study notes that while policymakers "have spent much energy on the problems facing single mothers, they have done little about the disadvantages facing young men." Dionne adds, "The Urban Institute authors can be read as bringing Sims's practical focus on government's role in wealth creation to the task of expanding opportunities for the least fortunate among the young. This is good public policy. My hunch is that it could also be good politics."

WSJournal Praises Bush Health Care Reform Proposals. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.11M) editorializes, "The more we look at the fine print in the health-care reforms President Bush is now stumping for, the more we see the potential for the most sweeping and beneficial changes in half a century." The Journal adds that Bush's reforms are "HillaryCare in reverse," adding that the President "has assembled an ambitious and mutually reinforcing set of health reforms."

NYTimes Says FDA Should Investigate Possible Cancer Risk Of Aspartame. An editorial in the New York Times (2/21, 1.19M) calls on regulators to examine the artificial sweetener aspartame in the wake of a report that says it may cause cancer. The FDA "has asked the Italian researchers for a detailed rat-by-rat report, not just the overall results made available so far. The Ramazzini group has an obligation to make its full findings public quickly if it expects regulators to take urgent action."

OTHER NEWS:

Investors Focused On May Fed Meeting. USA Today (2/21, Shell, 2.31M) reports that the May 10 meeting of the Federal Reserve is "likely to put investors on edge. … The reason: The May meeting is likely to provide investors with their first insights into the Fed's personality under [Chairman Ben] Bernanke and offer the best clues on when the Fed might stop raising rates." The meeting will be the first where "the 'Bernanke factor' will be in play." While it is "unclear whether the Fed will raise rates at this meeting," it could "shed light on whether the Fed is done raising rates."

Professor Says Bernanke Will Take Monetary Policy Off Front Page. Stanford University economic professor Robert Hall writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.11M) that Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke "is completely committed to continuing the policy of a stable dollar. Under his leadership, the Fed is likely to make this commitment more formal, perhaps even stating a target such as 2.5% inflation. Mr. Bernanke has been outspoken on the point that inflation must be kept at the target -- it is as bad a failure of policy if it drops below as if it exceeds the target." Hall adds that Bernanke "will stick to his mandate to keep the dollar stable. Monetary policy will recede from the front page to the inner pages of the C section under Mr. Bernanke's leadership."

Big Firms Increasingly Hit With Overtime Suits. The Washington Post (2/21, D1, Masters, Joyce) reports, "Large employers around the country, from retail giants Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and Lowe's Cos. to tech firms IBM and Electronic Arts Inc., are being hit with state and federal lawsuits alleging that they systematically failed to pay overtime to hundreds or even thousands of employees. … And many of the cases are bearing fruit." The Post continues, "Earlier this month, Swiss financial giant UBS AG agreed to pay up to $89 million to settle several state and federal lawsuits filed by financial advisers who were improperly classified as exempt from overtime. Insurer Allstate Corp. agreed last fall to pay up to $120 million to nearly 3,000 claims adjusters in California. Janitors who cleaned stores for Southern California grocery chains Albertsons, Ralphs and Vons won a $22.4 million settlement in 2004. … Although there are no comprehensive statistics, actions filed under the Fair Labor Standards Act -- most of which are overtime cases -- shot up 86 percent between 2000 and 2004, to 3,617, according to the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts. In contrast, labor cases in general rose 30 percent over the same period, the most recent for which figures are available." The Post adds, "There also has been an upsurge in multi-plaintiff overtime lawsuits in New York, California, Illinois and other states that have tough overtime laws and class-action rules that are favorable to plaintiffs, lawyers said. … The suits stem from state and federal laws that require employers to pay time-and-a-half to workers who put in more than 40 hours a week. Salaried managers and independent contractors are exempt -- unless their salaries fall below a certain threshold. Exempt categories are carefully defined to prevent employers from simply using the titles for workers to avoid paying overtime."

Wave Of Presidential Bios Aimed At Popular Audiences Noted. The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Brownstein, 958K) reports on a tide over the past 15 years of presidential biographies "aimed at a popular rather than scholarly audience has surged onto bestseller lists." A dozen or so presidential books by David McCullough, Joseph J. Ellis, Doris Kearns Goodwin, Richard Reeves, Robert Dallek, Robert A. Caro and Edmund Morris "have spent about 300 weeks combined on the USA Today list of 150 bestselling hardcover and paperback books."

Clinton Says Presidents Shared Common Vision Of A "More Perfect Union." Rob Brownstein writes in the Financial Times (2/20) that the "popular success of these biographies reflects the resurgence of the presidency as the central focus in US political life since Ronald Reagan's election in 1980." Former President Bill Clinton "probably consumed presidential biographies as voraciously as any president. … His largest conclusion, he said, was that the greatest presidents, from Washington and Lincoln to both Theodore and Franklin Roosevelt, shared a common vision of 'a more perfect union' that knit together the country and broadened the circle of opportunity."

Clinton Offers Four Tests For Ranking Presidents. In his column in the Los Angeles Times (2/20, 958K), Ron Brownstein writes about a recent interview with former President Bill Clinton about "his reading, how it affected his approach to the presidency and the way he thinks historians should judge presidents." On "the way historians rank presidents," Clinton said, "I really think the circumstances determine where you are ranked -- whether you have big wars, like the Civil War or World War II. But there are three or four tests you can apply to any president, which are much fairer than ranking them where the deal is rigged based on the time in which they served. First, did they understand their times and articulate a vision of a more perfect union? Did they refrain from abusing their power? Then you have to say, Did they execute (their agenda), and were people better off when they stopped than when they started?"

Oral Histories Of Reagan Available On Internet. The University of Virginia's Miller Center of Public Affairs has compiled oral histories from friends and former advisers of President Ronald Reagan and is making them available on the internet. The Washington Post (2/20, A19, 744K) reports, "In conjunction with the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library, the Miller Center has been interviewing Reagan administration officials since 2001 and recently released more than 2,500 pages of transcripts. The interviewees include such well-known figures as former secretary of state George P. Shultz, former defense secretary Caspar Weinberger, Reagan treasury secretary and White House chief of staff James A. Baker III and longtime Reagan political adviser Stuart Spencer, as well as lesser-known officials who had close access to the president and who provided intimate reminiscences of his presidency. … A link to the transcripts can be found at http://www.millercenter.virginia.edu ."

Former Aides Remember Reagan. The Washington Post (2/20, A19, 744K) runs remembrances of Reagan from former members of his Administration including former Defense Secretary Frank C. Carlucci who discussed Reagan's "detached style," saying, "When Colin [Powell] succeeded me [as national security adviser], and [Secretary of State] George [Shultz] and I had buried the hatchet, the three of us made a conscious decision. George said: 'Ronald Reagan has had the landing lights on and the flaps down for the last year. Now we're going to have to step up to the plate on foreign policy. The only way it's going to work is for the three of us to agree.' … George and I changed positions a number of times in those meetings because we decided if the three of us agreed, we knew we had Ronald Reagan. That's the way foreign policy was basically conducted. "

Poll Shows Decline In Number Who Back Clinton Bid, Rise In Rice Support. The San Antonio Express-News/Hearst Newspapers (2/20, Powell) reported, "Growing numbers of Americans oppose a presidential bid by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., in 2008 -- and favor a run by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice -- amid broad public willingness to elect a woman president, according to a nationwide poll released Sunday. The Presidents Day survey conducted for Hearst Newspapers by the Siena Research Institute of Siena College in Loudonville, N.Y., covered 1,120 registered voters and was completed Feb. 10. Some 48 percent of survey participants said Rice 'should run' for president at the conclusion of President Bush's two terms -- an increase of 6 percentage points over a similar survey a year ago. Meanwhile, "44 percent of survey respondents now say Clinton 'should not run' for president in 2008 -- up from 37 percent who felt that way last year. The percentage of registered voters who say Clinton 'should run' slipped from 53 percent to 51 percent over the past year, as support for a Rice candidacy increased, from 42 percent to 48 percent. The survey found 79 percent of participants were willing to vote for a woman as president and 64 percent said the nation is 'ready' for one. … The margin of error for the survey in both years was 2.9 percentage points."

The New York Daily News (2/21, Mahoney, 729K) notes that Democratic strategist Hank Sheinkopf said the Siena survey should be another reminder that Clinton "needs to begin stressing populist messages on improving the economy. … 'She needs to do better with white Catholic men from the Midwest,' Sheinkopf said."

Santorum Mortgage From Philadelphia Bank Raises Eyebrows. In a largely negative article, the Philadelphia Daily News (2/21, Bunch) reports that Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum (R) "and his wife received a $500,000, five-year mortgage for their Leesburg, Va., home from a small, private Philadelphia bank run by a major campaign donor -- even though its stated policy is to make loans only to its 'affluent' investors, which the senator is not. Good-government experts said the mortgage from The Philadelphia Trust Co." would "be a violation of the Senate's ethics rules if Santorum received something a regular citizen could not get." Records show that since 1998, Philadelphia Trust's "executives, directors and their spouses have donated $24,000 either to the senator's campaign or to the America's Foundation PAC. Of that total, $13,000 came from the man who signed the mortgage papers -- Philadelphia Trust CEO Michael Crofton -- and his wife." Though Philadelphia Trust "advertises itself as an independent private bank for 'affluent investors' -- who have liquid assets of at least $250,000,"

Santorum "has never held an investment portfolio with Philadelphia Trust. And in 2002, the year he obtained the mortgage, the value range he gave for his small number of investments could not have exceeded $140,000."

California Bar Exam Seen As One Of Nation's Toughest. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Dolan) reports, "Former San Francisco Board of Supervisors President Angela Alioto won't even say how many times she failed the California bar examination before she finally was licensed to practice law. … 'Consider it to be several,' said the antidiscrimination lawyer and daughter of the late, famed antitrust lawyer, Joseph Alioto. … 'And understand,' she quickly added, 'that for the last two years in a row I have been nominated as a national trial lawyer of the year.'" The Times continues, "Add two former governors, an eminent legal scholar and a former state Supreme Court justice to the ranks of those, like Alioto, who learned the hard way that obtaining a license to practice law in California is hard. In fact, it's harder than in almost every other state." The Times adds, "Of the 5,260 people expected to take the state's bar examination beginning Tuesday, more than half are likely to fail, rates from previous years indicate. Some law school graduates, like Alioto, flunk the bar multiple times before finally passing and becoming lawyers. … Failing the bar can be a crushing and humiliating experience, particularly when the applicant has spent months studying or is unaccustomed to failure. … Kathleen Sullivan, former dean of Stanford Law School and a former Harvard Law School professor, is considered such a legal superstar that news of her flunking the California bar last year made the front page of the Wall Street Journal. Sullivan remains a full law professor at Stanford and is associated with a private law firm. … Sullivan's failure, while a surprise to the legal community, attests to the exam's challenge. California's bar 'is one of the most difficult,' said Erica Moeser, president of the National Conference of Bar Examiners. … The three-day test is longer than other states' exams. The score needed to pass also is one of the highest, a factor Moeser believes may explain why applicants are significantly more successful in New York than in California, the states with the largest numbers of people taking the bar."

Man Finally Practicing Law After 48 Bar Attempts. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Dolan) reports, "The record for most attempts at passing the California bar exam may be held by Maxcy Filer, 75, who took the exam 48 times. He estimates that he spent about $150,000 on bar preparation classes, motels and test fees from 1966 to 1991, when he finally passed. Filer now practices law in Compton and takes 'anything that walks in the door except bankruptcy and probate.'" The Times adds, "The lawyer's hurdles are not over, however. Last year, Filer got into trouble with the bar for failing to file a required document in a legal case. … The bar placed him on probation and ordered him to take and pass a two-hour test on legal ethics and rules of professional conduct."

AMA To Develop Performance Standards. The AMA has signed an agreement with Congress to draft more than 100 standard measures of performance which doctors will report to the federal government. The New York Times (2/21, Pear, 1.19M) reports, "The deal comes as the Bush administration pushes "pay for performance" arrangements with various health care providers in an effort to publicize their performance and link Medicare payment to quality. And it mirrors efforts in the private sector, where consumer groups, insurance companies and large employers who pay for health care are demanding more information on the quality of care."

Rice Works Phones Before Mideast Trip. On the eve of her departure for the Middle East, Reuters (2/21) reports, Secretary Rice "spoke on Monday with key foreign mediators in the Palestinian peace process after Israel stepped up pressure on the new Hamas-dominated Palestinian parliament by halting tax transfers. State Department spokesman Noel Clay said Rice held discussions with her counterparts in the Quartet -- big-power mediators the United States, European Union, Russia and the United Nations." USA Today/AP (2/21, Lester) also reports "Monday's conversations between Rice and representatives of Russia, the European Union and the United Nations 'covered issues of support to the Palestinian people,' State Department spokesman Noel Clay said."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/21, LaFranchi, 61K) notes Secretary Rice, "arrives in Cairo Tuesday on the first stop of a trip aimed at addressing the delicate issue of Hamas -- with decisions pending on dealing with the Palestinian Authority that are as portentous as almost any the Bush administration has made on Middle East affairs. How the administration handles the militant group's role in a Palestinian government will permeate President Bush's democratization program for the Middle East. ... And if the United States gets the Hamas riddle wrong, it could set back the war on terror by buoying the cause of Islamic radicalism across the Muslim world."

In a separate story, Reuters (2/21) reports Egypt will advise Rice "to give the Palestinian militant group Hamas more time and not to rush to judgment when Hamas forms a government, the state new agency MENA said on Monday." Quoting a diplomatic source, the state news agency reported, "Egypt will assert during the talks (with Rice) that it is important to give the Hamas movement a chance and time when it forms the government and not to rush to make judgments on it."

Meanwhile, contrasting US calls for reductions in aid to a Hamas-led Palestinian government, the Washington Post (2/21, A10, Wilson, 744K) notes, "Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, called on Muslim nations Monday to fund the Palestinian government after Hamas takes control of the cabinet." Khamenei is quoted saying, "The only way to succeed is to continue resistance against the occupier regime." The AP (2/21, Nasrawi) reports Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood made similar calls.

Hamas Premier Pick Will Extend Olive Branch To Fatah. The Washington Times/AP (2/21, Barzak) reports, "Hamas presented a pragmatic former university administrator as its choice for Palestinian prime minister Monday and the Islamic militant group reached out to Fatah and other factions to join a broad-based Cabinet that might stand a chance of gaining international approval. The 43-year-old Haniyeh "told reporters after meeting with Abbas that he would try to form a joint government with Fatah, the traditional Palestinian ruling party that Hamas trounced in the election, 'that can shoulder its responsibilities in the political area and internal issues.' So far, Fatah has refused to join." In a separate story, the AP (2/21, Weizman) calls Haniyeh a "pragmatist who prefers compromise to conflict with Palestinian rivals." Meanwhile, the New York Times (2/21, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "With an Israeli military helicopter circling overhead, Hamas opened talks on Monday with other militant factions on forming the new Palestinian government, a process expected to take at least two weeks."

Former US Official Proposes "Upgrade" Of Israel's Ties To NATO. In a Washington Post (2/21, A15, 744K) op-ed, former Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs Ronald Asmus writes, "The best way to provide Israel with that additional security is to upgrade its relationship with the collective defense arm of the West: NATO. Whether that upgraded relationship culminates in membership for Israel or simply a much closer strategic and operational defense relationship can be debated. ... What must be clear is that the West is prepared to match the growing bellicosity against Israel by stepping up its commitment to the existence of the Jewish state."

Exit Polls Following Palestinian Election Were Incorrect. Columnist Carl Bialik writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.11M) that exit polls following last month's Palestinian elections indicated the Fatah ruling party had scored a narrow victory over Hamas. The exit polls "had missed badly, far worse than, for instance, exit polls for the 2000 and 2004 U.S. presidential elections." Two of the pollsters, "who have been reviewing the results since the election, have different explanations. One suspects that Hamas strategically gamed the polling numbers to suppress Fatah worries. But another blames himself for failing to properly analyze the data, a mistake exacerbated by an unusual election system that magnified small differences between the two leading parties."

Arabs Nations Will Push Back On Hamas, Iran During Rice's Visit. As Secretary Rice prepares to visit the Middle East this week, Reuters (2/20, Hudson) reports that she "will face resistance from Arab allies...to enlist their support for a campaign to isolate two US adversaries, Hamas and Iran." Arab powers "such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia oppose Hamas' rejection of peace talks with Israel and fear a nuclear-armed Iran. But they are reluctant to explicitly support America in the Middle East, where US backing for its top ally in the region, Israel, angers many Arabs and clouds governments' cooperation with Washington." According to Reuters, "Complicating her mission, Rice will also make her appeal against a backdrop of deadly anti-Western protests in the Muslim world over cartoons published in Europe of Prophet Mohammad."

In its pre-trip coverage, AFP (2/20) says, "The US administration has made Egypt one of its test cases for the promotion of democracy in the Middle East. Rice said earlier this week that she was 'disappointed' that Mubarak has postponed municipal elections, scheduled to be held in April, for two years. 'The message that I will take to Egypt is that Egypt needs to stay on the democratic course,' she told Arab journalists in an interview. 'It needs to keep pushing ahead on the democratic course.'"

Hamas' Government Likely To Include Technocrats, Academics. Time (2/27, Robinson) examines what sort of rule Hamas is likely to establish. Time reports, "Palestinian insiders say the new government will be stocked with technocrats and academics rather than party ideologues. The job of Prime Minister is likely to go to Ismail Haniya, one of the more moderate top leaders." Hamas leaders "say they intend to impose order on the security apparatus, a move that may spark clashes between loyalists of the two parties."

Arab League Tries To Shore Up Palestinian Funding. In a related story, the AP (2/20, Nasrawi) reports, "The head of the Arab League said Sunday that members would meet this week to hammer out a plan for sending millions of dollars a month to the Palestinian Authority, despite US attempts to stop the flow of money to the new Hamas-led government. Secretary-General Amr Moussa said foreign ministers from several Arab countries were to meet Monday in Algiers to examine a plan to send about $50 million a month to the Palestinian Authority." According to the AP, "The money is part of Palestinian funding the Arab League approved last year — before Hamas' election victory."

Israeli Cabinet Cuts Off Tax Flow To Palestinians. After a Hamas-dominated legislature was sworn in on Saturday, the New York Times (2/20, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "The Israeli cabinet decided Sunday to immediately freeze the transfer of about $50 million a month in tax and customs receipts due to the Palestinian Authority." Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was quoted as saying, "It is clear that in the light of the Hamas majority in the parliament and the instructions to form a new government that were given to the head of Hamas, the Palestinian Authority is in practice becoming a terrorist authority. ... The state of Israel will not agree to this." The Washington Post (2/20, A1, Wilson, 744K) notes that "some of the more harsh options" were not included, "including barring Palestinians in the Gaza Strip with work permits from entering Israel for jobs. But together, the measures threaten to collapse the nearly bankrupt Palestinian government." The move by Israel "puts it at odds with ... the quartet. ... The group had recommended that Israel continue the transfers, an arrangement established under the 1993 Oslo accords, until Hamas forms the new cabinet," which should happen within five weeks. USA Today (2/20, Gutman, 2.31M), Los Angeles Times (2/20, Ellingwood, 958K) and Washington Times (2/20, Mitnick, 90K) run similar stories.

Meanwhile, USA Today (2/20, 2.31M) editorializes, "For all the disappointment that elections brought Islamists to power, the smart approach is to try to make Hamas accountable to the Palestinian people." That "requires patience and wisdom in a volatile situation -- and not doing anything rash that would allow Hamas leaders to make the United States a scapegoat for their own failings."

Haniya Will Be Palestinian Premier. AFP (2/20) reports, "The radical Islamist movement Hamas has chosen Ismail Haniya to be the next Palestinian prime minister after its recent landslide election win, the spokesman for their bloc in parliament has said." President Mahmoud Abbas was to be notified of the move by Hamas late Sunday.

Carter Urges Consideration Of Palestinian People. In an op-ed in the Washington Post (2/20, A21, 744K), former President Jimmy Carter writes, "During this time of fluidity in the formation of the new government, it is important that Israel and the United States play positive roles. Any tacit or formal collusion between the two powers to disrupt the process by punishing the Palestinian people could be counterproductive and have devastating consequences." He concludes, "It would not violate any political principles to at least give the Palestinians their own money; let humanitarian assistance continue through UN and private agencies; encourage Russia, Egypt and other nations to exert maximum influence on Hamas to moderate its negative policies; and support President Abbas in his efforts to ease tension, avoid violence and explore steps toward a lasting peace."

Bush Administration "Muddling" Toward Compromise In Middle East. Newsweek (2/27, Hirsh, Peraino) examines the Bush Administration's "grand democracy project in the Mideast." US officials "say they have no common strategy for handling the various Islamist parties flourishing in the newly tilled democratic soil of the Middle East." The Administration "is muddling its way toward compromise solutions."

Syria Condemns US "Interference" In Its Domestic Affairs. The Washington Times (2/20, Mount, 90K) reports the government of Syria "condemned U.S. plans to fund opposition groups." The Times notes that the State Department announced on Friday "that it had allocated $5 million to unidentified 'democratic reformers' in Syria. Syrian Foreign Minister Walid al-Moualem complained that "It is interference in our internal affairs."

US Ambassador To Iraq Says Iran Aiding Insurgents. The Washington Post (2/21, A10, Hernandez, 744K) reports, "The US ambassador to Iraq accused Iran on Monday of providing weapons, training and support to Iraqi militia and insurgent groups responsible for the country's continuing violence and instability." At a news conference, Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad "criticized what he called Iran's 'negative role' in Iraqi affairs, saying the country's diplomatic relationship with its neighbor was tainted by a policy 'to work with militias, to work with extremist groups, to provide training and weapons.' He added that there was evidence the Iranians provided 'indirect help' to Sunni Arab insurgents who attack US and Iraqi government troops." Khalilzad's remarks "were unusually blunt." The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Stack, 958K) called the comments "unusually sharp. In the past, American diplomats in Baghdad have generally avoided overt, public criticisms of Iran. Instead, they stuck to vague grumblings about 'neighboring countries.'"

Iran-Russia Enrichment Talks Stall. The New York Times (2/21, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "A Russian effort to forge a compromise over Iran's nuclear program stalled Monday after five hours of talks in the Kremlin ended inconclusively" and "senior officials on both sides played down the prospects of agreement before a meeting of the [IAEA] on March 6 about whether Iran's nuclear program should be forwarded to the United Nations Security Council for possible punitive action." The Washington Post (2/21, A10, Finn, 744K) cites RIA Novosti as reporting, "But even as the nearly five-hour talks in Moscow were underway, Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said Iran would proceed with its nuclear research." Mottaki is quoted saying, "If we reach some compromise, we continue our cooperation from where we are now. That is, the research department will continue its activity." A late Reuters (2/21) story reports an Interfax news agency claim that Iranian negotiators "were poised to leave Moscow on Tuesday with no word of any progress" on the Russian proposal. Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov publicly warned the press Tuesday not to assume the talks were finished.

Bolton Says Iran Nuclear Issues Can Be Resolved Diplomatically. Time (2/27, Shannon, Ratnesar) interviews John Bolton, US Ambassador to the United Nations. Asked if the issue of Iran's nuclear program can be resolved diplomatically, Bolton said, "Sure. I never would have guessed that Libya was prepared to make the calculation that they were safer giving up the pursuit of nuclear weapons than continuing to go after them, and yet they did [give them up]. And that led to substantial progress in the relationship between Libya and the United States. If Libya can do it, Iran can do it too. That's why I say the decision ultimately is largely in their hands."

Pakistani Government Cracks Down On Cartoon Protestors. The AP (2/20) reports that protests over blasphemous cartoons in Islamabad, Pakistan were met with "hundreds" of arrests as Pakistani security forces "virtually sealed off the capital and used gunfire and tear gas." Pakistani authorities "declared they would arrest anyone joining a gathering of more than five people." Qazi Hussain Ahmad, leader of the Islamic opposition coalition, "was confined to his Lahore residence."

The Washington Post (2/20, A11, Lancaster, 744K) notes that "In keeping with the pattern elsewhere in Pakistan, protesters directed as much of their anger at Musharraf and his main Western ally, the United States, as they did at the newspaper cartoons and the Danish newspaper that printed them." The Post claims the violence yesterday was the worst "since the cartoon controversy erupted in late January" and "came after a week of sometimes violent protests in other Pakistani cities that left five people dead and scores of businesses, many of them Western franchises, in ruins."

Second Russian Newspaper To Close Over Muslim Cartoons. A second Russian newspaper has announced that it will close on the wake of protests over cartoons depicting the Prophet Muhammad. The New York Times (2/21, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "The newspaper, Our Region, based in Vologda, north of Moscow, which printed its illustration last Wednesday, was the first in Russia to publish, at least in part, the Danish cartoons. The publication prompted criticism from public officials, an apology from the local governor and a criminal investigation into the paper's activity."

Pakistan Riots Elevate Security Concerns For Bush Visit. U.S. News and World Report (2/27, Omestad) reports that turmoil in Pakistan over European cartoons satirizing the prophet Muhammad have elevated the "already high security concerns surrounding President Bush's scheduled visit here next week, and it highlights the political pressures on [Pakistani President Pervez] Musharraf from Islamists and others critical of his support for American antiterrorism efforts." US News adds that the Bush Administration "has been pushing Musharraf to keep moving toward a restoration of full democracy -- but not too hard. … Washington's jitters over a Pakistan without the general are barely concealed. … Critics insist that Washington is shortsighted in not backing democratic political parties and is alienating Pakistanis incensed at civilian deaths in the war on terrorism."

Australian PM Criticizes "Segments" Of Muslim Community. In comments published yesterday, Australian Prime Minister John Howard said some segments of the Islamic community are "utterly antagonistic" to Australian society. The AP (2/21, Foley) reports that the remarks "immediately drew criticism from a Muslim group." Later Monday, Howard stood by the remarks in which he also "denounced 'extreme attitudes' held by some Muslims, including their views on women and support of jihad, or holy war." Agence France Presse (2/21) reports, "Islamic leaders immediately condemned the remarks as 'offensive and ignorant', saying they would fan the flames of prejudice against Islam."

Bolton Pushes Annan For Broader-Based Darfur Force. Reuters (2/21, Leopold) reports, "US Ambassador John Bolton said on Monday that Secretary-General Kofi Annan should be pushing UN officials harder in planning a force in Sudan's Darfur region rather than just lobbying the United States for contributions. 'It would be helpful, I think, if the secretary-general, in addition to prodding the US, could also be out there talking to the African Union and the Arab League, and in fact, even talking to his own peacekeepers about the importance of moving ahead here,' Bolton told reporters. When told of Bolton's remarks, Annan said, 'I'm not going to answer that.' But his spokesman Stephane Dujarric said the UN 'planning process was moving full speed ahead.'" Meanwhile, the AP (2/21) notes, "Sudan told a visiting US delegation that it opposed a proposal to deploy international peacekeepers to the troubled Darfur region and that it was committed to negotiations to end the tensions there." Vice-President Ali Osman Mohamed Taha is quoted as saying, "Sudan rejects replacement of the African Union forces with United Nations forces."

Trade Deficit Seen As Impetus For Administration Hard-Line On Chinese Currency. The Financial Times (2/20, Balls, Alden) reports that the US government is increasing pressure on the Chinese government to allow its currency to "rise against the dollar," and notes there are "threats growing in Congress to consider legislation aimed at slowing the burgeoning US trade deficit with China." According to the Times, the Bush administration is "disappointed" the renminbi has only been "allowed to rise by less than 1 per cent against the dollar" since July when the US successfully petitioned for revaluation. Wu Xiaoling, vice-governor of the People's Bank of China, "admitted that Beijing needed to open its capital account further."

The Wall Street Journal (2/20, Browne, Phillips, 2.11M) says on its website that the Administration "is sending signals that it is ready to take a harder line with Beijing" and attributes the new stridency to "political pressure on the administration from members of Congress, who say American jobs are being lost to the tide of inexpensive Chinese imports and the flight of manufacturing to China." The Journal notes US Trade Representative Rob Portman "announced a task force to take up complaints about unfair Chinese trade practices" and the Treasury Department, "which has so far sought to avoid confrontation with Beijing over the currency issue, is preparing the ground for a possible decision to label China a 'currency manipulator,' in a regular review scheduled for April."

Asian Shoemakers Prepare To Fight EU Tariffs. Shoemakers in China and Vietnam are joining forces to fight the EU's proposed double-digit tariffs on shoe imports. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Fong, 2.11M) reports, "The European Commission, finding evidence of dumping, is expected to recommend duties on imports of Chinese and Vietnamese shoes with leather uppers starting at 4% in April and rising to a little under 20% in the fall. EU officials confirmed yesterday that they will submit their plans to EU member nations on Thursday."

Blogs Have Undermined China's Ability To Control Who Addresses Public. A front page story in the Washington Post (2/21, A1, Pan, 744K) reports that with 16 million people in China writing blogs, "the Internet has provided a platform for citizens to express their views, shattering the Communist Party's monopoly on the media. The state still controls newspaper, magazine and book publishing, but the proliferation of sites that let users publish and even broadcast audio and video online have undermined the party's ability to restrict who can address the public and attract an audience."

Smith Bill Would Restrict Business With Countries That Censor Web Content. U.S. News and World Report

DOJ_NMG_0015602

(2/27, Brush) reports on US web companies such as Microsoft, Google and Yahoo which have agreed to filter their search results in order to provide service in China. US News reports that Rep. Chris Smith has introduced legislation to restrict business with countries that censor online material. Smith's bill "would require US companies to locate their computer hardware outside China, create a basic code of conduct for Internet companies doing business in repressive countries, curtail tech exports to countries with censorship policies, and create a State Department office of Internet freedom. The State Department announced such a task force last week."

Nigerian Militants Attack Pipeline, Threaten More Violence. Nigerian militants yesterday launched attacks on an oil pipeline and a boat in Nigeria's delta region. The AP (2/21, Harris) reports, "There were no reported casualties in the attacks Monday on a Shell-oil operated oil pipeline switching station and a boat the militants claimed housed Nigerian military personnel. … Shell Spokeswoman Lisa Givert confirmed the oil-pipeline attack and said the houseboat was abandoned when the attackers blew it up."

Reuters (2/21, Ekeinde) reports, "The militants, who are holding nine foreign hostages, vowed to prevent Royal Dutch Shell from using the damaged Forcados tanker loading platform, which accounts for 15 percent of Nigerian exports, and threatened an even more devastating series of attacks on the whole region."

NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 6, 0:25, Williams) reported, "Since the beginning of the sabotage campaign last week, Nigerian production has been cut off by 1/5. Crude prices in London jumped more than $1.50 and there is great concern about a spike in prices when the US markets reopen tomorrow."

The Financial Times (2/20, Mahtani, Hoyos) reports Nigerian militants "threatened to extend their disruption of the country's oil industry to attacks on oil tankers." Over the weekend, militants carried out a series of attacks and kidnappings that caused the shutdown of an oilfield and Royal Dutch Shell to close one of its export terminals. The attacks "have led to a 25 per cent cut in oil exports from the world's eighth biggest crude exporter, a reduction likely to put upward pressure on prices when markets reopen today."

The Washington Post (2/20, A11, Chidi, 744K) reports the militants "asserted responsibility…for a series of raids, including one in which militants abducted three Americans, two Egyptians, two Thais, a Briton and a Filipino.'

Haitian President-Elect Has Yet To Give Victory Address. The New York Times (2/20, Thompson, 1.19M) reports that though Haitian President-elect René Préval was declared the winner of his country's presidential election Thursday he "has not yet officially addressed the nation, and he has not yet granted interviews." Préval "faces questions about the legitimacy of the back-room deal brokered by foreign diplomats that ended the possibility of a runoff and made him the victor."

Préval Distances Himself From Aristide. The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Williams, 958K) reports Préval's frequent appearances with Robert Manuel, national security chief during Préval's first administration, are seen as proof that Préval is no longer beholden to Jean-Bertrand Aristide because Aristide's associates forced Manuel into exile after he uncovered their connections to drug dealers. According to the Times, "Préval appears to be sending a message that Aristide shouldn't count on an invitation to return home any time soon."

Preval Inherits "Quagmire" Of Poverty, Violence In Haiti. The Washington Post (2/21, A9, Roig-Franzia, 744K) reports that Renee Preval will wade into a "quagmire" next month when he is sworn in as Haiti's president. Preval "will be forced to confront the problems of a nation with almost no functioning judicial system, corrupt and inept law enforcement, deep poverty and abominable public sanitation. Then there are the violent gangs that rule urban slums, the kidnapping rings and a flourishing drug and money-laundering trade."

LATimes Says US Should Increase Haitian Aid. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (2/20, 958K) says that "President Bush should ramp up aid to Haiti" because if Preval's government fails, "boatloads of Haitians could once again begin washing up on Florida's shores," which could lead to increased drug trafficking into the US. President Bush should also be concerned with the "possibility that Venezuelan President Chavez…may decide to share some of his oil wealth with Haiti's poor, thus competing with Washington for influence in our hemisphere. But the primary reason we should help Haiti is that it is a humanitarian disgrace on our doorstep."

Administration Tries To Improve Relations With Bolivian President. The Washington Post (2/21, A9, Constable, 744K) reports that the Bush Administration is hoping Bolivian President Evo Morales, an "avowed leftist," is "a man with whom it can do business." The Post adds, 'In reaching out to Morales despite his antagonistic track record, and despite strong objections from some quarters of the U.S. government, analysts said, the Bush administration is trying to avoid mistakes that have been made with two other countries: Venezuela and Afghanistan. … Cultivating Morales, analysts said, would show that Washington has the confidence to distinguish between nominal and real adversaries, while combating many Bolivians' mistrust of U.S. motives."

European Authorities Worried Over Spread Of Avian Flu. NBC Nightly News (2/19, story 7, 0:30, Williams) reported, "There are real and spreading concerns here in Europe over bird flu. Today in Germany, the new chancellor there visited a region where the flu has been spreading. French authorities testing more birds in an affected area, searching anyone who could be carrying poultry and British officials are warning the public to be vigilant."

India Undertaking Massive Poultry Slaughter. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, 2.11M) reports on its website the Indian government has begun slaughtering "hundreds of thousands" of chickens after reporting its first bird-flu cases. Additionally the government "said yesterday it had found no case of human avian influenza after preliminary tests on a dead farmer earlier suspected to have been the country's first human victim of the disease."

European Poultry Industry Faces Ruin. The Washington Post (2/20, A14, Solanki, 744K) reports European poultry farmers say consumption has already fallen dramatically "and caused hundreds of millions of dollars in losses."

Experts Alarmed By The Flu's Rapid Dissemination. The New York Times (2/20, Kumar, Rosenthal, 1.19M) notes that health experts have predicted "widespread dissemination" of avian flu "for about half a year. … But the recent acceleration has perplexed many experts, who had watched the A(H5N1) virus stick to its native ground in Asia for nearly five years.

India Slaughters Chickens Following Bird Flu Reports. India has slaughtered thousands of chickens following reports of avian influenza. The New York Times (2/21, Kumar, Bowley, 1.19M) reports that "as state animal husbandry workers went about culling birds here on Monday, poultry farm owners hovered nearby, some angrily disputing the government's conclusions that large-scale poultry deaths in the area were the result of bird flu."

The Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.11M) reports, "Health officials began a door-to-door check in western India for signs of people infected with the H5N1 bird-flu virus, as a massive poultry-slaughtering operation entered its second day. Six people, including three young children, with flu-like symptoms were hospitalized yesterday, joining a woman and a child who were placed in an isolation ward the previous day."

NYTimes Urges Aid To Fight Bird Flu In Africa. The New York Times (2/21, 1.19M) editorializes, "Bird flu has spread to several new countries in recent days, but the most worrisome by far is Nigeria. Health experts have dreaded the arrival of avian flu in Africa, a continent where the backyard chicken is everywhere and veterinary health systems are nowhere. … Rich countries should be sending platoons of veterinary experts to help Nigeria and its neighbors."

US Prepared To Begin Direct Trade With Turkish Cypriots. The US is prepared to begin direct trade with northern Cyprus for the first time in 30 years. The Washington Times (2/21, Kralev, 90K) reports that the Greek-Cypriot government in Nicosia opposes some of the steps the US is prepared to take "as 'creeping recognition' by the Greek-Cypriot government in Nicosia. … Washington and London have called for permitting direct trade to pass through northern Cypriot ports, while Nicosia wants the goods to be taken by truck to southern ports controlled by the internationally recognized Republic of Cyprus government. Opening ports in the north would be de facto recognition of a Turkish-Cypriot state, said Euripides Evriviades, the Cypriot ambassador in Washington."

British Historian Pleads Guilty To Denying Holocaust. British historian David Irving pleaded guilty yesterday to denying the Holocaust, conceding that he wrongly said there were no Nazi gas chambers in the Auschwitz concentration camp. The Washington Times/AP (2/21, Oleksyn) reports that Irving "was sentenced to three years in prison." Irving "has been in custody since his November arrest on charges stemming from two speeches that he gave in Austria in 1989 in which he was accused of denying the Nazis' extermination of 6 million Jews. He has contended that most of those who died at concentration camps such as Auschwitz succumbed to diseases such as typhus rather than execution." The New York Times also runs the AP story this morning.

Germany Resists US Effort To Open Holocaust Files. The New York Times (2/20, Cohen, 1.19M) reports that the US government's "demand" to open "a huge repository of information about the Holocaust contained in the files of the International Tracing Service" has been met with resistance by German officials concerned about breaches of privacy.

Senators Urge Code Of Conduct For Doing Business With Repressive Regimes. Sens. John McCain and Jon Kyl write in USA Today (2/21, 2.31M), "The free flow of information has always threatened repressive regimes, and dictators have always sought to restrict it. The Internet is a new challenge for these regimes because it empowers with information and speech any person who can access the network." McCain and Kyl add, "We believe that American companies must develop and agree to abide by a code of conduct governing their interactions with repressive regimes, and we applaud the suggestion by some companies that they will consider such a step. … There is every hope in the Congress that U.S. companies will take action on their own. But however this problem is solved, it's clear that something must change. Americans stand with those who oppose tyranny, not those who promote it."

WPost Criticizes Administration Response To Egyptian Election Postponements. An editorial in the Washington Post (2/21, A14, 744K) says Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak tried and failed twice last year "to stage a democratic election that would impress the Bush administration as credible without risking his hold on power." Mubarak "figures that the tide in Washington has turned against President Bush's democracy policy. … The election-quashing prompted only a tepid statement from Ms. Rice's spokesman, who said the administration opposed the postponement of elections 'as a matter of principle' but added, in an echo of the administration's critics, that 'democracy is not only about elections.'"

Analysts Say Chavez Intensifying Anti-US Rhetoric Ahead Of Elections. The Financial Times (2/21, Webb-Vidal) reports on 'the saga of deteriorating ties between the US and Venezuela." Over the weekend, Venezuela President Hugo Chávez warned Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "against trying to build an international alliance to curb his government's expanding tentacles of influence across Latin America. … On Friday, he insisted that the US would receive 'no more oil' if it 'crossed the line' in its supposed efforts to undermine his 'revolution.'" Analysts "believe some of the recent provocations come because Mr Chávez is seeking to radicalise his anti-imperialist credentials ahead of elections in December."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/21, Sreeharsha, 61K) reports that Chavez "as spent much of this month warning of a possible US invasion, preparing a citizen army, and lambasting President Bush. His rhetoric has made him a darling of leftists worldwide. Yet, ordinary Venezuelans...are growing increasingly frustrated with the country's inadequate housing, under-resourced public hospitals, and damaged roads."

Chavez Taunts Rice. In a story picked up by three wire services, AFP (2/20) reports, "Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez launched a new verbal attack against US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, bluntly warning her: 'Don't mess with me, girl'" during his weekly "Hello President" television show. Chavez "has taken potshots at Rice since she called last week for an international 'united front' against Venezuela and described the leftist leader as a 'challenge to democracy' in Latin America." AFP later reports Chavez "has called" President George W. Bush 'Mr. Danger.'"

Marines Aid Rescue Efforts After Mudslide Hits Philippine Town. US Marines are assisting the efforts to aid victims of the mudslide on the island of Leyte in the Philippines. The story was the lead on both CBS and NBC last night. The CBS Evening News (2/19, lead story, 2:05, Mitchell) reported, "American Marines are in the Philippines where they spent the day digging for survivors from that huge mudslide that wiped away an entire village. As many as 1800 people may have been killed." CBS (Petersen) added the Marines "brought in what will be the first of waves of supplies, and as many as a thousand Marines are being made available from US ships in the Philippines on military exercises. Despite the sheer scope of the devastation, the Marines were confident they can help."

NBC Nightly News (2/19, lead story, 2:30, Potter) reported that the Marines "will help with relief efforts and will play a major role in the hunt for victims."

Failing To Reach Nuclear Agreement Could Hinder US-India Relations. Henry Sokolski, executive director of the Nonproliferation Policy Education Center in Washington, writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.11M) that as the Bush Administration prepares for the President's visit to India, it must "resist making a proposed civilian nuclear cooperation deal the primary theme of future relations with India, or one that requires immediate agreement. Indeed, failing to get this nuclear deal right could not only encumber improved U.S.-India relations, but aggravate the very security threats…that we are seeking India's help to mitigate."

Bush Administration Critic Is Daughter Of Indian PM. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Wonacott, 2.11M) reports that ACLU staff attorney and Bush Administration critic Amrit Singh is also "the youngest daughter of Manmohan Singh, prime minister of India. Mr. Singh, 73 years old, will host President Bush at a summit in New Delhi early next month. While the soft-spoken Indian prime minister and his daughter share views on many issues, according to acquaintances, their public personas stand on opposite sides of the debate over the Bush administration's foreign policy."

At Least 66 Mexican Coal Miners Trapped After Explosion. The CBS Evening News (2/19, story 2, :15, Mitchell) reported, "Rescuers in northern Mexico are trying to reach at least 66 miners trapped after a coal mine explosion."

NBC Nightly News (2/19, story 2, 0:30, Williams) reported, "At least 6 others outside the mine were injured by the same blast. Officials say the miners are about 1,000 feet underground with limited oxygen, putting their lives in extreme danger."

Thousands Of Irish Immigrants Leaving The US. The Washington Post (2/20, A3, Garcia, 744K) reports the "Irish immigration boom that revitalized neighborhoods across New York over the past two decades" has been halted by stepped-up immigration law enforcement post-9/11. The Irish government "estimates that about 14,000 Irish returned from the United States since 2001." The Census Bureau reported "between 2000 and 2004, the Irish population throughout the United States shrank by 28,500 people, to 128,000."

Ten Killed In Crash Of Marine Helicopters At Horn Of Africa. The CBS Evening News (2/19, story 4, :15, Mitchell) reported, "The US military confirmed today that ten crew members were killed in Friday's crash of two Marine helicopters off Djibouti on the Horn of Africa. Rescuers picked up two men from the water. The helicopters were on a training mission when they crashed."

Canadian Provinces Allow Some Private Health Insurance. The New York Times (2/20, Krauss, 1.19M) reports Quebec "proposed to lift a ban on private health insurance for several elective surgical procedures, and announced that it would pay for such surgeries at private clinics when waiting times at public facilities were unreasonable." The proposal "came in response to a Supreme Court decision last June that struck down a provincial law that banned private medical insurance." Prime Minister Stephen Harper "is thought to favor the Supreme Court decision and will probably try to use it to encourage changes."

Wolfowitz's Campaign Against Corruption Noted. The Washington Post's Sebastian Mallaby (2/20) writes that after nine months as president of the World Bank, Paul Wolfowitz "has made headlines mainly by provoking a staff backlash." However, Mallaby notes that "In a series of tough decisions, some of which have been widely reported and some of which have not, Wolfowitz has challenged" the bank's approach to government corruption. Wolfowitz "is going to be tough on corruption, and he's going to push this campaign beyond the confines of the World Bank."

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 41

TERRORISM NEWS:

Administration Seeks To Build Hill Support For NSA Wiretapping Program. The New York Times (2/20, Stolberg, Sanger, 1.19M) reports, "After two months of insisting that President Bush did not need court approval to authorize the wiretapping of calls between the United States and suspected terrorists abroad, the administration is trying to resist pressure for judicial review while pushing for retroactive Congressional approval of the program." The Administration "opened negotiations with Congress last week, but it is far from clear whether Mr. Bush will be able to fend off calls from Democrats and some Republicans for increased oversight of the eavesdropping program, which is run by the National Security Agency."

The Washington Post (2/20, A8, Babington, 744K) reports, "At two key moments in recent days, White House officials contacted congressional leaders just ahead of intelligence committee meetings that could have stirred demands for a deeper review of the administration's warrantless-surveillance program, according to House and Senate sources." In both cases, "the administration was spared the outcome it most feared, and it won praise in some circles for showing more openness to congressional oversight." But "the actions have angered some lawmakers who think the administration's purported concessions mean little. Some Republicans said that the White House came closer to suffering a big setback than is widely known, and that President Bush must be more forthcoming about the eavesdropping program to retain Congress's good will."

The AP (2/20, Riechmann) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, "standing firmly with the White House on the administration's eavesdropping program, said Sunday he doesn't think new or updated legislation is needed to govern domestic surveillance to foil terrorists. 'I don't think that it does need to be rewritten, but we are holding hearings in the Judiciary Committee right now,' Frist said on CBS' 'Face the Nation.'" Frist also "said he didn't think a court order is needed before eavesdropping, under the program, occurs." Meanwhile, speaking on "Fox News Sunday," Sen. Lindsey Graham "said there is bipartisan consensus on Congress to make FISA, which was written in the 1970s, more flexible, establish more congressional oversight into such surveillance and preserve judicial review, or the need for a warrant in certain cases." USA Today (2/20, 2.31M) also runs a brief report on Graham's comments.

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (2/20, Waterman, 90K) reports, "Another House Republican committee chairman has joined criticism of the Congressional Research Service for its legal analysis of the administration's program of counterterrorist electronic surveillance." Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican and chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, "wrote to the service's director, Daniel P. Mulhollan, earlier this month." In the letter, Sensenbrenner "says he asked two legal scholars to review the 44-page Jan. 5 CRS memorandum on the surveillance program -- which analyzed the administration's legal rationale for the program as laid out at that time and found it wanting."

White House Board On Civil Liberties Has Not Met. The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Schmitt, 958K) reports on "a little-known board" at the White House whose purpose is to "ensure that privacy and civil liberties are protected in the fight against terrorism." The board was created by the intelligence overhaul that President Bush signed into law in December 2004. But, more than a year later, the board "exists only on paper." The Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday "took a first step toward standing up the fledgling watchdog, approving the two lawyers Bush nominated to lead the panel. But it may take months before the board is up and running and doing much serious work. Critics say the inaction shows the administration is just going through the motions when it comes to civil liberties."

Specter Drafting Bill To Curtail Bush Surveillance Powers. The Washington Times (2/21, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter is drafting legislation to curtail President Bush's warrantless surveillance program that the president touts as a tool to stop and capture terrorists." Senate Select Committee on Intelligence Chairman Pat Roberts "said last week that the White House had reached an 'agreement in principle' with congressional leaders to include more lawmakers in the oversight of the program." But Specter's bill "would go further." He "wants to place the entire program under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) court, which is responsible for granting warrants for domestic surveillance in pursuit of foreign intelligence. He also has suggested that the program should expire without express congressional approval every 45 days."

Passaro Trial Could Shed Light On Detainee Tactics. The Miami Herald (2/21, Weaver) reports, "Abdul Wali was an Afghan man who U.S. authorities suspect launched rocket attacks against a military base in Afghanistan. David Passaro was an American hired by the CIA to interrogate detainees during the U.S. war in that country." The Herald continues, "On June 21, 2003 -- three days after surrendering to military authorities -- Wali was found dead inside a U.S. detention facility in Asadabad, near the Pakistani border. … Today, Passaro, a former CIA contract worker, stands accused of beating Wali so badly with a flashlight that he eventually died. Passaro, who faces up to 40 years in prison, is the first U.S. civilian to be charged in federal court with mistreatment of a prisoner overseas." The Herald adds, "Heading the government's case against Passaro is Michael 'Pat' Sullivan, a veteran Miami federal prosecutor. … For Sullivan, a hardened trial lawyer known for taking down major drug defendants, the Passaro case puts him on an international stage. He has the delicate job of defending the Bush administration's controversial detainee interrogation policy while prosecuting an alleged criminal affiliated with the CIA. … Passaro's indictment on four assault charges was announced with fanfare by Attorney General John Ashcroft in Washington on June 17, 2004. … The North Carolina man was indicted just weeks after pictures were broadcast worldwide that showed U.S. soldiers smiling and joking at Iraqi prisoners at Abu Ghraib near Bagdhad, who had been stripped naked, tortured and humiliated, purportedly to extract intelligence from them. Several male and female U.S. soldiers have since been convicted on charges of prisoner mistreatment at courts-martial."

9/11 Panel Aides Did Not Believe Cheney's Testimony. Newsweek (2/27, Thomas) reports in its cover story that Vice President Dick Cheney testified to the 9/11 Commission that on the morning of the attacks he spoke with President Bush before giving an order to shoot down a hijacked airliner that appeared headed toward Washington. A source "close to the commission…says that none of the staffers who worked on this aspect of the investigation believed Cheney's version of events. A draft of the report conveyed their skepticism." But the report was toned down after a "prolonged battle" with top White House officials, including chief of staff Andrew Card and then White House counsel Alberto Gonzales." Newsweek adds, "The factual narrative, closely read, offers no evidence that Cheney sought initial authorization from the president. … Legally, Cheney was required to get permission from his commander in chief, who was traveling (but reachable) at the time."

Hughes Calls Abu Ghraib Abuse An Aberration. The AP (2/19, Sukhtian) reports Under Secretary Hughes, in an Al-Arabiya interview given on arrival in Dubai Sunday, said "abuse of prisoners in Iraq was a crime and did not reflect US policies in the Middle East." Alluding to the Abu Ghraib photo controversy, Hughes "said the US should not be judged by the actions of a few." Last week in Doha, the AP said, Hughes "spoke out…against caricatures of the Prophet Mohammed that have sparked protests across the Muslim world but she condemned the violence that has broken out during demonstrations, leaving at least 45 people dead." In Sunday's interview, she "accused extremists of using the cartoon controversy to ignite a clash of civilizations." AP's coverage of the Al-Arabiya interview was the first significant U.S. press mention of Hughes' Middle East trip.

Hughes Defends Guantanamo Conditions, Calls Detainees "Warriors." The AP (2/20, Fam) reported on an interview Under Secretary Hughes gave to Al-Jazeera in which she "defended the conditions at the prison at Guantanamo Bay and said the detainees were not criminals, but warriors." Hughes "said the about 490 prisoners held in Guantanamo were arrested for waging a war against the United States or for helping al-Qaida or the Taliban in their wars." The AP said Hughes claimed the United Nations report condemning conditions and practices at the facility "was written by people who did not visit Guantanamo," and said Hughes defended the treatment of detainees there. Those detainees "were people who have made public their intention to kill as many Americans as possible and that the U.S. government had a right to defend its citizens. She added that some of those released from Guantanamo have immediately gone back to fighting and killing Americans."

ABC World News Tonight (2/20, story 4, Vargas) reported "television viewers in the Arab world are hearing a message from the United States. It comes in the person of Karen Hughes, President Bush's long-time close adviser," who is in the Middle East "to win hearts and minds." ABC said Hughes "believes a better relationship with the Arab media power house is critical to improving the US image," and called her "conciliatory" and her audiences "skeptical." Hughes was shown saying audiences "don't understand the reason behind the policy, in some cases." ABC reported, "But part of the problem, of course, is even when people in the Middle East hear the rationale or even understand it, it doesn't go very far. Most of her intended audience doesn't agree with it."

Carter Agrees With UN Report On Guantanamo Prison. Former President Jimmy Carter was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (2/20) if he agrees with a UN report which urges the US to shut down the prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba as quickly as possible. Carter said, "I've agreed with that since we first found out that torture and oppression was being perpetrated against the prisons at Guantanamo Bay." Carter added that "the best thing that the United States can do for our own reputation and for justice in the world and for the honoring of human rights is to shut down Guantanamo Bay prison, as was recommended by the United Nations."

More Commentary On UN Report. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.11M) editorializes, "We won't waste your time on the study itself, which largely rehashes factual and legal allegations we've seen and rebutted before, and whose authors never actually visited Guantanamo. … A more interesting question is why this report was produced in the first place: We are still waiting for the Commission's reports on the human-rights picture in, say, Syria. But there's no mystery here, since the only purpose the Commission actually serves is to deflect criticism of actual human-rights abusers by heaping invective on the US and Israel."

Navy General Counsel Opposed Policy On Torture. The New York Times (2/20, Golden, 1.19M) reports, "One of the Pentagon's top civilian lawyers repeatedly challenged the Bush administration's policy on the coercive interrogation of terror suspects, arguing that such practices violated the law, verged on torture and could ultimately expose senior officials to prosecution, a newly disclosed document shows." The lawyer, Alberto J. Mora, "a Republican appointee who retired last month after more than four years as general counsel of the Navy, was one of many dissenters inside the Pentagon." The Washington Post/AP (2/20, A3) runs a similar report.

More Commentary On Torture Issue. Gerald L. Zelizer, rabbi of Neve Shalom and a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors, writes in USA Today (2/20, 2.31M), "The conversion that many religions have undergone in upgrading their moral stance on torture can be instructive to governments such as our own." Torture "degrades the victim, but it also degrades the society condoning it. Rationales such as the greater good or self-defense are slippery slopes. The definition of self-defense becomes looser and looser, and the greater good more arbitrary."

Columnist Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (2/20, 1.19M), "Terrible things were done to Maher Arar, and his extreme suffering was set in motion by the United States government. With the awful facts of his case carefully documented, he tried to sue for damages. But last week a federal judge waved the facts aside and told Mr. Arar, in effect, to get lost. … If kidnapping and torturing an innocent man is O.K., what's not O.K.?"

Treasury Department Freezes Assets Of Islamic Charity. The Washington Post/AP (2/20, A5) reports, "The Treasury Department ordered U.S. banks to freeze assets of an Ohio-based group that the government says funnels money to the militant organization Hamas." The organization, KindHearts of Toledo, "was connected with the Hamas-affiliated Holy Land Foundation and the al Qaeda-affiliated Global Relief Foundation, the Treasury Department said yesterday."

Supporters Rally For Al Arian's Release From Jail. The St. Petersburg Times (2/20, Gershman) reports that on Sunday outside the Hillsborough County jail, over a hundred supporters of Sami al Arian protested his ongoing confinement after his acquittal "on eight of 17 charges related to financing and promoting Middle East terrorism." Civil rights advocates visited al Arian the jail and addressed the crowd, some of whom "held signs with messages such as 'McCarthyism Is Alive And Well In Tampa, FL' and 'If They Won't Free Him, What Was The Trial For?'"

Al Arian Says Ongoing "Persecution" Ignores Will Of Jury. In an interview with the University of South Florida Oracle (2/20, Blackburn), Sami al Arian denounced his continued incarceration saying, "They still want to spend the taxpayers' money and continue this persecution without any regard to what the jurors said and observed and commented. I'm disappointed in that, had I not been a Palestinian and a Muslim and an Arab, things would have been extremely different."

Germany Investigating Its Possible Role In Rendition. The New York Times (2/21, Van Natta, 1.19M) reports, "For more than a year, the German government has criticized the United States for its role in the abduction of a German man who was taken to an American prison in Kabul, Afghanistan, where he said he was held and tortured for five months after being mistaken for a terrorism suspect." German officials "said they knew nothing about the man's abduction," but yesterday "in Neu-Ulm near Munich, the police and prosecutors opened an investigation into whether Germany served as a silent partner of the United States in the abduction of the man, Khaled el-Masri, a German citizen of Arab descent who was arrested Dec. 31, 2003, in Macedonia before being flown to the Kabul prison."

Senior Al Qaeda Operative Profiled. The Washington Post (2/20, A1, Vick, 744K) reports on Louai Sakka, "a senior operative for al Qaeda and intimately linked to major terrorist plots in Turkey, Jordan and Iraq, where he had worked beside Abu Musab Zarqawi, a longtime confederate." He "showed up in Antalya last summer with tens of thousands of dollars in cash and a face altered by plastic surgery. After his arrest, he told investigators he had planned to die steering a yacht laden with explosives into a cruise ship he believed was filled with U.S. soldiers and which was already approaching across the turquoise Mediterranean." Sakka "played a role in the so-called millennium plot to attack hotels in Amman, Jordan, on Dec. 31, 1999." Turkish prosecutors also "describe him as the planner of the 2003 truck bombings that killed 57 people in Istanbul, financed with $160,000 in al Qaeda funds."

Report Examines Al Qaeda Employment Contract. Time (2/27) reports in its "Notebook" column on a report from the Combating Terrorism Center at West Point, which analyzes 29 al-Qaeda documents. Among the documents "is an employment contract that outlines for potential recruits the need for loyalty concerning 'legitimate duties like jihad' and also details such matters as vacation time (five days a month for bachelors), salary (700 rupees extra for every wife) -- even sick days. Is the document authentic? The Department of Defense and West Point have studied it carefully and believe it is."

CIA Intelligence Analysis Said To Be Politicized. In a Los Angeles Times op-ed (2/21), Danielle Pletka, vice president of foreign and defense policy studies at the American Enterprise Institute, comments on the volume of commentary on "how the Bush administration ignored internal predictions of post-war instability, terrorism and rising Islamism in Iraq. Intelligence, critics argue, was 'cherry-picked' to bolster the argument for war. What much of the public doesn't realize is that the CIA's Monday-morning quarterbacks, who originated many of the complaints, are themselves handpicking intelligence to boost their antiwar cause." The American people "should be certain that their democratically elected leaders are making decisions based on unbiased intelligence. They won't get that from today's CIA."

PATRIOT ACT:

Concerns About Privacy Drive Patriot Act Debate. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (2/21, Gibson) reports, "While police groups in Florida urge swift congressional renewal of the USA Patriot Act, some peace advocates have joined critics across the country who say the anti-terrorism law abuses civil liberties and stifles dissent." The Sun-Sentinel continues, "The Senate swept aside a filibuster attempt last week to clear the way for passage of the act, probably on March 1. The House is expected to add its approval quickly." The Sun-Sentinel adds, "Recent disclosures of domestic eavesdropping have clouded the debate over the Patriot Act. Forged in the fearful aftermath of the 2001 terrorist attacks, the act has become a test of how to secure the nation while preserving individual liberties. … 'I hope whatever they [members of Congress] pass is a good balance been privacy and public safety,' said David Murrell, executive director of the Florida Police Benevolent Association in Tallahassee, one of several police groups that support renewal of the act. … 'We are still a democratic society and should not operate like a totalitarian government. Maybe it [the original act] did go too far, as far as individual liberties and the right to privacy is concerned. But we all know it's a new world. Threats are out there, and things like the Patriot Act are needed to address a new situation.'" The Sun-Sentinel notes, "Some dissenting groups in Florida are convinced that government agents have infiltrated and spied upon them. The groups contend that the act reflects a pattern of repression designed to intimidate critics of the Bush administration. … 'I don't think the Patriot Act has protected us at all. It has circumvented our civil rights and made it more dangerous to be an American citizen because of your politics,' said Richard Hersh of Boca Raton, leader of The Truth Project Inc., a Palm Beach County group that tries to counter military recruitment in high schools. 'Spies can go in anywhere and report back to a highly politicized government about the activities of citizens when they are simply exercising their constitutional rights.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

White House Criticized Over Handling Of Port Management Company Sale To UAE Firm. The Administration is taking criticism from members of both parties for its handling of the proposed $6.8 billion sale of the firm that manages six US ports to Dubai Ports World, a firm controlled by the government of the United Arab Emirates. The story was the lead on ABC and CBS, which prominently quoted Democratic Sens. Charles Schumer and Robert Menendez and Republican Rep. Peter King, opponents of the deal, and Sen. Joseph Lieberman, who cautioned against rejecting the deal simply because of the firm's Arab ownership. ABC World News Tonight (2/20, lead story, 2:50, Raddatz) reported the proposed sale said has generated a "political firestorm," even though a "task force from 12 US agencies, including the Department of Defense, the FBI, and the Coast Guard, approved the $6.8 billion deal." Some "members of Congress say if the Administration does not listen to their concerns, they will try to have this contract frozen."

NBC Nightly News (2/20, lead story, 2:30, Williams) reported, "The Bush White House is being asked to reconsider its decision" that would allow the sale to Dubai Ports World. NBC (P. Williams) added Democratic Sens. Charles Schumer and Robert Menendez "now say it should be illegal to do what the Bush Administration has done, allow a company based in and controlled by the government of the UAE, the United Arab Emirates." The US "now considers" UAE "an ally in the war on terror, but those in Congress who oppose the deal note that some of the money for the 9/11 hijackers went through UAE banks and two of the hijackers were from there."

The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 4, 0:35, Schieffer) reported "there has been a storm of protests," and Sens. Hillary Clinton and Robert Menendez "said they will introduce legislation to bar any foreign company from operating a US port facility." Sen. Robert Menendez was asked on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/20) about legislation he plans to offer with Sen. Hillary Clinton to block the deal. Menendez said, "First and foremost, we want the President to say no to this deal. We have only to March 2nd, and that gives us 10 days. And the president can actually obviate this deal, and I think he should. And if he fails to do so, what our legislation will basically stand for the principle that the ports of the United States should not be in the control and operation of a foreign government."

Menendez said on MSNBC's Countdown with Keith Olberman (2/20), "This is a foreign government that owns this company, not a private company. … And in this particular case, the United Arab Emirates has a history that we should be concerned about, two of the hijackers on September 11th came from there. … This is the country that the 9/11 commission said was a fountain of resources for Al Qaeda. And lastly, and probably the most concerning, when we think about the issue of the port, this is the country in which the Pakistani scientist actually smuggled elements of nuclear components to Libya, to North Korea, and to Iran. If they can't do a good job in their own country, of making sure that there was security so it wouldn't become a transit point, why should we let them operate the ports of the United States?"

CNN's The Situation Room (2/20, Blitzer) reported that the Bush Administration is defending a deal to give a company based in the United Arab Emirates management of six major ports in the US. The Administration says the deal "was thoroughly vetted and that the UAE is a key ally in the war on terror." CNN (Henry) added that House Homeland Security committee chairman Peter Hoekstra is urging President Bush to block the deal. Fox News' Special Report (2/20, Garrett) reported that the company "would not provide security at any US port. That job is still in the hands of the Coast Guard, Customs and Homeland Security. The port employees will remain American long shore men, just as they were under the British operating contract. Even so, security questions persist."

USA Today (2/21, 2.31M) reports Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "defended on Monday the Bush administration's decision to allow an Arab company to take over operations at six major U.S. ports." But "two Republican governors questioned the decision and said they may try to cancel lease arrangements at ports in their states." New York Gov. George Pataki and Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich "expressed doubts about the acquisition of a British company, Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co., which has been running the US ports, by Dubai Ports World." Gonzales "said the administration has a 'very extensive process' for approving such deals." The Baltimore Sun (2/21, Cohn, Shaw, 296K) runs a story titled "Ehrlich Objects To Port Deal," and the Washington Times (2/21, Miller, Ward, 90K) also focuses on the governor's comments. The New York Times (2/21, Kirkpatrick, McGeehan, 1.19M), meanwhile, titles its report on the port issue "Pataki Joins Opposition To Takeover Of Ports."

Ridge Says There Should Be More Transparency About Port Deal. CNN's The Situation Room (2/20, Henry) added, "Republican Tom Ridge, Chertoff's predecessor told CNN there needs to be more transparency about the deal, but said he has confidence in his former Bush colleagues."

Local Officials Say Port Security Inadequate. ABC World News Tonight (2/20, story 2, 2:10, Thomas) reported, "Some local officials believe the government is not doing nearly enough to upgrade port security. Baltimore's Mayor wants more surveillance cameras and much wider use of technology to scan for weapons." Mayor Martin O'Malley: "I think it's appalling that the wealthiest nation on the planet would invest so little in port security." Thomas: "Since 9/11, the US has spent $18 billion improving aviation security. Over the same time frame, according to one congressional study, the US spent roughly $560 million to help cities secure sea ports. But some security analysts question whether throwing more money at the nation's ports will really make us safer."

Passage Of UK-Style Official Secrets Act Seen As Unlikely. Newsweek (2/27) reports in its "Periscope" column that in the wake of press disclosures about the NSA domestic surveillance program and CIA antiterror operations, there has been renewed talk "about the need for an American version of Britain's Official Secrets Act." House intelligence committee chairman Pete Hoekstra has called for a "'comprehensive law' to make it easier to prosecute leakers, and last week his Senate counterpart, Pat Roberts, said he, too, thinks new measures may be considered." Newsweek adds, "One key Capitol Hill official, who asked not to be identified because of political sensitivities, suggested the legislation was not likely to get much traction soon, at least in the Senate."

"Real ID" Said To Have Potential To "Empower" Citizens. Douglas McGray, a fellow at the New America Foundation, in an op-ed in the New York Times (2/21, McGray, 1.19M) writes, "As states get ready to comply with a law passed last May and roll out Real ID's…, it might be time to consider a national identification card." Though camps at either extreme of the argument currently "own the conversation," those in the middle "should find the idea of a national ID appealing." McGray goes on to say that a national ID could have positive effects in the areas of health care, voter empowerment, poverty, education, social welfare and immigration. Privacy concerns "are huge," however, the notion of a national ID created to empower citizens, rather than just monitor us and protect us from foreigners, might inspire progressives and centrists to design a card that works."

Energy Department Downgrading Intelligence Unit. The Washington Times (2/21, Gertz, 90K) reports, "The Energy Department is downgrading its counterintelligence unit in what officials say is a 'hostile takeover' by the intelligence office." Bush administration "officials say the reorganization is part of a plan led by Deputy Energy Secretary Clay Sell, a former Senate staff member. 'This [consolidation] is ostensibly for better efficiencies,' said one official who opposes the move. 'But counterintelligence will be less effective and less of a defensive program.'" The Times adds, "A second official said the counterintelligence office consolidation is part of a 'hostile takeover by Rolf Mowatt-Larssen,' head of Energy's intelligence office."

Lawmakers Call For Overhaul OF FEMA. Lawmakers yesterday called for an overhaul of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Speaking on ABC's "This Week," Sen. Joe Lieberman said FEMA should be replaced with something "better, stronger within DHS to take its place." Rep. Tom Davis, appearing on the same program, said FEMA should become a Cabinet department. Meanwhile, the AP (2/19, Daniel) reported that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff yesterday "warned against overhauling FEMA with hurricane season only three months away."

Reuters (2/20, Ahmann) also notes the differences in Lieberman and Davis' approaches. While Davis believes the agency should be pulled out of the Department of Homeland Security, Lieberman argues "that since Congress had given the Homeland Security Department statutory authority over both terror attacks and natural disasters, creating a free-standing FEMA would be the wrong way to go."

The Washington Times (2/20, Hudson, 90K) reports that Chertoff "says any tinkering this close to the storm season -- predicted by weather forecasters to be as severe as last year's -- would be a 'big mistake.'" Chertoff said on NBC's Meet the Press, "If FEMA is pulled out of the Department of Homeland Security, I will predict with virtual certainty that we will be much less prepared this hurricane season than we will be if we keep the department together and finish the job of integrating it."

The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Hook, 958K) reports, "Separating FEMA from the Homeland Security Department would remove a major function from the department, whose creation had been a cornerstone of President Bush's response to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. The department, which brought together the activities of 22 disparate agencies with more than 170,000 employees, was intended to centralize the government's programs involved in fighting terrorism and responding to natural disasters."

Chertoff Warns Against Removing FEMA From DHS. DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff was asked on NBC's Meet the Press (2/19, Russert) if he supports separating FEMA from DHS, Chertoff responded, "I think the last thing we want to do is to have a situation where we have two parallel agencies fighting over who manages a particular type of a disaster. … If FEMA is pulled out of the Department of Homeland Security, I will predict with virtual certainty that we will be much less prepared this hurricane season than we will be if we keep the department together and finish the job of integrating it."

NBC Nightly News (2/19, story 3, 1:55, Jordan) reported that Rep. Tom Davis says it is "time to pull FEMA out of the Department of Homeland Security," but Secretary Chertoff "rejected that assessment and said the country is better-prepared with FEMA inside DHS." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, from NBC's "Meet the Press": "I think the last thing that we want to do is to have a situation where we have two parallel agencies fighting over who manages a particular type of a disaster."

Lieberman Advocates Eliminating FEMA "As We Know It." Asked on ABC's This Week (2/19, Stephanopoulos) if he thinks FEMA ought to be "pulled out" of DHS "and made Cabinet status again," Sen. Joseph Lieberman said, "I believe that it's time for FEMA as we know it to go. … The fact is it's an emergency management administration but it's represented emergency mismanagement. I think it's time to dissolve it and rebuild it within the Department of Homeland Security because, to take it outside, would be to make a redundant organization."

Davis Suggests Establishing FEMA Outside Of DHS. Rep. Tom Davis, on ABC's This Week (2/19, Stephanopoulos), said, "I think FEMA has to be reorganized. I'm not sure it should stay in the Department of Homeland Security for this reason. They are competing for dollars. … I think they've got to be, just there at the right arm of the White House during any crisis."

Bush Names Chertoff Point Person To Work With Mexico On Border Violence. Reuters (2/21) reports, "US President George W. Bush named Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff as the US point person to work with Mexican officials to clamp down on increasing violence along the US-Mexican border, the White House said on Monday." During a phone call between Bush and Mexican President Vicente Fox, in which White House spokesman Scott McClellan said the leaders "talked about…increased border violence and…the importance of working together to improve our border security and stop the violence," it was decided that each government would "pick a high-level contact within each government to work together on the issue and Bush tapped Chertoff for the role." The AP

(2/21) reports McClellan also said "Bush and Fox also talked about pending immigration legislation in Congress."

The Washington Times (2/21, Dinan, Seper, 90K) adds, "Concern over border violence is growing as violent encounters in Mexico increase, spreading rapidly throughout northern Mexico from the lawless confines of Nuevo Laredo, which lies across the Rio Grande from Laredo, Texas." Meanwhile, "there have been more than 200 assaults on US agents in the Tucson sector alone, and the Border Patrol has warned agents in Arizona of incursions by men dressed in Mexican military uniforms."

Success Of Expedited Removal Said To Depend On Word Of Mouth. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, B1, Jordan, 2.11M) tells the story of Isabel Guzman, who, "after three weeks in a detention center in the Arizona desert," was escorted "onto an MD-80 in Mesa, Ariz., bound for Guatemala City." Her "speedy repatriation is part of a new effort by the US government to cut the red tape in deportations of illegal border-crossers." The success of the expedited removal policy "depends on getting deportees to spread the message back home that the rules have changed, and that a failed border crossing will result in rapid eviction from the US." However, "anecdotal evidence and recent history suggest that no matter how risky, or costly, attempted illegal border crossings may be, economic incentives are often too powerful to dissuade people like Ms. Guzman from trying again."

Katrina Reports Spur Speculation Chertoff Could Lose His Job. U.S. News and World Report's (2/27, Marek) cover package examinees the federal response to Hurricane Katrina. A report released last week "from the Republican-dominated House committee that's been examining Washington's star-crossed response to Katrina," called the federal response a "litany of mistakes, misjudgments, lapses, and absurdities." US News adds, "More tough reviews are in the offing. Two major reports on Katrina failures -- one from a Senate committee and another from White House homeland security adviser Frances Townsend-- are due out in the next few weeks. And the Government Accountability Office…has promised its own assessment. The atmosphere has many in Washington wondering whether Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff…can save his job." Newsweek (2/27, Hosenball) examines e-mails provide to Congress by former FEMA Director Michael Brown. Brown "told NEWSWEEK he was frustrated because Chertoff tried to micromanage the disaster. 'I couldn't do my job,' he said. (Neither Chertoff nor the White House responded to requests for comment.)"

Official Says Levee System Will Be "Back To Where It Was." Also in its cover package, U.S. News and World Report (2/27, Hayden) reports that as this year's hurricane season approaches, "residents of New Orleans can be forgiven for wondering if their city's battered defenses will be ready should another killer storm hit." Walter Baumy, deputy director of Task Force Guardian, the Army Corps's $770 million program to repair the region's flood-protection system is charged with getting the system "back to where it was when Katrina rumbled through. Making New Orleans safer than before, well, that's another story. The decisions there will ultimately be made by Congress and carried out by the corps--which will issue a report on the subject by June."

New Orleans Recovery Efforts Examined. Also as part of its cover package this week, U.S. News and World Report (2/27) examines New Orleans' "heroic efforts to climb back out of the abyss" in Katrina's wake. A separate story in U.S. News and World Report's (2/27, Mulrine) cover package notes that "failure, or at least the distinct possibility of it, is very much a presence in this city's fetid streets and flood-damaged homes. … But spend some time talking with those to whom the real challenge of rebuilding will fall…and defeat seems a chimera, far from a given." A separate story in U.S. News and World Report's (2/27, Schulte) cover package on plans to rebuild New Orleans. Plans from Mayor Ray Nagin's Bring New Orleans Back Commission have "run headlong into the politics of race, class, and power, which, as in most places, translates to money." The plan "faces a host of daunting questions -- questions about flood protection, about controlling scattershot redevelopment, and about Washington's willingness to foot the bill to bring back the Big Easy. For now, all that seems certain is that the New Orleans of tomorrow will be smaller in size and population, most likely a whiter, wealthier city." Another story in U.S. News and World Report's (2/27, Tolson) cover package reports on fears that New Orleans will become a theme park "stripped of its low-lying, mostly poor, mostly black neighborhoods and reduced to a few tourist-enticing quarters like the Garden District or an even further Disneyfied Vieux Carre." US News' cover package also includes op-eds from noted New Orleans residents, musician Wynton Marsalis and chef Paul Prudhomme.

Blanco Proposes $7.5 Billion Katrina Rebuilding Plan. NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 8, 0:35, Williams) reported Gov. Kathleen Blanco has unveiled a "comprehensive rebuilding plan." The "$7.5 billion program would provide homeowners there with up to $150,000 each for repairs." While Gov. Blanco "says she expects to hear the sound of hammers in the not-too-distant future, the plan still has to be approved by state lawmakers and local officials and it will need money OK'd by Congress."

The New York Times (2/21, Nossiter, 1.19M) reports "Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco of Louisiana for the first time unveiled a real package of assistance on Monday, proposing to use federal money for loans and grants that aides said would spur rebuilding in devastated areas." New Orleans officials "said the state's $7.5 billion proposal, which offers up to $150,000 in grants to repair or rebuild, along with inexpensive loans, would not have been possible without the $4.2 billion in new money promised by President Bush last week, and $6.2 billion allocated last year." The plan "de-emphasized" buyouts, focusing on "a combination of cash, and low or no-interest loans with the purpose of encouraging repairing and rebuilding."

Barbour's Days As Lobbyist Seen As Boon For Post-Hurricane Mississippi. The New York Times (2/21, Dao, 1.19M) reports the "legendary" K Street reputation of former lobbyist Gov. Haley Barbour "has proved invaluable to…storm-rattled" Mississippi. Barbour said in an interview, "It is obvious that my experiences and relationships over the last 35 years helped me help the state at a time when it needed it more than ever." Meanwhile, though Democrats "commend Mr. Barbour's response to the hurricane, they say it seems stellar mainly compared with the often stumbling performance of officials in Louisiana, which suffered far more devastation."
